The application contains no limitation of the powers of the agents or the medical examiner. Their powers were coextensive with the business intrusted to them respectively. The clause in the policy withholding from the agents authority "to make, alter, or discharge this or any other contract in relation to the matter of this insurance" is not a limitation of the powers of the agents in preparing and accepting the application for insurance. This provision of the policy does not take effect until the application is made and accepted, and the policy is issued. It has relation to the policy and other completed contracts concerning the insurance, and has no reference to the application, which precedes the policy, and which, until it is accepted and the policy issued, is a mere offer or proposition for a contract of insurance. Crouse v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 79 Mich. 249; Kausal v. Minnesota Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Asso. 31 Minn. 17, 47 Am. Rep. 776.

It is conceded that a breach of a warranty of the truth of the applicant's answer avoids the policy, without reference to the good faith of the applicant or the materiality of the answer. But it is a grave mistake to suppose that this rule can be extended so as to hold the applicant responsible for the truth of an answer which was the result of a mistake in judgment or an error or blunder of the company's agent, who was specially charged by the company with the preparation of the application, and who himself dictated the answers upon a full and truthful statement of the facts by the applicant. In such a case there is no difference between a warranty and a representation. Whether it is the one or the other, the company is estopped to take advantage of its own wrong or mistake, as the case may be. Intolerable injustice and wrong would result from any other rule. This case will serve to illustrate how extremely unjust and oppressive the rule contended for by the company would be. Its position is that "spitting of blood," in the language of its medical director, means "ejection of blood from the mouth, without reference to cause or source," and that, inasmuch as the assured did once spit blood from his mouth, his answer to the question should have been in the affirmative, and, that not being so, there is a breach of the warranty of the truth of the answer, and the policy is void, notwithstanding the medical examiner, whose duty it was to make the examination and write down the answers, assured the applicant, upon a full statement of all the facts, that he had not had "spitting of blood," in the sense of these words as used in the application, and directed the applicant to answer the question in the negative. If this is a sound position, it is equally true that if the applicant had, upon this same statement of the facts, by direction of the company's medical director, answered the question in the affirmative, the company could have claimed the answer was not a true answer, within the meaning of the question in the application, and proved its claim by calling its medical examiner, who has testified that the applicant never had "spitting of blood," in the sense of these words as used in the application, and that there was therefore a breach of the warranty of the truth of the answer, which avoided the policy. Such unreasonable claims and contentions are answered by the familiar and fundamental rule of the law of agency, that the principal is bound by the acts of his agent, in all matters within the apparent scope of his agency, as fully and completely as if the act had been performed by the principal himself, and that in such cases the principal is as effectually estopped by the act of his agent as if he had performed it himself. The sound rule in this class of cases is clearly and forcibly stated in the case of Affina Live Stock, F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 251, 4 Am. Rep. 483. Judge Cooley, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case said: "It cannot be tolerated that one party shall draft the contract for the other, and receive the consideration, and then repudiate his obligation on the ground that he had induced the other party to sign an untrue representation which was, by the very terms of the contract, to render it void. When an agent, who at the time and place is the sole representative of the principal, assumes to know what the principal requires, and after being furnished with all the facts, drafts a paper which he declares satisfactory, induces the other party to sign it, receives and retains the premium moneys, and then delivers a contract which the other party is led to believe, and has a right to believe, gives him the indemnity for which he paid his money, we do not think the insurer can be heard in repudiation of the indemnity, on the ground of his agent's unskillfulness, carelessness or fraud."

We content ourselves with citing a few of the many well-considered cases which fully sustain the doctrine of this opinion: Continental L. Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. v. Chamberlain, 132 U. S. 304, 33 L. ed. 841; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 222, 20 L. ed. 617; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Trefftz, 104 U. S. 197, 26 L. ed. 708; American L. Ins. Co. v. Mahone, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 152, 22 L. ed. 593; New Jersey Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baker, 94 U. S. 610, 24 L. ed. 268; Eames v. Home Ins. Co. of N. Y. 94 U. S. 621, 24 L. ed. 298; Graitan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 281, 86 Am. Rep. 617, 92 N. Y. 274, 44 Am. Rep. 373; Flynn v. Equitable L. Ins. Co. 78 N. Y. 568, 84 Am. Rep. 561; Pudritzky v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 76 Mich. 428; Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Haelewood, 75 Tex. 388, 7 L. R. A. 217; Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Snowden, 58 Fed. Rep. 842; Sawyer v. Equitable Acc. Ins. Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 30. In many of these cases there were warranties. There is nothing in the case of New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934, contrary to the views we have expressed, or that qualifies the doctrine of the cases we have cited. In that case the powers of the agent were limited. The application provided that: "No statements or representations made, or information given, to the persons soliciting or taking the application for the policy, should be binding on the company, or in any manner affect its rights, unless they were reduced to writing, and presented to the home office, in the application."

And this limitation was brought to the notice of the assured at the time the application was made. So far from overruling, the court reaffirms, the rule firmly established by its previous decisions, and says: "Where such agents, not limited in their authority, prepare applications and take down answers, they will be deemed as acting for the companies. In such cases it may well be held that the description of the risk, though nominally proceeding from the insured, should be regarded as the act of the company."

Dr. Waples, who was consulted by the assured at the time he spit blood, was called as a witness by the company, and asked to describe the spitting of blood, and explain the nature of it. The defendant objected to the question upon the ground that the information sought was privileged, the witness being the physician of the defendant at the time. The court sustained the objection, and this ruling is assigned for error.

Section 3643 of the Code of Iowa reads as follows: "No practicing attorney, counselor, physician, surgeon, minister of the gospel, or priest of any denomination, shall be allowed in giving testimony to disclose any confidential communication, properly entrusted to him in his professional capacity, and necessary and proper to enable him to discharge the functions of his office according to the usual course of practice or discipline. Such prohibition shall not apply to a case where the party in whose favor the same are made waives the rights conferred."

Section 858 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides: "In the courts of the United States no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried: provided, that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator, interstate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court. In all other respects, the laws of the state in which the court is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law, and in equity and admiralty."

Construing this section, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Potter v. National Bank of Chicago, 108 U. S. 183, 26 L. ed. 111, said: "The existing statute (Rev. Stat. § 858), seems too plain to require construction," and after pointing out that "the first clause of that section shows that there was in the mind of congress two classes of witnesses" that should never be excluded from testifying, added: "In all other respects, that is, in all cases not provided for by the statutes of the United States, the laws of the state in which the federal court sits constitute rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in all actions at common law, in equity, or in admiralty."

The precise question we are considering was before that court in the case of Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co. of N. Y., 112 U. S. 250, 28 L. ed. 708. The case was tried in New York, which state has a statute similar to the Iowa statute which we have quoted. The court said: "Since it is for the state to determine the rules of evidence to be observed in the courts of her own creation, the only question is whether the circuit court of the United States is required by the statutes governing its proceedings to enforce the foregoing provision of the New York Code. This question must be answered in the affirmative."

And, after referring to the state and federal statutes on the subject, the court said: "For these reasons, it is clear that the circuit court properly refused to admit physicians called as witnesses to disclose information acquired by them while in professional attendance upon the insured, and which was necessary to enable them to act in that capacity."

These cases contain the last, and therefore the authoritative, expression of the opinion of the supreme court on this question, and are controlling in this court. If the case of Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251, on this point, conficts with the later cases in that court, then, to that extent, it must be regarded as having been overruled. In the case of Liggett v. Glenn, 4 U. S. App. 438, 51 Fed. Rep. 381, this court referred to the rule announced in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, supra. The later decisions of that court were not called to our attention, and not considered, and, as stated in the opinion, the correctness of the ruling of the trial court was "not dependent upon the question whether the state statute is applicable or not."

The overruling of a motion to suppress the deposition of the defendant was also assigned for error. The deposition was taken under section 868 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which authorizes a deposition to be taken "when the witness lives a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles." The ground of the motion was that there was nothing in the deposition showing that the witness lived at a greater distance from the place of trial than 100 miles. The place of trial was Dubuque, Iowa, and the deposition was taken at Asheville, N. C. The court will take judicial notice that the distance between these places is more than 100 miles. For the purpose of taking a deposition under this statute, a witness "lives" where he can be found, and is sojourning, residing, or abiding for any lawful purpose. The witness in this case had gone to Asheville for his health. The duration of his stay there was uncertain. It was not probable that he would return to his former place of residence, or come within the jurisdiction of the court, in time to take his deposition, and therefore the taking of it at Asheville was an eminently prudent and proper act. The company attended and cross-examined, and this was a waiver of all irregularities in the notice of taking the deposition. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Stoner, 10 U. S. App. 209, 51 Fed. Rep. 649.

SOUTH BEND SPARK ARRESTER CO.

(.....Ind.)

1. The title to letters-patent does not necessarily involve the validity or infringement of the patent so as to defeat the jurisdiction of a state court.
2. An injunction may issue against false and malicious claims of title to a patent, with threats of infringement suits against the customers of a competitor, at least where the defendant is insolvent.
3. The constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press and of speech will not protect against an injunction one who publishes false and injurious statements against a competitor's business.
4. Previous employment of a special judge, to whom a case is sent on change of venue, as counsel for one of the parties in a similar proceeding, this not being a statutory cause for change of venue, does not make it necessary to grant a second change, where but one change is allowed by statute for any statutory cause.
5. A ruling of the postmaster general ordering a postmaster to deliver to one party mail addressed to another is not admissible on the question of malice in publishing circulars which are injurious to the business of the other party.
6. A deed, the effect of which has been adjudicated in a prior suit, is not admissible for the purpose of collaterally attacking the prior decision.
7. A transcript of judicial proceedings, which is not made a part of the bill of exceptions, cannot be considered on appeal, although an offer of it in evidence is recited.

(November 22, 1903.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County in favor of complainant in an action brought to enjoin defendant from asserting claims to certain letters-patent which complainant alleged belonged to it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. J. L. Meyer for appellant.

Mr. Lucius Hubbard for appellee.

Hackney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee sued the appellant in the court below upon a complaint alleging title to certain letters-patent granted by the United States government, derived through a judgment of the St. Joseph circuit court, theretofore rendered in an action between appellee's assignors and this appellant, wherein the title to said letters-patent was in issue, and was claimed by such assignors and by this appellant. Enough of the issues and judgment in that case is pleaded in the complaint herein to show that said action was to quiet the title to said letters-patent, and settle the conflicting claims of the parties thereto, and to restrain the appellant from asserting adverse claims thereto. The title was found to be in others, and that this appellant had no interest therein. Upon the title so derived the appellee sought and secured in this suit an injunction against the appellant from representing to the public and to the customers and agents of the appellee that he owned said letters-patent, or had any interest therein, and from issuing and publishing any demand for royalty or license fees for the use of the invention and improvement covered by such letters, and from threatening litigation with any person who had bought or might buy or offer to buy spark arresters covered by such patents, and from advertising that appellee had not the right to collect the price of any such sales, and from questioning appellee's title to such letters. The theory of the complaint is that the false and malicious claims of title by appellant, and threats to collect royalties from appellee's customers, and to involve them in litigation for infringements, was injurious to appellee's business and materially affected its property rights in said letters-patent, and in the value of spark arresters made by it, in that such claims persuaded and deterred persons from buying them, and rendered their invention and investment valueless.

The appellant attacks the jurisdiction of the St. Joseph circuit court to adjudge upon the title to letters-patent as pleaded in this complaint, and to enter the decree herein appealed from. The allegations of the complaint before us do not disclose the character of the claims asserted in the former action by the appellant and by the appellee's assignors,—whether they grew out of letters granted to either, or whether they depended upon contracts between the parties, under which interests were sold. By reference to the evidence in this case we find that the complaint in the action involving title alleged an ownership in part by appellee's assignors, and a dispute between this appellant and others named as to the ownership of the remaining interests. The character of the claims to such remaining interests, it was alleged, was unknown, and the allegations did not state the character or source of the claims of the plaintiffs in that case. The evidence in that case is not before us, and we would be slow to look into it, to ascertain the jurisdiction of the court, if it were. The finding having been adverse to this appellant, his pleadings in that case cannot supply the light necessary. The decree in that case does not disclose the character of the claims alleged to be made by any of the parties, and does not afford the means of enlightening us upon this subject. We are, then, as to the former proceeding, obliged to rest upon such presumptions as the law indulges from the absence of any information upon the subject. The inquiry is suggested by the contention of the appellant that in the former case, the decree in which is pleaded as the source of appellee's title in this case, the St. Joseph circuit court had no jurisdiction, and, in consequence, its decree was void. It is a well-settled rule that, where a court of general or superior jurisdiction, in some view of the case, may have jurisdiction, and it does not affirmatively appear from the record that the case is one in which jurisdiction does not exist, jurisdiction will be presumed. In view of this rule, we must presume in favor of the jurisdiction of the court in that case if, under any reasonable circumstances, jurisdiction could have existed. The insistence of the appellant is that no jurisdiction existed to try conflicting claims to letters-patent, because, as urged, the rights in such letters are granted under, and depend upon, the federal laws. To this point are cited:

Rich v. Atwater, 16 Conn. 409; Brooks v. Stolley, 3 McLean, 525; Goodyear v. Union India Rubber Co. 4 Blatchf. 65; Dukes v. Graham, 19 Fed. Rep. 647; Campbell v. James, 2 Fed. Rep. 844, and Elmer v. Pennel, 40 Me. 480. The effect of the holdings in these cases is, as we understand them, that, where the validity of the patent or infringement is the question directly involved, the United States courts have jurisdiction. But by an almost unbroken line of decisions it has been held that, even where the validity of the patent is involved, if it arises collaterally, the state courts may have jurisdiction. To this effect are the following cases: Albright v. Teas, 106 U. S. 618, 27 L. ed. 295; Ingalls v. Tice, 14 Fed. Rep. 352; Mid-dlebrook v. Broadbent, 47 N. Y. 443, 7 Am. Rep. 457; Rich v. Atwater, supra; Burrall v. Jewett, 2 Paige, 184, 2 L. ed. 845; Sherman v. Champlain Transp. Co. 81 Vt. 162; Dale Tile Mfg. Co. v. Hyatt, 125 U. S. 51, 31 L. ed. 685; Slummer's App. 58 Pa. 165, 98 Am. Dec. 248; Parkhurst v. Kinman, 6 N. J. Eq. 600; Rice v. Garnhart, 34 Wis. 458, 17 Am. Rep. 448; Saxton v. Dodge, 57 Barb. 64. The rule which may be deduced from these cases is that, where the cause of action depends primarily upon some contract of the parties, jurisdiction exists in the state courts, although the validity of the patent may arise incidentally. This rule has been applied to the enforcement of the assignment of letters-patent under agreement of the parties, and to receivers appointed under state statutes. Binney v. Annan, 107 Mass. 94, 9 Am. Rep. 10; Fuller & J. Mfg. Co. v. Bartlett, 68 Wis. 78. Such an infinite variety of transactions may arise and find enforcement in the state courts, under the rule stated, that we are not permitted to presume that the title involved in the case pleaded did not depend upon a contract enforceable within the jurisdiction of the St. Joseph circuit court. We have been cited to no case, and our researches have discovered none, where the title to letters-patent necessarily involved the validity of the patent or the infringement of the rights of the patentee as granted by the laws of the United States. Ownership, legal or equitable, of the letters-patent, or of an interest in the invention, does not, in our opinion, necessarily involve the validity of the patent or its infringement; for, presuming the patent to be valid and in no manner issued or used contrary to the laws of the government or the rights of patentees of similar inventions interests may arise and be enforced under contracts between the parties and within the jurisdiction of the state courts.

As above indicated the jurisdiction of the St. Joseph circuit court in the present case is attacked. The assault proceeds from a construction of the complaint that the gist of the action is in the enjoining of mere libels upon the title of the appellees to letters-patent. From the premises assumed the conclusion urged would follow, as held in the following cases: Whitehead v. Kitson, 119 Mass. 484; Kidd v. Horry, 28 Fed. Rep. 773; Life Assn. of America v. Boogher, 8 Mo. App. 178; Baltimore Car Wheel Co. v. Bemis, 29

Fed. Rep. 95; Mauger v. Dick, 55 How. Pr. 132; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. 49 Ga. 70, 15 Am. Rep. 674. However we do not concur in the construction of the complaint insisted upon by the appellant. The complaint before us involves more than libel of title. It charges the false and malicious destruction of the appellee's property rights, in injuring its business, deterring others from dealing with it, and rendering valueless its inventions and improvements, its investments and manufactures. It is more than a mere libel not interfering with property rights. The distinction between the two classes of cases is made and enforced by Mr. Justice Blodgett in Emaek v. Kane, 34 Fed. Rep. 46. In that case in speaking of Kidd v. Horry, supra, it was said: "The principle of this case, concisely stated, is that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the publication of a libel or slander. But it seems to me the case now under consideration is fairly different and distinguishable from the cases relied upon by the defendants in what seems to me a material and vital feature. In Kidd v. Horry, the owner of a patent sought the interference of a court of equity to restrain the defendants from publishing and putting in circulation statements challenging the validity of his patent and of his title thereto, on the ground that such publications were libelous attacks upon his property. Here the complaint seeks to restrain the defendant from making threats intended to intimidate the complainant's customers, under the pretext that the complainant's goods infringe a patent owned or controlled by the defendant, and threats that if such customers deal in complainant's goods they will subject themselves to a suit for such infringement; the bill charging, and the proof showing, that these charges of infringement are not made in good faith, but with a malicious intent to injure and destroy the complainant's business. While it may be that the owner of a patent cannot invoke the aid of a court of equity to prevent another person from publishing statements denying the validity of such patent by circulars to the trade or otherwise, yet if the owner of a patent, instead of resorting to the courts to obtain redress for alleged infringements of his patent, threatens all who deal in the goods of a competitor with suits for infringement, thereby intimidating such customers from dealing with such competitor, and destroying his competitor's business, it would seem to make a widely different case from Kidd v. Horry, and that such acts of intimidation should fall within the preventive reach of a court of equity. It may not be libelous for the owner of a patent to charge that an article made by another manufacturer infringes his patent; and notice of an alleged infringement may, if given in good faith, be a considerate and kind act on the part of the owner of the patent; but the gravamen of this case is the attempted intimidation by defendant of complainant's customers, by threatening them with suits which defendant did not intend to bring, and this feature was not involved in Kidd v. Horry. I cannot believe that a man is remediless against persistent and continued attacks upon his business and property rights in his business, such as have been perpetrated by these defendants against the complainant, as shown by the proofs in this case. It shocks my sense of justice to say that a court of equity cannot restrain systematic and methodical outrages like this by one man upon another's property rights. If a court of equity cannot restrain an attack like this upon a man's business, then the party is certainly remediless, because an action at law in most cases would do no good, and ruin would be accomplished before an adjudication would be reached. . . . Redress for mere personal slander or libel may perhaps properly be left to the courts of law, because no falsehood, however gross and malicious, can wholly destroy a man's reputation with those who know him; but statements and charges, intended to frighten away a man's customers and intimidate them from dealing with him, may wholly break up and ruin him financially, with no adequate remedy if a court of equity cannot afford protection by its restraining writ." Little has been said by the learned judge in that case which is not fully applicable in this case, and here we have an element not included in that case, namely, the insolvency of the appellant, whereby an action at law would be wholly inadequate. In the case of Life Assn. of America v. Boogher, supra, it was held that insolvency did not enlist the aid of a court of equity, but we are disinclined to accept that case as authority. It is not only out of line with the holdings of this court upon that question, but it holds that the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press and of speech is a protection to one against equitable interference in publishing false and injurious statements. In neither of these positions can we believe it sound.

It is urged that the lower court erred in refusing a change of venue in the cause from the special judge before whom it was set by the regular judge, a change having been taken from such regular judge. The affidavit in support of the motion so denied did not set out any statutory cause for such change, but stated the employment of such special judge as counsel for some of the parties in the former proceeding involving the question of the ownership of the patent. While a breach of propriety to have accepted the special appointment under such circumstances, we are not enabled to say that the appellant was harmed by the denial of his application. If the affidavit had stated a statutory cause for the change, it should have been denied under the rule that but one change is allowable. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 413. Certainly, the special affidavit did not make a stronger showing than one including the statutory causes.

Under the claim of rebutting the inference of malice in publishing the circulars complained of, and to prove the truth of the statements in such circulars, the appellant sought to prove a ruling of the postmaster general, upon which the local postmaster was ordered to deliver to the appellant mail addressed to the appellee. We are unable to observe the force of either claim in support of the offered evidence. The postmaster general had no authority to decide between the conflicting claims of ownership to the patent, and the effect of any holding by that officer could be no justification or excuse for publishing an injurious claim of title and false demand for royalties when the proper courts were open to him, and when in one of such courts an adverse decision had already been rendered. There had been no effort to disprove the truth of appellant's statements of the postmaster general's ruling. The ruling was used in the statements manifestly for the purpose of lending force to the appellant's claim of ownership, but the ruling could give no real strength to his claim, and could furnish no such advice to the appellant as would excuse the publications.

The appellant complains of the exclusion of a deed of assignment to him by one Rose, offered in defense of his claim of title adverse to that asserted by the appellee. The deed is not in the record, and we have no means of judging of its relevancy. If it antedated the judgment in the former case, the issue arising upon it was there determined adversely to him, and he could not again assert it in this action, thereby collaterally attacking the former decree. Nor can we say that a decree in disregard of such deed was unconscionable, as counsel insists. We do not know that the former decree was in disregard of the deed. It may have been found to have been a forgery, or to have lapsed for nonpayment of the consideration, or set aside as procured by fraud. To permit an inquiry as to the justice of the former decree in its effect upon the assignment would introduce a collateral inquiry, one that appellant was bound to make upon appeal, or by other direct proceeding. It is urged that, defending the former suit as a poor person, appellant was assigned unskilled counsel, by whose mistake the deed was not introduced in evidence, and that his interests were thereby unjustly defeated. In the absence of fraud, the appellant was bound by the decree, and for fraud his remedy is not against the appellee by collateral inquiry. It is further complained that the trial court erred in excluding as evidence a transcript of certain proceedings in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Indiana in support of his assertion of former adjudication of title in his favor. The bill of exceptions states the offer of a transcript, but the same is not made part of the bill of exceptions, and we are deprived of any means of judging of its relevancy. We are not at liberty to decide such questions upon the statement of counsel to this court or to the lower court as to the contents of a transcript or other document.

The questions already passed upon render it unnecessary to inquire whether the decree was contrary to law. The record discloses no error for which the decree of the lower court should be reversed, and the same is therefore affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

ST. JOSEPH & GRAND ISLAND R. CO.,

Plff. in Err.,

v.

DeWitt W. PALMER.

(.....Neb.....)

1. The state courts have not lost their jurisdiction of the subject-matter of actions against carriers because of interstate shipments by reason of the fact that congress has legislated upon the subject.

2. A railroad company, in the carriage of goods, is subject to the liability of a common carrier, and must answer for all losses not occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy, and cannot, in this state, by special contract, limit or relieve itself from this liability.

3. The fact that the contract was for the carriage of goods from a point in this state to a point in another state does not change the rule.

*Headnotes by IRVING, C.

NOTE.—The above decision seems to add a new point to the law of interstate commerce, in deciding that such commerce is subject to the law of the state as expressed in its constitution and statutes denying the right to limit the liability of carriers. These provisions seem to go somewhat beyond 22 L. R. A.

ERROR to the District Court for Adams County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of goods lost while in possession of defendant or a connecting carrier for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. John M. Thurston, W. R. Kelly and E. P. Smith, for plaintiff in error:

It is alleged that the bill of lading was not the contract, that plaintiff did not know of nor consent to the terms thereof, that defendant's agent asked them to sign a receipt for the goods, and that they did so without reading it, supposing it to have been a receipt. That defendant's agents did not call their attention to the contents thereof, and that he "fraudulently concealed" from them the terms thereof; that the release clause was not called to their attention, and that the insertion thereof was a fraudulent attempt by defendant to limit the contract actually made.

There is absolutely no proof tending to support the allegation of fraudulent concealment, the common law as held in most states and in the federal courts; but we understand the decision to be that federal statutes or decisions on this question cannot control even in the case of interstate shipments, especially in respect to the liability of a corporation of the state.

or of any act of omission or commission on the part of defendant's agent amounting to or tending to show fraud, or any other thing outside of a proper and fair conduct of the matter in hand.

It conclusively appears that plaintiff knew all about the uses and purposes of such documents, and that in his business he had become familiar with it. They were made out in duplicate in his presence, after he had twice applied for such documents, and after discussion of, at least, some of the conditions thereof, signed in duplicate and mutually delivered. He had ample time and opportunity to and did in fact examine them. After this the defendant entered upon the performance of the contract, and promptly and fully upon its part complied therewith. Under such circumstances plaintiff cannot now be heard to deny that he made it, or to offer as evidence of another contract the verbal negotiations of the parties which resulted in the written contract.

It not appearing that any fraud or imposition was practiced, or that any mistake intervened, the plaintiff must be conclusively presumed to have become acquainted with its contents, and if he did not do so the consequences of his folly and negligence must rest upon himself. Courts cannot undertake to relieve parties from the effects of such inattention and want of care. The service to be rendered was that of transporting the goods from Hastings, Nebraska, to Grants' Pass, Oregon. The contract was one relating to interstate business. The service itself, and the contract in relation thereto, were subject to the terms and conditions of the Act of Congress.

There is no reason why the supposed inhibition of the Nebraska constitution should now be applied to determine the rights of parties who have made a contract relating to the business of interstate commerce.

No appearance for defendant in error, Mr. John M. Ragan having been of counsel in the lower court.

Irvine, C. filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff in error was a railroad company operating a line of railroad between St. Joseph, Mo., and Grand Island, Neb., and passing through the city of Hastings, Neb. In December, 1889, certain goods were loaded into a car at Hastings for shipment to Grant's Pass, Or. These goods consisted of furniture, wearing apparel, and household goods, belonging partly to one Pardee, and partly to one Hart, and of a stock of drugs and drugstore fixtures belonging to the defendant in error, Palmer. The goods were carried to Grand Island by the plaintiff in error, and there turned over to the Union Pacific Railway Company, on the line of whose road the car was wrecked, and no part of the goods was ever delivered at Grant's Pass. Pardee and Hart assigned their claim to Palmer, who brought suit in the district court of Adams county to recover damages for the loss of the goods. The petition of the plaintiff below, in addition to the foregoing facts, which are undisputed, pleads, among other things, that Palmer, Pardee, and Hart entered into a verbal contract with the defendant to transport said goods and property to Grant's Pass, and there safely deliver them in ten days, in consideration of the sum of $200, and that after the goods were loaded into the car a paper was presented to Pardee for signature, and he signed it believing it to be a receipt, and in ignorance of certain clauses therein contained; that after the goods were turned over to the railroad company for shipment, and the freight of $200 paid, the railroad company's agent stated to the owners that the $200 might not be enough to pay the freight, and extorted from the owners a promise that, in case the freight should exceed $200, they would pay the excess; that the paper referred to was not the contract of shipment, but that the contract was as first stated, and that the contents and limitations of the paper were fraudulently concealed from the owners of the goods. The paper referred to was in fact a bill of lading, and the clauses in regard to which fraud was alleged were two: The first was that the railroad company assumed no liability beyond the end of its own line; that is, at Grand Island, Neb. The other is as follows: "One car emigrant outfit O. R. Rel'd val. of $5. per cwt. in case of total loss S. L. & C."

The answer, so far as it is material, may be analyzed as follows: First. That the railroad was engaged in the business of interstate commerce, and that this was an interstate shipment, and not within the jurisdiction of the state courts. Second. That the bill of lading constituted the contract between the parties, that the first provision quoted exempted the defendant beyond the end of its own line, and that there was no fraud or concealment. Further, that the somewhat cabalistic letters and words quoted from the bill of lading meant, and were understood to mean, owner's risk released to the value of five dollars per hundred weight in case of total loss, and that the shippers were to load and count the goods. Third. That the contract between the parties contemplated merely the shipment of an emigrant outfit, which was understood to mean household goods alone, and that the stock of drugs was fraudulently loaded into the car; the established rate on a car containing drugs being very much greater than the established rate on an emigrant outfit. Fourth. That, under the interstate commerce law, false representations as to the contents of the package, with the consent and connivance of the carrier or its agent, is constituted a misdemeanor, and bars the plaintiff from relief.

The evidence upon the part of the plaintiff tends to show that Pardee and Hart went to the agent of the company at Hastings, stating to him that they wished to ship their household goods and stock of drugs, and asked him for the rate to Grant's Pass upon the carload; that the agent informed them that the rate would be $200, and that there would be nothing to pay at the other end of the line; that thereupon the goods were loaded upon a car furnished by the railroad company for that purpose; that, after the loading was complete, Pardee and Palmer went to the agent for the bill of lading; that the agent told them that, inasmuch as the drugs had been loaded upon the car, he was not sure that $200 would pay the freight, but that he would mark upon the bill of lading a receipt for the $300, to apply on the freight, and if there was more to pay it must be paid at the other end; that they consented to this because there was no other course left open to them; that the bill of lading was then handed to them, and Pardee signed it, none of the owners reading its conditions, or having his attention called thereto. Upon the part of the railroad company the testimony tends to show that, at the first interview, nothing was said about the stock of drugs, but that, when Pardee came for the bill of lading, the agent told him that he would not give him a clear bill of lading, for he had reason to believe that "there was other stuff in the car besides household goods," but would accept $200, to be applied, the owners to pay the difference at the other end; that Palmer then handed him $200, and Pardee signed the bill of lading in duplicate.

The case was submitted to the jury under long instructions, the general effect of which was to submit the question as to whether the oral agreement pleaded, or the bill of lading, constituted the contract between the parties; further, to instruct the jury that under the laws of this state no limitations upon the liability of a common carrier could be imposed, except upon proof that such limitations had been called to the attention of the shipper, and by him expressly assented to, and submitted to the jury whether or not attention had been called to the limitations and assent obtained. There was a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,461.53.

1. The question of jurisdiction was first raised by demurrer to the petition, and then by answer. The theory of the railroad company in this regard seems to be that, the shipment being from one state to another, it became subject solely to the laws of the United States. If that were so, it would not oust the court of jurisdiction. It would only determine upon what principles of law the rights of the party would depend. The record shows that an attempt was made to remove the case to the federal court; that the court refused to order the removal. Nevertheless, it would appear that an order of removal must have been obtained from some source, for there is in the record an order of the federal court remanding the case to the district court of Adams county. These proceedings are a part of the law of the case and conclusively determine the question of jurisdiction in favor of the plaintiff.

2. The questions of law in regard to the transaction are discussed in the briefs under a number of heads relating to objections to the evidence, and to the instructions of the court. To state each in its order would consume much space, and a detailed consideration is unnecessary, for the reason that all these exceptions and assignments of error relate to a very few main questions. Great stress is laid upon the point that the bill of lading must be treated as the conclusive evidence of the contract between the parties, and that parol evidence was not admissible to show a prior verbal contract contrary to the terms of the bill of lading. In this connection it is also urged very strenuously that the court erred in submitting the question raised by this evidence to the jury; further, it is urged that the instructions to the court are conflicting; and, still further, that the limitations imposed by the bill of lading upon the carrier's liability are, upon principles of common law, valid obligations, and that they must be enforced, in the absence of actual misrepresentations or concealment, which, it is contended, the evidence does not establish. Numerous authorities are cited upon both sides upon these points. A single consideration disposes of all of these questions. Under the law of Nebraska, whatever the law may be elsewhere, it is beyond the power of a common carrier, by such provisions as appear in the bill of lading,—assuming it to be the contract of the parties,—to so limit its liability. In Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Washburn, 5 Neb. 117, it is said: "The common law fixes the degree of care and diligence due from railroad companies as common carriers; and a failure to exercise this care and diligence is negligence, without any legal distinction, as being gross or ordinary." That the better rule of law, sustained by the weight of authority, is that "it is against the policy of the law to allow stipulations which will relieve the company from the exercise of that care and diligence, or which, in other words, will excuse them for negligence in the performance of that duty." This case arose before the Constitution of 1875 went into force. By article 11, section 4, of that Constitution, it is provided that "the liability of railroad corporations as common carriers shall never be limited." While the writer might, if the question were a new one, construe this provision as simply a restriction upon the legislature against the limitation of carriers' liabilities by law, and not as preventing such limitation by special contract, the question is no longer an open one, and has otherwise been determined. In Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Vandeventer, 26 Neb. 232, 3 L. R. A. 129, by contract, the railroad company sought to relieve itself from liability for injury to livestock, unless notice in writing were given before the removal of the stock from its place of delivery. This provision of the constitution was there considered and discussed. The court, speaking through Judge Cobb, says: "So I conclude that the object and intent of the convention in proposing, and of electors in adopting, this provision of the constitution here referred to, was to put it out of the power of railroads, as common carriers, to limit their liability as such by special agreement with shippers, and thus remove from their officers and agents all temptation to effect such exemption from liability, and the loss and damage to property which might, of necessity, follow the release of their responsibility, and that of their agents, therefor. See Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Washburn, 5 Neb. 117, a case which arose under the old constitution, but heard in this court under the new."

In addition to this constitutional provision, section 111, chap. 16, Comp. Stat., provides that "any railroad companies receiving freight for transportation shall be entitled to the same rights and be subject to the same liability as common carriers." This is a portion of the general incorporation act, under which the plaintiff in error derives its existence as a corporation. Comp. Stat., chap. 72, art. 1, § 5, provides: "No notice either express or implied shall be held to limit the liabilities of any railroad company as common carriers unless they shall make it appear that such limitation was actually brought to the knowledge of the opposite party and assented to by him or them in express terms before such limitation shall take effect." This section was discussed by the court in Union Pac. R. Co. v. Marston, 30 Neb. 241, and held to apply to just such a case as this, where the limitation was contained in a bill of lading which the shipper alleged was given after the making of an oral contract for shipment. Irrespective, then, of the question as to whether there was an oral contract, or whether such oral contract or the bill of lading constituted the final arrangement between the parties, the law of this state is settled that a common carrier cannot, even by the terms of an express contract, relieve itself of its common-law liability. It is said that at common law the common carrier is not liable for loss, in the absence of special contract, beyond the point at which it delivers the goods to a connecting carrier. To this it should be added that the contract of the shipper was with the carrier first receiving the goods, and if such carrier undertook to deliver the goods at their destination, even though it contemplated doing so through intermediate carriers, it assumed a liability of such character for every part of the route. Many cases hold that receiving goods marked for a point beyond the end of the receiving carrier's route is evidence of a contract to deliver them as marked. In this case the bill of lading was executed in duplicate. In one of the copies the destination was left blank. In the other, the language was: "Received of Palmer and Pardee the following described package, in apparent good order, marked and consigned as noted below, contents and value unknown, to be transported to Grant's Pass, Or., and delivered at the railroad depot at that point." Both copies in writing show that the goods were consigned to Pardee at Grant's Pass, Or. The negotiations as to the freight were, according to the uncontradicted testimony, with a view to prepayment all the way through. Hastings was only twenty-four miles from Grand Island, where the car was delivered to the Union Pacific; and the $200 received by the railroad company if not intended as a full prepayment of the freight to Oregon, was certainly intended to apply on the freight throughout the whole distance. There is no possible view of the evidence from which it could be inferred that the railroad company had only contracted to deliver the goods to the next carrier.

3. The plaintiff in error seeks to avoid the effect of these constitutional and statutory enactments and judicial construction by pleading and arguing the effect of the act of congress known as the "Interstate Commerce Law," and amendments thereto. The particular provision relied upon is from the Act of 1889, as follows: "Any person or any officer or agent of any corporation or company who shall deliver property for transportation to any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, or for whom as consignor or consignee any such carrier shall transport property, who shall knowingly and willfully, by false billing, false classification, false weighing, false representations of the contents of the package, or false report of weight, or by any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its agent or servant, obtain transportation for such property at less than the regular rates then established and in force on the line of transportation, shall be deemed guilty of fraud, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction within the district within which such offense was committed, be subject, for each offense, to a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years or both in the discretion of the court." Conceding that the construction of such acts into misdemeanors should render the contract contrary to public policy, to such an extent as to deprive the shipper of his remedy against the carrier, the evidence wholly fails to make out a case within the section quoted. Whatever false billing there may have been was by the company itself, as all the evidence shows that the agent knew before the car was moved after loading that it contained articles other than household goods. Under the most favorable construction of the evidence on behalf of the railroad company, if there was any false representation as to the contents of the "package," its true contents were known before the railroad company took charge of the car, and an agreement was made for the payment of any additional freight by reason of the introduction of drugs into the car. We cannot see, therefore, how this section, conceding it to have the effect claimed for it by plaintiff in error, could affect the right of recovery. To give it such effect would be to declare that the section quoted absolutely protects a railroad company from liability in any case where the shipper uses general terms in describing the goods to the carrier or agent, and the agent paraphrases such language into a technical phrase, and such phrase does not correctly describe the goods, or where the carrier's agent, of his own volition, makes false statements of the character of the shipment. The section referred to was chiefly designed as a restriction upon the carrier. Its whole aim was to prevent false billing or false representations in order to conceal discriminations in favor of particular shippers. It was not intended, and should not be construed, as a means of relieving a carrier from liability because its own agents have committed an error.

But it is argued that, upon general grounds, the whole subject-matter of interstate transportation was by the constitution placed within the power of congress, and that congress, having enacted the interstate commerce act, assumed such jurisdiction, and thereby nullified existing state laws; that not only the acts of congress must be treated, upon these subjects, as the supreme law of the land, but that the decisions of the federal court must be accepted as the final statements of the law, prevailing against state statutes and state decisions. Without discussing the question as to whether the federal decisions are opposed to the constitutional and statutory provisions of this state, referred to, it is sufficient to say that we cannot accept the theory of the railroad company, as above outlined. It is admitted in the pleadings that the company is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Nebraska. The time of this organization does not appear, but the statutory provisions date from the very earliest period of the state's history. The statute quoted above is a portion of the general incorporation act relating to railroads, the act under which this company derives its right to exist. To say that an act of congress—especially, one not, in express terms, contrary to these provisions—shall be given the effect of nullifying them, would be to say that this state must cease to exercise its sovereign powers of creating corporations for railroad purposes, else it must content itself with creating such corporations absolutely untrammelled by conditions, or permit them to exist subject only to such conditions as the congress of the United States may see fit to impose. While this state forms a constituent part of the Union, under its present constitution, this court should never yield its consent to such a doctrine. If such be the law, it must be declared by another tribunal: and, in case it should be so declared, the exercise by the state of its sovereign power of creating such corporations should, from every motive of self-preservation, cease.

4. In addition to the general verdict rendered by the jury, there was an attempt to have certain special findings returned. One of the errors assigned is the refusal of the court to mark upon the margin of the submission of those findings the word "given." If the submission of these findings amounted to an instruction, the objection would be purely technical, and the refusal of the court to use the word "given" could not operate to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error. Instead of marking the submission given, the court made a note as follows: "As I have said in the attached submission, I submit these special findings for you to pass upon; and, in the opinion of this court, it would be the grossest kind of error to attempt to control your discretion in passing on these special findings." There also appears to have been indorsed upon the questions submitted a quotation of that portion of the statutes whereby it is permitted to the jury, in their discretion, to return a general or special verdict. Of the special questions submitted, the first related to the value of the goods at Hastings, and was answered. The second related to the value of the goods at Grant's Pass, Or., at the time when they should have been received there. In answer to this, the jury stated, "We do not know." The other questions related to the freight rates under different circumstances. All these questions were answered, "We do not know." By the instructions, the jury was told that if it should find for the plaintiff the verdict should be for the market value of the goods at Grant's Pass, at the time they should have been there delivered, together with interest. The second question submitted was material to the case. The others were entirely immaterial, and the discharge of the jury without answering them was in no way prejudicial. It is urged, however, that, when the jury answered that they did not know the market value of the goods at Grant's Pass, they, in effect, stated that they were unable to fix the measure of damages, and that the general verdict could not, therefore, have been founded on the evidence, and in obedience to the instructions. But, under the evidence given as to the value of the goods at Grant's Pass, no verdict less than that returned could be sustained. There is evidence tending to show that the value of the goods at Hastings was less than the value marked upon an inventory offered in evidence, and one witness testified that the goods were worth no more at San Francisco than at Hastings, but there is nothing to show that he even had any knowledge of the value at San Francisco. The only competent evidence of the value of the goods at Grant's Pass, Or., fixes it at more than $7,000; so that the verdict rendered could not have been affected by any findings based upon the evidence in answer to the special question submitted.

Some of the instructions do not state the law correctly. Some of them are apparently conflicting, but, in any view of the evidence, for the reasons already stated, no verdict different in character, or less in amount, could be sustained.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

BRACEVILLE COAL CO., Appt.,

v.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois.

(147 Ill. 66.)

1. The liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such

NOTE.—On the rapidly developing subject of the constitutionality of statutes restricting the contracts between master and servant the decisions are yet in much conflict. As to the power to restrict such contracts between corporations and their employes the above decision is directly contrary to that of State v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co. (R. L.) 17 L. R. A. 856.

As to the classification of corporations the decision is in harmony with State v. Loomis (Mo.) 21 L. R. A. 789, while State v. Goodwill (W. Va.) 6 L. R. A. 22 L. R. A.

way as the laborer may deem most beneficial, and to others to employ such labor, is necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty of the right to property.

2. A statute requiring weekly payment of wages "by every manufacturing, mining, quarrying, lumbering, mercantile, street, electric and elevated railway, steamboat, telegraph,

A. 621, and State v. Fire Creek Coal & C. Co. (W. Va.) 6 L. R. A. 859, condemn similar discriminations which are not confined to corporations. On the other side is the case of Hancock v. Yaden (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 576.

See also, as to kindred decisions, Com. v. Perry (Mass.) 14 L. R. A. 825, and note; Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State (W. Va.) 17 L. R. A. 385; Ramsey v. People (Ill.) 17 L. R. A. 863; also note to State v. Loomis, supra.

telephone, and municipal corporation, and every incorporated express company and water company," makes an unconstitutional discrimination between those corporations and others which are organized for pecuniary profit and employ labor.

3. A restriction of the right of corporations to contract with employes as to payment of wages requiring weekly payments denies the constitutional rights of the employes, and does not affect the corporation merely.
4. Judicial notice is taken of the fact that many corporations are organized and doing business in the state outside of certain classes of corporations enumerated in the statute.
5. It is a matter of common knowledge that during the year 1893 a large number of manufacturing were shut down because of the stringency in the money market.
6. An amendment to the charter of certain corporations by providing for weekly payments of wages, but not applying to all corporations created under the general law, is in violation of a constitutional provision that the charter of no corporation shall be changed by special law.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Grundy County Court convicting it of violating the weekly payment law. Reversed.

Statement by Shope, J.:

The appellant was tried before a justice of the peace, and found guilty of violating an act of the legislature entitled "An Act to Provide for the Weekly Payment of Wages by Corporations," approved April 23, 1891, and the penalty of $50 imposed, for which and costs judgment was rendered accordingly. The case was taken by appeal to the county court of Grundy county, where a trial was held by the court, a jury having been waived, and appellant again found guilty, and the penalty of $50 imposed, and judgment entered for that amount and costs; and the case is brought here by further appeal.

The act of the legislature above referred to provides "that every manufacturing, mining, quarrying, lumbering, mercantile, street, electric and elevated railway, steamboat, telegraph, telephone and municipal corporation and every incorporated express company and water company, shall pay weekly each and every employé engaged in its business the wages earned by such employé to within six days of the date of such payment; provided, however, that if at any time of payment any employé shall be absent from his regular place of labor he shall be entitled to said payment at any time thereafter upon demand." And, after providing a penalty of not less than $10 nor more than $50 for each violation, that such action be commenced within thirty days after the violation, notice to the corporation that an action will be brought, defenses that may not be set up, etc., proceeds: "No assignment of future wages payable weekly under the provisions of this act shall be valid if made to the corporation from whom such wages are to become due, or to any person on behalf of such corporation or if made or procured to be made to any person for the purpose of relieving such corporation from the obligations to pay weekly under the provisions of this act. Nor shall any of said corporations require any agreement from an employé to accept wages at other periods than as provided in section 1 of this act, as a condition of employment."

Appellant became a corporation under the General Incorporation Law, in force July 1, 1872, and for several years past has been engaged in the business of coal mining, with its principal office at Braceville, Grundy county, this state. A certain contract is provided by appellant, which all persons desiring employment in its service are required to sign as a condition precedent to such employment. The complaining witness, Thomas McGuire, in November, 1891, applied to the superintendent of appellant's mines for work, and was required to sign one of its contracts, which was done, in duplicate, each party retaining a copy. Certain rules and regulations of the company on the back of its contracts are, by the terms of each contract, made a part of the same. The contract of witness McGuire, after stipulating, among other things, the wages to be paid, etc., provides: "All payments hereunder to be made on regular pay day, and in compliance with the rules and regulations above named; and pay day is hereby fixed for and on the first Saturday after the 10th of each month, when and at which time all wages or moneys that may have been earned during and in the calendar month next prior to such pay day shall be paid, less all moneys owing said party of the first part on any account whatever." By the seventh rule, printed on the back of said contract, and made part thereof, it is provided: "Every employé will be paid once a month at regular pay day all wages or moneys he may have earned during and in the calendar month next prior to such pay day, after deducting any indebtedness which such employé may owe to the company, or which the company, with the consent of such employé, may have assumed to pay to any other person." McGuire entered upon the employment under the contract November 3, 1891, and quit November 13, 1891, and demanded his wages. The company refused to pay him before the next pay day, when he gave the notice under the statute, and caused this suit to be brought.

Mr. George S. House for appellant.
Mr. William Mooney, with Mr. Samuel C. Stough, State's Atty., for the People.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The principles that must control the decisions of this case were announced in Fraser v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492. Unless we are prepared to recede from the doctrine of that case, and the subsequent case of Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853, the act under consideration must be likewise held unconstitutional and void. Section 2, article 2, of the Constitution of this state guarantees that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. We said in the Fraser Case, the words "due process of law" "are to be held synonymous with 'the law of the land,'" and, quoting from Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869, said: "And this means general public law, binding upon all the members of the community under all circumstances, and not partial or private laws, affecting the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals." There can be no liberty, protected by government, that is not regulated by such laws, as will preserve the right of each citizen to pursue his own advancement and happiness in his own way, subject to the restraints necessary to secure the same right to all others. The fundamental principle upon which liberty is based in free and enlightened government is equality under the law of the land. It has accordingly been everywhere held that liberty, as that term is used in the constitution, means not only freedom of the citizen from servitude and restraint, but is deemed to embrace the right of every man to be free in the use of his powers and faculties, and to adopt and pursue such avocation or calling as he may choose, subject only to the restraints necessary to secure the common welfare. Fraser v. People, supra; Com. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 14 L. R. A. 325; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389; Live Stock D. & B. Assn. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 1 Abb. (U. S.) 388, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394; Godcharles v. Wigman, 113 Pa. 431; State v. Goodwill, 38 W. Va. 179, 6 L. R. A. 621. Property, in its broader sense, is not the physical thing which may be the subject of ownership, but is the right of dominion, possession, and power of disposition which may be acquired over it. And the right of property preserved by the constitution is the right not only to possess and enjoy it, but also to acquire it in any lawful mode, or by following any lawful industrial pursuit which the citizen, in the exercise of the liberty guaranteed, may choose to adopt. Labor is the primary foundation of all wealth. The property which each one has in his own labor is the common heritage. And, as an incident to the right to acquire other property, the liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as the laborer shall deem most beneficial, and of others to employ such labor, is necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty. In the Fraser Case we said: "The privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, and if A. is denied the right to contract, and acquire property in the manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law, and which B., C., and D. are still allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property, to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract;" and quoted with approval: "The man or the class forbidden the acquisition or enjoyment of the property in the manner permitted the community at large would be deprived of liberty in particulars of primary importance to his or their pursuit of happiness." Cooley, Const. Lim. 393. It is undoubtedly true that the people in their representative capacity may, by general law, render that unlawful, in many cases, which had hitherto been lawful. But laws depriving particular persons or classes of persons of rights enjoyed by the community at large, to be valid, must be based upon some existing distinction or reason, not applicable to others, not included within its provisions. Id. 391. And it is only when such distinctions exist that differentiate in important particulars, persons, or classes of persons from the body of the people, that laws having operation only upon such particular persons or classes of persons have been held to be valid enactments. In the Millett Case we held that it was not competent, under the constitution, for the legislature to single out operators of coal mines, and impose restrictions in making contracts for the employment of labor which were not required to be borne by other employers. And in the Fraser Case, a law singling out persons, corporations, or associations engaged in mining and manufacturing, and depriving them of the right to contract as persons, corporations, and associations engaged in other business or vocation might lawfully do, was in violation of the constitution, and void. So in Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853, "An Act to Provide for the Weighing in Gross of Coal Hoisted from Mines," approved June 10, 1891, was held unconstitutional and void for the same reason.

The act under consideration applies not to all corporations existing within the state, or to all that have been or may be organized for pecuniary profit under the general incorporation laws of the state. There is no attempt to make a distinction between corporations and individuals who may employ labor. The slightest consideration of the act will demonstrate that many corporations that may be and are organized and doing business under the laws are not included within the designated corporations. No reason can be found that would require weekly payments to the employes of an electric railway that would not require like payment by an electric light or gas company; to a corporation engaged in quarrying or lumbering that would not be equally applicable to a corporation engaged in erecting, repairing, or removing buildings or other structures; to mining that would not exist in respect of corporations engaged in making excavations and embankments for roads, canals, or other public or private improvements of like character; that will apply to a street or elevated railway that will not make it equally important in other modes of transportation of freight and passengers. The public records of the state will show, and it is a matter of common knowledge, that very many corporations have been organized and are doing business in the state which necessarily employ large numbers of men that are not included within the act under consideration. The restriction of the right to contract affects not only the corporation, and restricts its right to contract, but that of the employes as well. We need not repeat the argument of the Fraser Case upon this point. An illustration of the manner in which it affects the employe, out of many that might be given, may be found in the conditions arising from the late unsettled financial affairs of the country. It is a matter of common knowledge that a large number of manufactories were shut down because of the stringency in the money market. Employers of labor were unable to continue production for the reason that no sale could be found for the product. It was suggested in the interest of employers, as well as in the public interest, that employes consent to accept only so much of their wages as was actually necessary to their sustenance, reserving payment of the balance until business should revive, and thus enable the factories or workshops to be open and operated with less present expenditures of money. Public economists and leaders in the interest of labor suggested and advised this course. In this state, and under this law, no such contract could be made. The employé who sought to work for one of the corporations enumerated in the act would find himself incapable of contracting as all other laborers in the state might do. The corporations would be prohibited entering into such a contract, and, if they did so, the contract would be voidable at the will of the employé, and the employer subject to a penalty for making it. The employé would, therefore, be restricted from making such a contract as would insure to him support during the unsettled condition of affairs, and the residue of his wages when the product of his labor could be sold. They would, by the act, be practically under guardianship; their contracts voidable, as if they were minors; their right to freely contract for and to receive the benefit of their labor, as others might do, denied them.

But, treating the restrictions as affecting the corporations only, it is insisted that the reservation of authority by the general assembly in section 9 of the General Incorporation Act (Rev. Stat. chap. 83) authorized the passage of the act in question. That section provides: "The general assembly shall at all times have power to prescribe such regulations and provisions as it may deem advisable, which regulations and provisions shall be binding on any and all corporations formed under this act." It is said this section entered into and formed a part of the contract under which the grant of the corporate franchise was conferred upon appellant company, it having been organized under the general law. It was expressly held that the reservation of the right to alter, amend, or repeal the charter entered into and formed a part of the contract between the state and the corporation chartered under the Constitution of 1848, and that the power reserved might be constitutionally exercised. Butler v. Walker, 80 Ill. 345. And undoubtedly the same construction should be placed upon the reservation of power in the section quoted. But by section 1, article 11, of the Constitution it is provided: "No corporation shall be created by special laws, or its charter extended, changed, or amended, . . . but the general assembly shall provide by general laws for the organization of all corporations hereafter to be created." The manifest intention of this provision of the constitution was to require not only the creation of corporations, but amendments to charters of those existing, to be made by general laws, applicable alike to all occupying like circumstances and existing under the same conditions; and it necessarily follows that special acts, applying to particular corporations only, and not to the general body of corporations created under the act, would fall within the prohibition of this section. By the general incorporation law appellant company was granted the right to contract as a corporation in and about the business for which it was organized. A restriction of its right to thus contract is necessarily an amendment or change of its corporate powers and functions of its charter. If, therefore, the restriction is held to fall within the power reserved in section 9 of the Act, it must, in view of the constitutional provision, be construed as reserving the power to prescribe such regulations and provisions as the legislature may deem advisable by general law. The act under consideration, not being a general law, is therefore not a warranted exercise of power. We need not extend this opinion by further discussion. The right to contract necessarily includes the right to fix the price at which labor will be performed, and the mode and time of payment. Each are essential elements of the right to contract, and whosoever is restricted in either as the same is enjoyed by the community at large is deprived of liberty and property.

The enactment being unconstitutional, there is no law authorizing the judgment of the County Court, and it will accordingly be reversed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Mabel L. FORCE, by Next Friend,

v.

The treatment of a patient by a physician is to be tested by the general doctrines of his school and not by those of other schools.

NOTE.—The discussion of the required skill of physicians as involving the merits of the school to which they belong is interesting although the decision seems to be fully supported by precedent

(May 22, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Waterbury County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malpractice on the part of defendant, a physician, which was alleged to have resulted in the loss of plaintiff's sight. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Webster & O'Neill, for appellant: When a party employs a physician to treat him the contract relation subsisting between the two is that the physician, educated in theory and practice of a particular school, impliedly engages that he will use the ordinary care and skill of his profession in that school. His acts must be judged and tested by the treatment and methods adopted by the school of practice in which he was educated.

A physician in attending his patients engages he will use due care to discover the nature of the disease which gives occasion for his services, and in applying the usual remedies, but beyond this measure of skill and diligence the law makes no exactions; if he is to be held for results, or as a guarantor of success, it can be only on his express agreement.

Smith v. Hyde, 19 Vt. 54.

The most skillful practitioner may mistake the disease, apply improper remedies and even destroy life, by mismanagement, and yet be wholly innocent.

Sumner v. Utley, 7 Conn. 264.

It was in evidence, and was found by the court, that the defendant in treating the plaintiff adopted the remedies and methods prescribed by the homœopathic school of practitioners.

And this was what his implied contract called for.

The court should have instructed the jury in conformity to our request.

Mr. Charles G. Root, for plaintiff:

Action on the case will lie against all professional men, tradesmen, and mechanics for unskillfulness and negligence in their professions, trades, and callings.

1 Swift, Dig. * 563.

Every one who undertakes any office, employment, duty, or trust, contracts to perform it with integrity, diligence, and skill. And if by this want of either of those qualities any injury accrues to individuals, they have therefore their remedy in damages by a special action on the case.

3 Bl. Com. 165.

Liability in cases of malpractice does not arise out of any contract or direct privity, but out of the duty which the law imposes upon the physician to avoid acts in their nature dangerous to the lives of others; and it need not, therefore, be stated by whom the defendant was employed.

1 Boone, Code Pl. § 182; Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 8 Am. Rep. 298.

If there was either carelessness, or a want of ordinary diligence, care, and skill, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Landon v. Humphrey, 9 Conn. 210, 23 Am. Dec. 388.

One who offers himself for employment in a professional capacity undertakes . . . that he will use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in the exercise of his skill and the application of his knowledge to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed.

Carpenter v. Blake, 75 N. Y. 12; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 606, 607.

In a case like this the school of medicine may be on trial as well as the physician. It would be a strange doctrine that negligence in the treatment of disease should be excused if the physician had adopted a course of treatment prescribed by any individual or any combination of individuals.

The true test of the admissibility of expert testimony is "whether the witnesses offered as experts have any peculiar knowledge or experience, not common to the world, which renders their opinions founded on such knowledge or experience any aid to the court or the jury in determining the questions of issue."

Taylor v. Monroe, 43 Conn. 44.

Fenn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by a minor child to recover damages against the defendant, who is a homœopathic physician, for alleged malpractice in treating her for ophthalmia. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and from the judgment rendered thereon the defendant appealed to this court.

The only questions presented, which are necessary to consider, relate to the charge of the court to the jury. Evidence was offered to show that the defendant, in treating the plaintiff, adopted the remedies prescribed by the homœopathic practitioners. It appeared that the allopathic school of medicine would treat such a case differently, and in the latter way the plaintiff claimed that she ought to have been treated. The defendant asked the court to charge the jury "that treatment by a physician of one particular school is to be tested by the general doctrines of his school, and not by those of other schools." The court refused to so charge, and charged as follows: "In regard to that matter, I will say that the defendant's negligence or want of skill in the treatment of the plaintiff's eye must be determined by all of the evidence in the case, and if the defendant adopted the treatment laid down by one particular school of medicine, and the medical testimony offered by the plaintiff related to treatment prescribed by a different school, you will weigh the testimony, having regard to any bias or prejudice that might influence the testimony of those who belonged to a different school from that of the defendant. You should also take into consideration the training and education of the defendant for his profession, the experience which he has had, and the degree of skill with which he handled the case, all bearing upon the question whether the defendant used ordinary care and skill in the treatment of the plaintiff." The defendant claims that the court erred, both in refusing to charge as requested, and in charging as it did.

In the absence of special contract physicians and surgeons, by holding themselves out to the world as such, impliedly contract that they possess the reasonable and ordinary qualifications of their profession, and are under a duty to exercise reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence. Landon v. Humphrey, 9 Conn. 209, 23 Am. Dec. 383; Kendall v. Brown, 74 Ill. 232; Small v. Howard, 128 Mass. 131, 35 Am. Rep. 363; Ballou

v. Prescott, 64 Me. 805; Leighton v. Sargent, 81 N. H. 119, 64 Am. Dec. 323; Ely v. Wilbur, 49 N. J. L. 685, 60 Am. Rep. 668; Potter v. Warner, 91 Pa. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 668; Hathorn v. Richmond, 48 Vt. 557; Gates v. Fleischer, 67 Wis. 504.

In determining what constitutes reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence, the test is that which physicians and surgeons in the same general neighborhood and in the same general line of practice ordinarily have and exercise in like cases. Hathorn v. Richmond, supra; Utley v. Burns, 70 Ill. 162; Almond v. Nugent, 84 Iowa, 300, 11 Am. Rep. 147; Small v. Howard, and Leighton v. Sargent, supra. In addition to this, however, regard must be had to the advanced state of the profession at the time of the treatment. Small v. Howard, and Gates v. Fleischer, supra; Smothers v. Hanks, 84 Iowa, 286, 11 Am. Rep. 141; Nelson v. Harrington, 72 Wis. 591, 1 L. R. A. 719.

Premising these general principles, we come to the precise question presented by the appeal: Ought the defendant's request to charge to have been complied with? And was the charge, as given, correct and sufficient? The language of the request may be found in Patten v. Wiggin, 51 Me. 594, 81 Am. Dec. 593, where the following charge was held to be correct: "If there are distinct and different schools of practice, and a physician of one of those schools is called in, his treatment is to be tested by the general doctrines of his school, and not by those of other schools. It is to be presumed that the parties so understood it. The jury are not to judge by determining which school, in their own view, is best." And the same principle was clearly stated, in an able opinion, in Bowman v. Woods, 1 G. Greene, 441, and we are aware of no authority to the contrary. But, notwithstanding this, it seems to us that the inherent difficulty in an endeavor to vindicate the action of the court below is not because the court failed to charge in the identical language of the request, nor because of the language actually used by the court, which appears correct so far as it goes, but rather because the court, in refusing to charge as requested, and only charging as it did, omitted to bring to the attention of the jury a consideration which, in view of the testimony received, and the claims made thereon by counsel, ought to have been presented to them. It having appeared how the allopathic school of medicine would treat a case of the character of the one in question, the court, as we have seen, said: "If the defendant adopted the treatment laid down by one particular school of medicine, and the medical testimony offered by the plaintiff related to the treatment prescribed by a different school, you will weigh the testimony, having regard to any bias or prejudices that might influence the testimony of those who belonged to a different school from that of the defendant." Doubtless, this is correct. The testimony should be so weighed. But if the defendant adopted the treatment, not of one particular school in the abstract, but of his own particular school, which he publicly professed and practiced, and the medical testimony offered by the plaintiff related to treatment prescribed by a different school, such testimony should be weighed, not alone with regard to bias or prejudice influencing the testimony of witnesses, but with regard to bias or prejudice which might influence or incline the jury in favor of one school rather than the other; for, as was said in Patten v. Wiggin, supra, "the jury are not to judge by determining which school, in their own view, is best." And as it seems to us, from the testimony presented, which did not stop with the statement of how, in the view of the witnesses, such a case ought to be treated, but went further, and stated how "the allopathic school of medicine would treat it," it was precisely from such bias or prejudice the defendant stood in danger. Indeed, the counsel for the plaintiff freely admitted, in argument before us, that the respective merits of the two schools of medical practice were—and, as he claimed, of right ought to have been—on trial before the jury. We cannot concede such right, and the jury, we think, should have been told that the relative merits of the two schools were in no sense before them for their consideration; that, so far as the defendant was to be judged by either, it was by the tenets, rules, principles, and practices of his own school, not by those of another; and that, if the defendant adopted the treatment laid down by his own school, the fact that another school prescribed another treatment tended in no wise to show that the defendant was chargeable with lack of skill or negligence. It would seem that if it could be held negligent or unskillful, in a given case, to use the treatment prescribed by the school to which the practitioner belonged, such negligence or want of skill must consist either in the mode of use, the application of such remedies under improper circumstances, or because they were intrinsically wrong, inappropriate, or inadequate. If there be any valid objection to the language quoted from Patten v. Wiggin, supra, it is in the failure to incorporate with the general statement the further one that the test there given does not exclude the duty of keeping pace with the progress of professional knowledge, ideas, and discoveries, to the extent that a faithful, conscientious, and competent practitioner, of whatever school, may be reasonably expected, and is therefore lawfully required, to do, not because the test of the treatment of some other school can be applied. It may be added that the general expressions in the charge under consideration, that the question of the defendant's negligence "must be determined by all of the evidence in the case" and that the jury should consider "the training and education of the defendant for his profession, the experience which he had had, and the degree of skill with which he handled the case," in no sense appear to meet or supply the wanting element in the charge, and that because of such element, if the unqualified language of the request was too broad, still the rule stated in Seeley v. Litchfield, 49 Conn. 188, applies, and that, "if it was not the duty of the court to charge precisely as requested, yet it was its duty to respond to the request by charging the jury correctly on that subject."

It was not claimed that the fact that the plaintiff was an infant of tender years, incapable of contracting, and that the physician was called by her father, in any way extended or altered the implied contract and duty of the defendant, nor do we think such a claim, if made, would have been valid. It appeared that the defendant had, at least to some extent, been the family physician, and had previously, as such, prescribed for the plaintiff; but this circumstance, also, is one to which no importance had been attached.

There is error, and a new trial is granted.

The other Judges concurred.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

Wirt ADAMS, State Revenue Agent, Appl.,
v.

Theodore TONELLA et al.

(.....Miss.....)

1. A constitutional provision requiring uniformity and equality of taxation is violated by a statute authorizing a state revenue agent to levy and collect back taxes, when, in his opinion, the assessed value on which taxes have been collected was too little.

2. The reopening of the decision of tax officers, by which the valuation of taxable property has been fixed and taxes thereon collected, under a subsequent statute authorizing a state revenue agent to assess and collect additional taxes, where, in his opinion, the tax assessment had been too small, is an unconstitutional interference with vested rights.

3. A statute giving a state officer unlimited power and discretion to fix the valuation of property which he thinks has been assessed for too little, without any opportunity to the taxpayer to be heard, except in defense of a suit to collect the taxes, is in violation of a state constitution which provides that property shall be assessed under general laws by uniform rules according to its true value, and which also provides for assessors as county officers.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren county in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover taxes which plaintiff alleged should have been, but were not, paid upon certain personal property owned by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Calhoun & Green, for appellant:

The form of remedy for taxes in the absence of constitutional limitations is at the election of the legislature.

2 Desty, Taxn. p. 708.

Inasmuch as it is entirely competent for the legislature to prescribe such formulas as it pleases, with regard to the levy and collection of taxes, it is fully within its power, by retroactive legislation, to dispense with their necessity and obviate the evils of their non-observance.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 371, and cases; Vaughan v. Swazie, 55 Miss. 709.

If the person owned property which the legislature sought to reach by its then laws, and which he, in disregard of his duty morally, civilly, and legally, failed to return for assessment, and thereby evaded his share of the burdens of government, he is a delinquent, and it is clearly within the power of the legislature to devise a civil proceeding to remedy the evil. No injury is done him. He is merely made to do that which the law tried to compel him to do and which by artifice has been evaded.

State v. Piazza, 66 Miss. 429.

The powers of the assessor and collector vested by the constitution extend only to the right of assessment and collection of revenue for the current fiscal year.

It was held, under the Constitution of 1869, that it was not a part of the collector's official duty, in the absence of statute, to collect delinquent taxes, and that neither he nor his sureties were liable for failure to do so.

State v. Harris, 52 Miss. 686.

Taxes for schools under the constitution and laws are based upon the annual scheme.

Foot v. Brown, 60 Miss. 155; Cowart v. Foxworth, 67 Miss. 322.

A fortiori this rule would apply to assessors.

With these judicial interpretations of the Constitution of 1869, article 5, section 21, the Constitution of 1890 was made, and no change in this regard was made.

Under the Constitution of 1869 the legislature had power to provide for the performance of the duties of the assessor when the assessor had failed to perform them as to current revenue.

Wolfe v. Murphy, 60 Miss. 1; Corburn v. Crittenden, 62 Miss. 125.

By section 513, Code 1880, the legislature conferred power on the collector to assess where the assessor had failed to assess; and this for the fiscal year, but after the delinquency of the assessor.

State v. Adler, 68 Miss. 487.

If the collector whose duties were prescribed by the constitution could have the power of assessment conferred on him by the legislature, and if the board of supervisors could be given power to appoint assessors to perform the duties of the assessor for current revenue, it is manifest that under the Constitution of 1890 the legislature had the power to provide for the assessment of revenue made delinquent through the failure of the assessor.

Even judges can be created by statute to perform judicial duties which the constitutional judges are unable to perform; such as to decide cases in which they are interested, etc.

Grinstead v. Buckley, 32 Miss. 148.

Unless another method is prescribed by the constitution, the legislature has power to provide for assessments of overlooked or omitted property, and for the collection of these assessments.

Welty, Assessments, pp. 36, 37.

On the same principle property invalidly assessed may be re-assessed.

Id. § 197.

In Cedar Rapids & M. R. Co. v. Carroll County, 41 Iowa, 153, it was held that, as the duty was imposed on the citizen to make the return for assessment, and as the property had escaped by reason of the failure to perform this duty, and as the treasurer had assessed it for back taxes, the taxpayer being a delinquent, could not complain of any irregularity in the assessment.

The delinquent taxpayer cannot complain for he has refused to avail of the constitutional remedy of assessment for current revenues, and, by his default, the time has passed for application of the constitutional scheme.

Metcalfe v. Perry, 66 Miss. 76.

The rights of the state, then, are only to be cared for. The scheme provided by the constitution having been willfully abandoned by the taxpayer, and the time for the performance of the functions of his office as secured by the constitution having passed by the assessor's default, it is perfectly competent for the state in protection of its revenue to confer the power of collection of its revenue upon another by statute, and to prescribe any method it may see proper to devise for its collection.

Vaughan v. Swayzie, 56 Miss. 709.

Mr. R. H. Thompson, also for appellant: Mr. Tonella, and his co-defendants, are charged in the declaration, and of course the demurrer admits the charge, to have so conducted themselves in the premises to deprive the state, county, and city of the revenue which in justice and in right ought to have been paid, and thereby they have increased the burden to be borne by more conscientious citizens. Have the defendants a right to do that thing? Surely no man has the legal or moral right to do as defendants have done; their conduct is contrary to good morals, and wrong.

State v. Adler, 68 Miss. 487.

That property which has escaped taxation can afterwards be assessed is, under the decisions of this court, beyond dispute; it can be done by the assessor, or by the tax-collector. Can it be done by any other officer whom the legislature may designate?

The opinion in French v. State, 52 Miss. 759, carefully read will produce the conviction that the judge who delivered it would not have decided that the legislature was without power to provide that, after the assessor and tax-collector had failed to collect taxes, they might be collected by some other officer.

That the legislature has power to provide for the assessment of taxes not paid in past years is practically illustrated in this state, and received legislative and judicial sanction, in case of the Act approved April 3, 1888 (Laws 1888, p. 49), and the case of Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Thomas, 65 Miss. 553.

While taxes are not debts in the ordinary sense, neither is the right to recover for a tort debt, and many other things are not debts which may be sued for. If a remedy for the collection of taxes is not given, an action will lie, but generally speaking the remedy, as by distress, if given, is regarded as exclusive. See Cooley on Taxation, 18, and notes. The authorities show that it is a disputed question whether an action will not lie for delinquent taxes in any and all cases, even if a remedy other than by action be provided. Surely the legislature may provide for the bringing of such suit. Such a remedy is provided by sections 4190 and 4191, Annotated Code.

Surely no man, not even Mr. Tonella, has a vested right to do wrong. Claims contrary to justice and equity cannot be regarded as of the character of vested rights.

Randall v. Krieger, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 149, 23 L. ed. 126.

Messrs. Murray F. Smith and J. Hirsh for appellees.

Cooper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by the revenue agent of the state, Wirt Adams, against Theodore Tonella, a resident of the city of Vicksburg, in the county of Warren, and Brennan and Sproules, sheriff and assessor of said county of Warren, and Keirsky, the assessor of the city of Vicksburg. The declaration avers that during the year 1891 the defendant Tonella was the owner of certain personal property, to wit, "notes, accounts, and valid securities for loaned money," of the value of $7,200, which was subject to assessment and liable to taxation for said year in said county and city; that the levy for state and county taxes for the year 1891 was 12 mills on each dollar of taxable property, and that for city taxes was 20 mills on the dollar; that it was the duty of Tonella to return said credits for assessment and taxation, and was also the duty of said assessors and collectors to have caused the same to be assessed according to law, which they willfully failed and neglected to do; that in September, A. D. 1892, the plaintiff, as by law he was authorized to do, assessed the said credits to the defendant Tonella, and reported the same to the proper officers, to be by them noted on the assessment rolls, and gave notice of his action to Tonella. The plaintiff demanded judgment against Tonella for $144, the amount claimed as taxes due to the city of Vicksburg, and for $86.40 as state and county taxes. He also demanded judgment against Brennan, the sheriff, and Sproules, the county assessor, and Keirsky, the city assessor, for the amount of the commissions to which plaintiff would be entitled if successful in this suit. The defendants demurred, and, their demurrer having been sustained, the plaintiff appeals.

The office of state revenue agent is created, or the statutes relative to the same revised and amended, by chapter 126 of the Code of 1892. The first three sections of the chapter (4187-4189) have relation to the creation, election, and qualification of the officer. The last nine sections relate to the procedure by the agent to enforce the payment of taxes after they have been imposed, or to other matters not now necessary to review. The question involved in the present suit arises from a consideration of sections 4190-4193, which are as follows: "Sec. 4190. After the expiration of the fiscal year in which the taxes become due and payable, and that, too, whether the taxes were assessed or properly assessed or not, the revenue agent may assess and collect all past-due taxes, whether the same be caused by the default of the assessor, tax collector or tax-payer; but if the revenue agent institute suit against any person or corporation who has been correctly assessed, and the taxes so assessed paid, he shall be liable on his bond to such person or corporation for all costs and expenses incurred in defending such suits, if the judge will certify that the suit was frivolous, or that there was no ground for the action. Sec. 4191. It is the duty of the state revenue agent to investigate the books, accounts, and vouchers of all fiscal officers of the state, and of every county, municipality and levee board, and to sue for, collect, and pay over all revenue improperly withheld from either; and he has power, and it is his duty, to proceed against all such officers and their sureties by action to recover any such revenue; and it is his duty to proceed, by suit in the proper court, against all officers, persons, corporations, companies and associations of persons, for all past-due and unpaid taxes owing to the state, counties, municipalities and levee boards, whether ad valorem, privilege, license, poll or other, and whether assessed or properly assessed or not, if the fiscal year in which the same ought to have been paid have expired; and his duty to proceed by suit for the collection of any such taxes arises whether the failure to pay the taxes originated from the neglect or failure of any officer or board to perform his or its official duty, or from the failure of any person or corporation to fully give in his or its property to the assessor, or at a sufficient valuation or otherwise. But his right and duty to collect money from a fiscal officer, where the delinquency appears by correct open account on the books of the proper accounting officer, shall only arise after he has given thirty days' notice to the officer to pay over the amount, and his failure to do so. Sec. 4192. It is the duty of the state revenue agent, when any person, corporation, property, business, occupation or calling liable to an ad valorem or privilege tax has escaped or shall escape taxation by reason of not being assessed or of not being demanded, or otherwise, to assess the same as the tax-collector is authorized to do, and to collect and pay over the taxes thereon in like cases. He shall report all additional assessments, in writing, to the tax-collector, whose duty it will be to enter the same on the assessment-roll, as in case of an assessment by him, only he shall note that the assessment is made by the state revenue agent. The taxes on all such additional assessments may be recovered by the state revenue agent by action, if not paid within ten days after notice to the party assessed, if he be a resident of the state, or, if a nonresident, within ten days after the date of the assessments; and the proceedings may be against the person or property assessed, or both. Sec. 4193. The state revenue agent shall not assess taxes accruing prior to the year 1896; and in all cases the burden of proof shall be on the agent to show that the property or person was not assessed, or properly assessed; and the person assessed or reassessed shall have ten days' notice, in writing, before bringing suit. But when the revenue agent shall think property which has been assessed and approved by the board of supervisors, has been improperly assessed, he shall notify the board of supervisors, and summon the party assessed to appear before it for a rehearing. The board shall hear both parties, and decide the matter of difference, from which either party may appeal." Section 112 of the Constitution of 1890 declares as follows: "Taxation shall be uniform and equal throughout the state. Property shall be taxed in proportion to its value. . . . Property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws, and by uniform rules, according to its true value." Under the Constitution of 1869, the provision was that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state. All property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law." Article 12, § 20. By section 21, article 5, of the Constitution of 1869, it was provided: "A sheriff, coroner, treasurer, assessor and surveyor shall be elected in each county by the qualified electors thereof, who shall hold their offices for two years, unless sooner removed." Section 138 of the Constitution of 1890 is as follows: "The sheriff, coroner, treasurer, assessor, surveyor, clerks of courts and members of the board of supervisors of the several counties, and all other officers exercising local jurisdiction therein, shall be selected in the manner provided by law for each county."

The provisions of our revenue laws for the assessment of property for taxation, aside from those of chapter 126 of the Code of 1892, now under consideration, have remained practically unchanged since the adoption of the Code of 1871. Every person owning property subject to taxation is required to render a schedule thereof, with its value, under oath, and upon a form supplied by the assessor. If the property inventoried is, in the opinion of the assessor, undervalued, he is required to make report thereof to the board of supervisors under oath, and he may add to his roll any property discovered by him not returned by the owner. At stated times, fixed by law, the board of supervisors met to examine, correct, and equalize the assessments, and, this being done, they enter an order approving the rolls. Any person feeling himself aggrieved by any order of the board in reference to the assessment of property may appeal to the circuit court. Two copies of the roll, as approved by the board, are then made by the clerk of the board, one of which is delivered to the collector and the other to the auditor, the original remaining in the office of the clerk. The roll delivered to the collector is the authority by which he collects the taxes levied. It is also provided by law that the collector may add to the roll any property he may discover as unassessed after the roll comes to his possession, making return of such additional assessment to the board of supervisors. If at any time the assessor shall discover that any person or property has escaped taxation in former years, it is his duty to assess the same, making due return thereof with his next assessment, and giving the person who, or whose property, is thus assessed, notice thereof, if he be a resident of the county. The primary purpose, in all just schemes of taxation, is to distribute its burdens equally and uniformly upon all persons and property, and the requirement of our constitution that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, is but the statement in another form of the provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform. If all property was assessed at one half or one third its value, the rule of uniformity of taxation would not be disturbed. But the constitution, in providing for the office of assessor, and confining the office to territorial limits of his county, divided the state into as many taxing districts as there are counties; and since, if one rule of valuation should be adopted in one county and another in another, there would not be equality of taxation, it prescribed the standard of valuation for all property in all the counties should be the real value. The office of assessor, spoken of in section 138 of the Constitution, is one of known and settled functions; and in providing that an assessor should be selected, in the manner provided by law, for each county, it is to be presumed that the framers of that instrument intended to provide for the performance by him, substantially at least, of those duties which have hitherto pertained to his office. French v. State, 52 Miss. 760. The constitution declares the rule of uniformity and equality of taxation. It fixes the standard of valuation by which the rule shall be preserved and enforced. It provides for the selection of an officer for each county to perform the duties of assessing persons and property. It is silent as to details, leaving to the legislature the power and duty of formulating the scheme of taxation, subject to the restrictions imposed by the general provisions it does contain. Unquestionably, the constitution contemplates and requires an assessment of property as a condition of its taxation. Assessment is the listing and valuation of property liable to taxation according to law. It is essential for the apportionment of all ad valorem taxes. Cooley, Taxn. 259. And an assessment can only be made by the officer designated by law to make it. Welty, Assessments, § 10. When the constitution devolves that duty upon a particular person, the legislature may not substitute another. Ibid.; People v. Kelsey, 84 Cal. 478; People v. Hastings, 29 Cal. 450; People v. Sargent, 44 Cal. 434; Houghton v. Austin, 47 Cal. 646; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Orange County Comrs. 74 N. C. 508; Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. v. Brunswick County Comrs. 72 N. C. 10.

In Houghton v. Austin, above cited, the rule that the legislature could not devolve the duty of assessing property upon any other tribunal or officer than the assessor provided for by the constitution was carried to the extent of annulling a law creating a state board for equalization of taxation among the several counties of the state.

It is said by counsel for appellant that the power of the legislature to devolve the duties of the assessor upon others has been recognized in many decisions of this court. First, it is said that in Wolfe v. Murphy, 60 Miss. 1, the Act of March 5, 1878, which provided that, if the assessor should fail to complete his roll as required by law, the board of supervisors should "appoint some suitable person to make and complete such assessment-rolls, in the same manner as the assessor is required by law to do," was held to be a valid exercise of legislative power; and, second, that in State v. Alder, 68 Miss. 487, the authority of the collector to assess such persons or property as had been omitted by the assessor, as directed by section 518 of the Code of 1880, was also upheld. It would be sufficient to reply that in neither of these cases was the validity of the legislation challenged by counsel, or adverted to by the court. But it is to be observed that the statutes construed in these cases have existed in this state since the year 1846 (Hutch. Code, pp. 185-189, §§ 9-23), and were in operation at the adoption both of the Constitution of 1869 and of 1890. The Code of 1857 provided that, upon failure of the assessor to make and return his roll as required by law, the board should have power to remove him from office, and to appoint some suitable person to complete the roll; and in Wolfe v. Murphy, this court assumed, without expressly deciding, that the effect of the Act of 1878 was to authorize the board to declare the office vacant pro tempore, and to appoint an incumbent. The provisions of the statute authorizing boards of supervisors to appoint a suitable person to make the assessment when the assessor has failed to discharge his duty, and conferring power on the sheriff to add persons or property to the roll which have been omitted by the assessor, are widely different in their scope, purpose, and effect from the scheme provided by chapter 126 of the Code in relation to the state revenue agent. They are provisions to meet emergencies, and displace as little of the machinery by which a general and uniform plan of assessment is carried on throughout the state as is possible. They substitute one local officer for another, and in case of the appointed assessor, at least, the duties he performs are precisely those which should have been performed by the assessor, and are subject to the same supervision by the board of supervisors. But chapter 126 of the Code displaces the whole scheme of taxation. It substitutes a state officer provided for by law for the local officer designated by the constitution. All idea of equality and uniformity of taxation, and of assessment of property "under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value," is abandoned, and the discretion of the officer is the limit of his power. Every judgment of every board of supervisors since the year 1886 is, in effect, nullified. Any citizen whose horse or cow or land or other property has been assessed in all these years, and who has paid his taxes according to such assessment, is subject to be proceeded against by the agent. It is indeed, the imperative duty of the officer to proceed in all cases which, in his opinion, the valuation of property, as fixed by the taxpayer and the assessor and approved by the supervisors, was too little. Never before in the history of this state have such onerous duties been imposed upon, or such unlimited power vested in, a single person. We have said that all idea of equality and uniformity of taxation is abandoned. This is true, if the scheme is in its nature such that its practical operation must be effectual only in exceptional instances; for, if this be true, the law, though in form, is not in effect, a general law, prescribing uniform rules for the assessment of property of all the citizens of the state. If the approval of values, as they have been fixed by the authorities charged with that duty, on all the rolls since the year 1886, could be nullified by the legislature, it would yet be necessary that any scheme in which no provision is made for preserving uniformity and equality of taxation would violate the constitutional provisions by which such equality and uniformity is declared. Now, if the revenue agent may proceed against any taxpayer, whose property, in his opinion, has been undervalued, he must do so, unless his arbitrary discretion may be substituted for the legislative will. Nor can he proceed against one and refuse to proceed against another standing in the same condition. But the agent cannot determine whether property has been undervalued in former years unless he shall and can inform himself of its then condition and value, and this, being a matter of fact, must be decided upon by some sort of evidence. No provision is, however, made for the investigation and decision of this preliminary fact, and the proceeding, when instituted, must rest upon the mere un-instructed discretion of the officer. The question of value is one of the most difficult of solution in the administration of the law. One man may value an article at one price, and another at another, and all be equally honest in their action; but it is also a relative question, for the value of one horse or cow or tract of land is largely determinable by the value of other horses and cows and lands at the same time and place. When the agent proceeds to re-examine the value of property assessed in years past, no just conclusion could be reached without consideration of the property of others assessed on the same roll. If the valuation of the property of one man is increased, so, also, must be that of every other man, if it has been undervalued; otherwise, the principle of uniformity and equality is departed from. It is to be remembered that, in all the assessments which are reopened by the law under consideration, the boards of supervisors had been charged with the duty of examining and equalizing the rolls; and if this was done, as must be presumed, any action by the revenue agent in changing one assessment would disturb the uniformity and equality of the burden, unless his jurisdiction may be considered as a revisory one, and his finding of the fact of undervaluation of particular property be considered as a judicial determination that all other property appearing thereon had been assessed at its true value. It has long since been decided in this state that it is not within the legislative power to provide by retroactive legislation for the reopening of judgments final in their nature, and under which rights had become vested. Hooker v. Hooker, 10 Smedes & M. 599. A fortiori, can it not annul them by a mere legislative declaration?

When we consider the duty and power of the agent to collect taxes on property which has escaped taxation, the provisions of the law are found yet more objectionable. As to such property, the agent, without notice to the taxpayer, and without giving him an opportunity to be heard, determines that certain property, of a certain valuation, should be assessed against a particular person. He thereupon notifies the collector to place such property on the roll, and having given the owner ten days' notice of his action, may, in default of payment of the tax claimed, proceed by suit to recover the amount. It is true the act calls this an "assessment," but it is not such in fact. No opportunity to be heard in reference to the assessment is afforded to the citizen. His first information is that his property has been assessed by the ex parte act of the agent, and a liability fixed upon him, upon which suit will be brought unless immediate payment is made. He must, it is true, be summoned to defend the suit at law, and may then disprove the legality of the assessment, which becomes final against him only upon full hearing before the court. But the question is, not whether the assessment is conclusive against the citizen when the suit is brought, but it is whether he may be subjected to a suit at all unless a tax is due by him at the time, and whether a tax is ever due until assessment is duly made, in conformity to the constitution. Either what the agent does before suit brought is an assessment of the property, fixing liability for its taxes, which liability is the foundation and support of the suit at law, or there is no assessment at all preceding the suit; and the anomaly is presented of an action on a nonexistent cause of action, with power in the plaintiff to create, pending the action, the right of action on which the suit rests.

We are not certain that we appreciate the precise position of counsel. The assumption runs throughout their briefs that a person owning property which has not been assessed is a delinquent, who cannot complain of any legislation having for its purpose the taxation of the property. Counsel do not expressly declare that such persons are not entitled to the protection of the constitution, but they suggest that, having failed to obey the law by giving in their property for taxation when all other property was assessed, such delinquents should be left to be dealt with at the discretion of the legislature. But the fact that such persons may have violated the law, either by neglecting or willfully refusing to return their property for taxation, is no reason why constitutional safeguards provided for the protection of all classes should be destroyed or ignored. The question is not one of policy, but of power; and, if it is competent for the legislature to dispense with an assessment of property as to one class, it would be equally within its power to dispense with it for any or all other classes. It is not too much to say that, if it were possible for one man to perform the duties of the office of revenue agent according to the provisions of the Code, there are not enough courts in all the states to determine in a lifetime the suits which would be brought in one year. But it is obvious that no purpose is disclosed of preserving the rule of uniformity and equality prescribed by the constitution. The evident purpose is to vest power in the agent to sue in the most flagrant instances of undervaluation of property heretofore taxed, or of non-assessment. Each case stands separate and distinct from each other, and, in lieu of the local agencies provided by the constitution, with local tribunals for equalization of values, the scheme of the act is to vest unlimited power and discretion in a state officer, with a trial by jury in each suit to finally settle the question of valuation. This is a total departure from the scheme of the constitution, and it is therefore invalid.

The judgment is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Rosa FLEMING

PITTSBURGH, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO
& ST. LOUIS R. CO., Appt.

No presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company arises from injury to a passenger by the fall upon a train of a rock which became detached from the natural hillside more than 300 feet from the top of the cut through which the railroad ran.

(October 30, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Washington County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's daughter while a passenger in the defendant's cars, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. M. Todd and E. Y. Breck, for appellant:

Where a passenger is injured, either by anything done or omitted by the carrier, its employees or anything connected with the appliances of transportation, the burden of proof is upon the carrier to show that such injury was in no way the result of its negligence. But to throw this burden upon the carrier, it must first be shown that the injury complained of resulted from the breaking of machinery, collision, derailment of cars, or something improper or unsafe in the conduct of the business or in the appliances of transportation.

The plaintiff did not show anything done or omitted to be done by the carrier or its employees, causing the accident; there was no "breaking of machinery, collision, derailment of cars, or something improper or unsafe in the conduct of the business or in the appliances of transportation," and if a nonsuit had been asked for it must have been granted.

Mr. M. L. A. McCracken, for appellee:

NOTE.—The limitation in the above case of the presumption of negligence on the part of a carrier when a passenger is injured is an interesting addition to the subject as very fully shown in Barnow—23 L. R. A.

The mere happening of an injurious accident raises prima facie a presumption of neglect and throws upon the carrier the onus of showing it did not exist.

Laing v. Colder, 8 Pa. 482, 49 Am. Dec. 533.

When a passenger in a railroad train is injured without fault on his part, the law presumes negligence in the carrier, and the burden is on the carrier to disprove the plaintiff's prima facie case.

Little Schuylkill Nav. & R. Coal Co. v. Norton, 24 Pa. 469, 64 Am. Dec. 672; Meier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 64 Pa. 226, 8 Am. Rep. 581; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Anderson, 94 Pa. 351, 39 Am. Rep. 787.

In Sullivan v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 30 Pa. 284, 72 Am. Dec. 608, this court held, there was "something improper or unsafe in the conduct of the business or in the appliances of transportation;" and that "something" was a cow that had wandered onto the track.

In Spear v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 119 Pa. 61, there was an explosion of some foreign substance on a steamboat owned and operated by the railroad, by which the plaintiff's husband was killed. The explosion was in no way connected with the boilers or any part of the machinery of the boat. The supreme court says: "The evidence of the plaintiff, with the legal presumption arising therefrom, made a case of negligence on which the plaintiff was entitled to recover when her case closed."

This question has recently been determined in plaintiff's favor by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Gleason v. Virginia Midland R. Co. 140 U. S. 435, 35 L. ed. 459.

It is no defense that the stone which killed the plaintiff's daughter came from a point on the hill which did not belong to the defendant, and in which it had no right of possession.

Gates v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 16 L. R. A. 554, 150 Pa. 53.

The plaintiff having made out a prima facie case, it could not be taken from the jury.

ski v. Helson (Mich.) 15 L. R. A. 33, and note, with the later case of Spellman v. Lincoln Rapid Transit Co. (Neb.) 20 L. R. A. 316.

Thompson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first two assignments of error are based upon the refusal of the learned judge to charge as follows: First. "The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the death of her daughter was caused by the defendant; and, under the circumstances of the present case, the burden resting on the plaintiff is not satisfied by the mere presumption of negligence which sometimes arises against the carrying company when a passenger is killed or injured." Second. "Under the circumstances of the present case, the burden of proof is not shifted from the plaintiff by the mere fact that her daughter was killed while a passenger on the defendant's railroad; but the plaintiff must show such facts as will connect the defendant, or its servants, or some of the appliances of transportation, with the happening of the injury."

Authority need scarcely be cited that where an injury occurs to a passenger in consequence of something done or not done, connected with the appliances of transportation, there arises the presumption of negligence, which the carrier is required to rebut. This presumption necessarily arises from the contract of carriage, under which the passenger passively trusts himself to the safety of the carrier's means of transportation, and to the skill, diligence, and care of his servants, and by which the carrier, in consideration of the fare, undertakes to carry safely, and, to do so, to furnish the best means and appliances for the purpose, and competent, skillful, and diligent servants. An accident connected with them raises the presumption that they were not such, and that the carrier was guilty of negligence. But if the accident has no connection with the appliances or machinery,—if it is so disconnected with the operation of the business of the carrier as not to involve the safety or sufficiency of the instrumentalities, or the negligence of his servants,—no such presumption arises, and the burden of proof to show negligence is upon the plaintiff, who avers it. In Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 148 Pa. 183, 15 L. R. A. 416, where the accident occurred to a passenger seated at an open window, who was struck by a missile causing the injury, and where there was no evidence as to how the missile came to be thrown, Mr. Chief Justice Paxson said: "The rule appears to be that, where a passenger is injured, either by anything done or omitted by the carrier, its employes, or anything connected with the appliances of transportation, the burden of proof, is upon the carrier to show that such injury was in no way the result of its negligence. But, to throw its burden upon the carrier, it must first be shown that the injury complained of resulted from the breaking of machinery, collision, derailment of cars, or something improper or unsafe in the conduct of the business, or in the appliances of transportation."

In the present case, it is not shown that the accident was in consequence of a defect in any of the appliances or machinery used, or of the negligence of appellant's employes in 22 L. R. A.

their conduct of the train. It was the result of a rock becoming detached, and falling upon the train, while passing a point where the hill descends precipitously to the track. From it, at the place of the accident, to the top of the hill, is a distance of 456 feet. The cut for the railroad extends upward 33 feet, and above it is the natural hill. The rock which fell started at about 100 feet from the top of the hill, bounded down some 40 feet, struck, again bounded 20 or 30 feet; making four bounds before it struck the train, and caused the death of the appellee's daughter. It is clear that the fall of the rock was in no way connected with the appliances or machinery used in the operation of the road, or the acts of the employes in the conduct of the train, or in the construction of the road, and therefore there is no presumption of negligence on the part of appellants. But appellee contends that the presumption of negligence arises in this case, and in support of her contention cites the following cases: Sullivan v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 30 Pa. 234, 73 Am. Dec. 698. In this case the accident was caused by a cow upon defendant's track; and the opinion indicates that, in the conduct of its business, it was the duty of the company to fence the track, or enforce the owner's obligation to keep his cattle at home. Spear v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 119 Pa. 68. In this case, Mr. Justice Williams says: "The person injured was a passenger. The injury occurred after the carriage had begun, and the cause of the injury was an explosion on the boat which was the vehicle or instrument of carriage, and which was under the exclusive care and control of defendant's servants." Gleason v. Virginia Midland R. Co., 140 U. S. 495, 35 L. ed. 459. In this case, the accident was caused by a landslide in a cut some 15 or 20 feet deep. In the opinion of the court, it is said: "The railroad cut is as much a part of the railroad structure as is the fill. They are both necessary, and both are intended for one result, which is the production of a level track over which the trains may be propelled. The cut is made by the company, no less than the fill; and the banks are not the result of natural causes, but of the direct intervention of the company's work. If it be the duty of the company (as it unquestionably is), in the erection of the fills and the necessary bridges, to so construct them that they shall be reasonably safe, and to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition, no reason can be assigned why the same duty should not exist in regard to the cuts." Thus, the cause of the accident was connected with the construction of the road. The difference between the cases cited and the present one is clear. In them, the cause of the accident was connected with the means and appliances of transportation, and the construction of the road; and, in this, it was disconnected with them.

As the first two assignments of error are sustained, it is not necessary to discuss the others.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania,
Appt.,
v.

Rolla LINN et al.

(158 Pa. 22.)

An indictment is insufficient to charge a common-law nuisance by profane swearing and cursing, unless the profane language is charged to have been uttered in the presence and within the hearing of citizens present, although it is alleged that it occurred on the public streets and highways.

APPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions

NOTE.—Blasphemy and profanity as crimes.

- VI. Constitutionality of statutes.
- VII. English decisions.

I. Definitions.

Blackstone speaks of this offense as "blasphemy against the Almighty" by denying His being or providence, or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour, Christ. 4 Bl. Com. 59.

It is an oral or written reproach maliciously cast upon God, His name, attributes, or religion. 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 78, p. 45.

Every one who publishes any blasphemous document, or who speaks blasphemous words, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Desty, Crim. L. § 118, p. 308.

In Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 203, Shaw, Ch. J., defined blasphemy as consisting in blaspheming the holy name of God, by denying, cursing or contumeliously reproaching God, His creation, government or final judging of the world; and this may be done by language orally uttered, which would not be a libel; but is none the less blasphemy, if the same thing be done by language written, printed, and published, although when done in this form it also constitutes the offense of libel.

It has been described as consisting in speaking evil of the Deity with an impious purpose to derogate from the Divine Majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God. Com. v. Kneeland, supra.

Purposely using words concerning God, calculated and designed to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to Him, as the intelligent creator, governor and judge of the world, constitute the offense. Ibid.

It embraces the idea of detraction, when used towards the Supreme Being, as "calumny" usually carries the same idea, when applied to an individual. Ibid.

It is a willful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence of God, by denying His existence, or His attributes as an intelligent creator, governor and judge of men, and to prevent their having confidence in Him, as such. Ibid.

Blasphemy, according to the most precise definitions, consists in maliciously reviling God or religion. Bell's Case, 6 City Hall Rec. 38.

To it may be referred all profane scoffing at the Holy Scripture or exposing it to contempt and ridicule. 4 Bl. Com. 59.

Profanity in its nature is a form of blasphemy; any words which amount to an imprecation of divine vengeance constitute the offense.

See further hereon, the statutes of the different states, infra.

II. Indictable at common law.

Whatever amounts to a public wrong may be made the subject of an indictment. Respublica v. Teischer, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 385, 1 L. ed. 163.

By the common law, blasphemy against the Deity in general, or a malicious and wanton attack against the Christian religion individually, for the purpose of exposing its doctrines to contempt and ridicule, is indictable and punishable as a temporal offense. State v. Chandler, 2 Harr. (Del.) 553; Rex v. Taylor, 1 Vent. 293; Rex v. Carlile, 3 Barn. & Ald. 181; Atty-Gen. v. Pearson, 3 Meriv. 352; Rex v. Waddington, 1 Barn. & C. 26; Rex v. Woolston, 2 Strange, 334; Rex v. Clendon, cited in 2 Strange, 790; Andrew v. New York Bible & Prayer Book Soc. 4 Sandf. 155.

Wicked and malicious words, writings, and actions which go to vilify the gospels, continue, as at common law, to be an offense against the public peace and safety. People v. Ruggles, 8 Johns. 290, 5 Am. Dec. 335.

The public use of profane and blasphemous language, in the presence and hearing of divers persons is as indictable offense. State v. Steele, 8 Heisk. 135.

As tending not only to a disturbance of the peace and to corrupt the morals of the community, but also to undermine the foundations of Christianity, which is justly regarded in a certain sense as a part of the common law of the land. Goree v. State, 71 Ala. 7.

So public profane swearing, as well as blasphemy, was an indictable offense at the common law, but it must take such form and be uttered under such circumstances as will constitute a public nuisance, the mere utterance of a single profane word not being sufficient to constitute an offense punishable by indictment provided it be not loud or with repetitions. Ibid.

Where the indictment charged the defendant with the unlawful, wicked, and scandalous use of vulgar, obscene, and indecent language in a certain large assembly and in the hearing of said assembly, the court held the offense constituted a misdemeanor at common law. State v. Appling, 25 Mo. 315, 69 Am. Dec. 469.

But the single utterance of a profane word is not per se indictable, if it be not spoken, at least, with a loud voice, nor with repetitions. Goree v. State, supra.

To be indictable, profanity should take such form, and be uttered under such circumstances, as to constitute a public nuisance. Ibid.; Ex parte Delaney, 43 Cal. 478, where the use of profane language was prohibited by a city ordinance.

The acts should be so repeated and public as to amount to an annoyance and inconvenience to the public and in the nature of such nuisance. State v. Jones, 31 N. C. 39; State v. Ellar, 12 N. C. 267; State v. Graham, 3 Sneed, 134; State v. Steele, 3 Heisk. 137.

If three or four persons be present and hear the words uttered there is sufficient evidence of guilt. Goree v. State, supra.

The use of vulgar, indecent, and obscene words in public is an offense at common law, being against good morals and public decency. State v. Appling, 25 Mo. 315, 69 Am. Dec. 469.

Where defendant was charged with uttering grossly obscene language "in public and in the hearing of divers citizens" the court held that the uttering in public of obscene words was indictable as it was a violation of public decency and good morals. Bell v. State, 1 Swan, 42.

Where the defendant caused a large collection of people in the streets by reason of loud and indecent language the court held him indictable as for a common nuisance. Barker v. Com. 19 Pa. 412.

of the Peace for Clarion County in favor of defendants upon an indictment for alleged profane swearing. Affirmed.

The indictment originally contained three counts. The first charged a riot. Upon this the defendants were acquitted. The second count charged an affray and threats, but was ignored by the grand jury. The third count was as follows:

So where the defendant was charged with the continued and public use of profane oaths and the frequent loud repetition thereof for the space of five minutes the court held the offense indictable as a common nuisance. State v. Chrisp, 85 N. C. 528, 39 Am. Rep. 713.

Although profane swearing of itself, and independent of the disturbance and injury which it may produce to those who hear it, may not form the subject of an indictment, though cognizable before a justice of the peace, under the Act of 1741, chap. 14, yet where charged as a nuisance it is indictable. State v. Kirby, 5 N. C. 254.

So where the defendant was charged that he "did in the public streets . . . profanely curse and swear, and take the name of God in vain to the evil example, etc., and to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the state," the court found an indictable offense even though, under the Act of 1741, the justices of the peace had power to punish summarily. State v. Ellar, 12 N. C. 287.

Where a municipal body were empowered to prohibit or suppress anything tending to hurt good morals or public decency, it was held that they had power to punish the use and utterance of profane language, no matter whether its utterance was frequent or one isolated case. Ex parte Delaney, 43 Cal. 478.

III. Constitution of the offenses.

Christianity, in its enlarged sense, as a religion revealed and taught in the Bible, is not unknown to our law. Kent, Ch. J., in People v. Ruggles, 8 Johns. 230, 5 Am. Dec. 385.

The common law, regarding Christianity as part of the law of the land, respects and protects its institutions and assumes likewise to regulate the public morals and decency of the community. Bell v. State, 1 Swan, 42.

The common law is the guardian of the morals of the people, and their protection against offenses notoriously against public decency and good morals. Grisham v. State, 2 Yerg. 589.

So far as enforcing the provisions of the law is concerned the offense is considered as committed against man as being against society and tending to disturb the public peace. State v. Chandler, 2 Harr. (Del.) 558.

And as to the constitution of the offense of blasphemy, it matters not whether there be a written or an oral publication of the words used. Ibid.; People v. Ruggles, supra; Rex v. Taylor, 3 Keb. 607; Rex v. Atwood, Cro. Jac. 421.

The gist of the offense is the gross violation of good morals and public decency. Bell v. State, 1 Swan, 42.

It is the speaking of the words "profanely." Com. v. Spratt, 14 Phila. 385.

The gravamen of the offense of using profane, obscene, and blasphemous language is in its being a public or common nuisance, and the averment of the common nuisance is essential. Young v. State, 10 Lea, 165; Com. v. Spratt, supra.

The law does not look to the language alone, but to the ideas of which that language is the intelligible expression. Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 208.

Where the words are spoken in a wanton manner, and import a wicked and malicious disposition, and not a serious discussion upon any controverted 22 L. R. A.

"The grand inquest of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that Rolla Linn, late of said county, yeoman, Daniel Linn, late of said county, yeoman, being evil-disposed persons, on the day and year aforesaid, and divers other times, as well before as since, at the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did, on the point in religion, they are blasphemous in a legal sense. Bell's Case, 6 City Hall Rec. 83.

To revile with malicious and blasphemous contempt, the religion professed by almost the whole community, is an abuse of the right of free, equal, and undisturbed enjoyment of religious opinion, and of free and decent discussions on religious subjects. Ibid.

If the blasphemous words were not heard by any person, no crime has been committed. People v. Porter, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 14.

A person cannot be convicted of the crime of blasphemy on his own confession, made out of court, without first proving a crime committed, or giving testimony in addition to the confession, from which the court and jury can legally infer that the offense has been committed by some one. Ibid.

It has been held, under the Massachusetts statute, that the willful denial of God, His creation or government, or final judging of the world with the intent to disparage and calumniate Him and destroy and impair the reverence due to Him, constitute the crime of blasphemy. Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 208.

So cursing and contumeliously reproaching God have been held blasphemy under the same statute. Ibid.

The offense intended to be prohibited is the willful denial with the intent and purpose to impair and destroy the reverence due to Him. Ibid.

Where the words used amounted to imprecations of future Divine vengeance they were held to be profane and within the Connecticut statute. Holcomb v. Cornish, 8 Conn. 375.

In Updegraph v. Com., 11 Serg. & R. 394, where the defendant stated that "the Holy Scriptures were a mere fable; that they were a contradiction, and that, although they contained a number of good things, yet they contained a great many lies,"—the court held that to maliciously vilify the Christian religion was an indictable offense, Christianity being part of the common law of Pennsylvania.

The principles declared in the above case were approved of and sustained in Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 138, 11 L. ed. 205, 234, and Zeisweiss v. James, 63 Pa. 465, 8 Am. Rep. 558.

Where the indictment charged the defendant with wickedly, maliciously, and blasphemously uttering, in the presence and hearing of divers good and Christian people, the words "Jesus Christ was a bastard and his mother must be a whore," the court held the offense blasphemy not only in a popular but in a legal sense by the common law of the state. People v. Ruggles, 8 Johns. 230, 5 Am. Dec. 385.

So in State v. Chandler, 2 Harr. (Del.) 558, where the indictment charged the defendant with the public and malicious proclamation of similar words with the intent thereby to vilify the Christian religion, and blaspheme God, the court held the offense blasphemy.

But where the indictment charged the offense in the speaking of words even more profane, the court held that the proving of the admission of the making of the statement to a witness was not sufficient to establish the charge. People v. Porter, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 14.

public streets and highways, profanely curse and swear, and take the name of God in vain, to the evil example and to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, and contrary to the form of the act of assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Profane swearing is irreligious beyond doubt. State v. Powell, 70 N. C. 67.

If loud and continued it may constitute a nuisance. State v. Powell, Id. 68.

The use of the name of the Deity is not absolutely necessary to constitute profanity. Gaines v. State, 7 Lea, 410, 40 Am. Rep. 64.

Any words importing an imprecation of divine vengeance or implying divine condemnation, so used as to constitute a public nuisance, will be sufficient. Ibid.

The act must be of such a nature as tends to annoy good citizens, and does in fact annoy such of them as are present and not favoring it. Com. v. Harris, 101 Mass. 29.

Profanity is indictable when it becomes a public nuisance. Gaines v. State, supra; State v. Graham, 3 Sneed, 184; State v. Steele, 3 Heisk. 185.

The peace may have been disturbed by loud talk alone, but the peace may be disturbed by the use of profane language. So held in Topeka v. Heitman, 47 Kan. 739, where the defendant was indicted under section 22 of Ordinance 861, with disturbing the peace of the city.

Whenever, upon a trial under a sufficient indictment, there is evidence that the swearing or profane language was a nuisance to the public, the offense is made out. Gaines v. State, supra.

The fact that there are persons present who encourage and countenance the illegal act makes no difference in the illegality of the act. Com. v. Harris, supra.

Neither does the fact that such words were spoken while the defendant was drunk, make any excuse, but rather aggravates the offense. People v. Porter, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 14.

The single utterance of a profane oath, not repeated nor in a loud voice, has been held not to be ordinarily indictable per se. Gaines v. State, 7 Lea, 410, 40 Am. Rep. 64; Young v. State, 10 Lea, 165.

A single oath, however, might by its terms, its tone, or manner, constitute, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, a nuisance. Gaines v. State, supra; State v. Graham, 3 Sneed, 184; Young v. State, supra.

So the use of profane and vulgar language does not per se constitute an indictable offense, but only when so publicly indulged in and so long continued, or often repeated, as to become annoying and hurtful to the community. State v. Brewington, 84 N. C. 733.

Whether it was or not is a question for the jury to consider under the charge. Young v. State, supra.

Where the words charged were only uttered once in the hearing of any other person than the prosecutor, the court held there was no offense. Gaines v. State, supra.

The utterance could not be a nuisance unless it was in the presence of other persons, whose presence makes any place for the occasion public. Young v. State, 10 Lea, 165; Hackney v. State, 8 Ind. 484.

In Com. v. Murray, 14 Gray, 397, where the prisoner was indicted for being an idle and disorderly person, the court allowed evidence of the habitual use of profane language as evidence of disorderly conduct, as profaneness was a violation of law and contrary to the good order of society.

Messrs. G. G. Sloan, District Attorney, W. L. Corbett and Weidner & Geary, for appellant:

While we have not been able to find a case decided by the supreme court of this commonwealth where the same words were held to be indictable, yet we find a number of analogous cases where indictments have been held good

Where the defendant applied abusive language to a police constable using profane language, which could be heard at a distance, and thereby collected a crowd some of whom encouraged him, the court held it sufficient to support a conviction. Com. v. Harris, 101 Mass. 29.

Where the indictment charged the defendants with "openly and publicly speaking with a loud voice, in the hearing of the citizens, etc., wicked, scandalous, and infamous words, representing men and women in obscene and indecent positions and attitudes," the court held that if the language was addressed to the public, in a public place, and the intent and manifest tendency of it was to debauch and corrupt the public morals, the offense was complete as a misdemeanor or common nuisance. Barker v. Com., 19 Pa. 412.

So the words "God damn you" and "You are a God damned liar" have been held to come within the provisions of the Pennsylvania Statute of April, 1794. Com. v. Hardy, 1 Ashm. 410.

In a prosecution under sections 61-68 of 1 Rev. Stat. of New York, the court held that in the case of a single conviction more than three days' imprisonment could not be inflicted even though there were several distinct offenses but one single conviction. Foland v. Johnson, 16 Abb. Pr. 235.

IV. The indictment.

The indictment must charge the act as being done in the presence or hearing of some one, merely to aver that it is done "publicly" is not sufficient. Goree v. State, 71 Ala. 7.

In order to support a conviction, the indictment must charge the words to have been spoken "profanely." Updegraph v. Com., 11 Serg. & R. 394.

It must aver every material constituent of the offense charged, time and venue only excepted, and any defect therein will not be obviated by sections 4785, 4793, of the Code. Goree v. State, supra; Smith v. State, 63 Ala. 55; Noles v. State, 24 Ala. 672.

The mere fact that the indictment charges that the acts were done, "to the common nuisance of all the good citizens of the state" will not be sufficient unless the acts amount in law to a nuisance. State v. Jones, 31 N. C. 39.

The averment of a common or public nuisance is necessary. Robinson v. State (Tenn.) Sept. Term, 1880, cited in Gaines v. State, 7 Lea, 410; State v. Jones, supra.

And the whole fact must be specially set forth with certainty in order that the court may see, judicially, that it rests on sufficient grounds. State v. Jones, supra.

Where the indictment charged that the defendant with force and arms did publicly curse and swear and take the name of Almighty God in vain, for a long time, to wit: for the space of two hours, to the common nuisance of all the citizens of the state, and against the peace and dignity of the state, it was held insufficient to support a conviction. Ibid.

The indictment must charge the utterance to have been in the presence of divers persons, and so proved in order to create a nuisance by profane swearing, the mere general allegation ad commune nocumentum being insufficient. State v. Pepper, 68 N. C. 250, 12 Am. Rep. 667.

An indictment which charged that the defendfor offenses less heinous in their nature and less offensive to public morals and decency.

See Respublica v. Teischer, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 335, 1 L. ed. 163; Com. v. Taylor, 5 Binn. 276; Rex v. Hood, Sayer, 161; Com. v. Sharpless, 2 Serg. & R. 91, 7 Am. Rep. 632; Com. v. Spratt, 14 Phila. 365; Barker v. Com. 19 Pa. 412.

Public swearing is a nuisance at common law, but to be indictable it must be in a public place and an annoyance to the public.

State v. Jones, 31 N. C. 38.

Profane swearing in a public place and in the hearing of citizens, continued for five minutes, although only on a single occasion, is an indictable nuisance at common law.

State v. Christ, 65 N. C. 528, 39 Am. Rep. 713.

and did "profanely curse and swear, and take the name of Almighty God in vain," etc., "to the common nuisance" is not sufficient. State v. Powell, 70 N. C. 67.

All the facts and circumstances which go to make up the offense must be specifically charged. State v. Brewington, 84 N. C. 733.

The setting out of so much of the conversation or words uttered as clearly describes the language used is sufficient to support a conviction without the setting forth of the whole. State v. Steele, 3 Heisk. 135.

In Walton v. State, 64 Mich. 207, however, the court held that the profane language must be set out.

The averment that the words were uttered "in a public place" to the common nuisance of the citizens is sufficient. Young v. State, 10 Lea, 165; State v. Graham, 3 Sneed, 134; State v. Steele, supra; Gaines v. State, 7 Lea, 410, 40 Am. Rep. 64.

So the words "in public and in the hearing of divers citizens," have been held a sufficient averment. Bell v. State, 1 Swan, 42; Young v. State, supra.

Ar. indictment in the usual form would be good, under which the offense must be made out by the proof. Young v. State, supra; State v. Odum, 2 Lea, 220.

Where the indictment charged the defendant with uttering a profane oath "in a public place, in the presence of divers good citizens, and to the common nuisance" it was held good. Gaines v. State, supra.

The mere omission of the allegation that the words were uttered in the presence of divers good citizens, will not invalidate an indictment otherwise good, the omissions being supplied by other averments. Gaines v. State, 7 Lea, 410, 40 Am. Rep. 64.

An indictment charging that the defendant did "publicly use profane and blasphemous and obscene language in the hearing of divers citizens so as to become a nuisance," setting out the words used, is good and will support a conviction. Young v. State, 10 Lea, 165.

Where the indictment charged that the defendant "did profanely curse," without setting forth the curses verbatim et literaliter, without objection at the trial, the court refused to disturb the conviction. State v. Freeman, 63 Vt. 496.

In State v. Batliff, 10 Ark. 530, where the defendant was charged with disturbing a religious congregation by profane swearing, the court held that had the indictment been for profanely swearing it would have been necessary to set out the words used charging them to have been uttered publicly, or else with the usual averments of time and place, to charge that he "publicly did profanely swear, etc., by taking the name of God in vain," etc.

Where the indictment charged the use of vulgar and indecent language within the hearing of children, in a loud and boisterous manner, willfully and unlawfully, contrary to section 415 of the California Penal Code, the court held that the language used need not be recited and also that the offense was complete whether used in the streets of an incorporated or other town. Ex parte Foley, 62 Cal. 303.

In an action against a justice for assault and battery the justice pleaded that the plaintiff was fined for "profanely swearing three several oaths by taking the name of God in vain," the court held that the description of the offense was enough. Odell v. Garnett, 4 Blackf. 549.

The complaint which charges the act as being done to "the great damage and common nuisance of all the citizens of the commonwealth there inhabiting, being, and residing" is good. Com. v. Harris, 101 Mass. 29; Com. v. Oaks, 113 Mass. 8; Com. v. Sweeney, 181 Mass. 379.

Where the indictment charged the prisoner with uttering a libel in scandalous, profane, and blasphemous words, matters, and things of and concerning God, Jesus Christ, and the final judging of the world by God, and concerning the Holy Scriptures, in words following: "Universalists believe in a God which I do not; but believe that their God, with all his moral attributes (aside from nature itself) is nothing more than a mere chimeria of their own imagination," the court held that whether the words were used with such unlawful intent and purpose, was a question upon the whole indictment and all the circumstances, and after verdict, if no evidence was erroneously admitted or rejected, and no incorrect directions in matter of law were given, it was to be taken as proved, that the language used in the sense, and under the circumstances, and with the intent and purpose, laid in the indictment so as to bring the act within the statute. Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Mass. 206.

The word "deny" need not be used in the commission of the offense; any words equivalent in meaning, used with the same purpose and design, must be deemed to have the same legal effect. Ibid.

Where the indictment charged defendants with, inter alia, a "disturbance of divers citizens" by noises in the public streets against good morals, and the peace, the court held the offense was not properly set out, and that the act merely constituted a nuisance and ought to have been alleged as such, to the great damage and common nuisance, etc. Com. v. Smith, 6 Cush. 80; Com. v. Boon, 2 Gray, 74.

The Massachusetts statute marks out two modes of willful blasphemy and the court has held that a general averment alleging blasphemy in both these ways, the language amounting to a denial of God, His creation, etc., but not to a contumelious reproach, or on the contrary amounting to the latter but not the former, it is sufficient, on account of the substantive charge of willfully blaspheming. Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 206.

Where the defendant was indicted for profane swearing using the same oath thirty-three times in one day the court held that there need not be a separate charge and conviction upon each oath, one conviction was sufficient. Johnson v. Barclay, 16 N. J. L. 1.

Where objection was taken upon the ground that the information did not show that the words were spoken profanely, the court held that it was sufficient to show that if the words were so used or spoken in connection with other words in the ordinary course of argument or conversation, then the informant had committed perjury, profane oaths and rational conversation being different things

It is not necessary that the language used should be heard by a large portion of the community; it is sufficient if three or four persons were present and heard the words uttered.

Gore v. State, 71 Ala. 7.

The words used need not be set forth in the indictment.

Ex parte Foley, 62 Cal. 508; State v. Ratliff, 10 Ark. 580; Barker v. Com. supra.

not requiring judicial skill to distinguish the one from the other. Ibid.

Where the indictment charged the use of profane and vulgar language on a given and divers other days and times both before and since that day, in a certain public street and highway, and in the presence and hearing of divers persons then and there and on the said other days and times assembled, and with the repetition thereof, to the evil example and common nuisance of all good citizens, the court held it sufficient. State v. Brewington, 84 N. C. 788.

In Pennsylvania, in a prosecution under the Act of 1700 against blasphemy, the court has held that the mere laying of the substance of the words is not sufficient, they must be set forth themselves. Updegraph v. Com. 11 Serg. & R. 364.

Where the indictment charged the defendant with, inter alia, contriving and intending the morals as well of youth as of divers other citizens of this commonwealth to debauch and corrupt, and that he did openly and publicly with a loud voice in the public highways wicked, scandalous, and infamous words utter in the hearing of citizens, to the common nuisance of all good citizens, etc.—the court held it sufficient. Com. v. Mohn, 52 Pa. 243, 51 Am. Dec. 153.

When the indictment charged that the defendant did by reason of an unlawful assembly at a certain public place and then and there in the hearing of divers good citizens of the state then and there assembled, unlawfully and profanely and with a loud voice, curse, swear, and quarrel thereby breaking up a singing school, to the great damage and common nuisance of the good citizens of the state, and against the peace and dignity of the state, the court held the indictment not sustainable as a common nuisance as the offense must be such as to cause inconvenience and become so troublesome as to annoy the whole community, and not any specific persons. State v. Baldwin, 18 N. C. 186.

V. State statutes.

Profanity in the presence of a judge or justice is punishable in a summary way by fine, under section 1861 of the Digest of Statutes of Arkansas, ed. 1884, p. 426; section 103 of the Connecticut Statute; § 689, Gen. Stat. ed. 1888, p. 169; § 36, Code of Dakota; Delaware, Laws of 1893, § 14, p. 733; Kentucky, Stat. ed. 1888, § 8, p. 426; Public General Laws of Maryland, vol. 1, § 19, art. 27; N. J. Rev. Stat. ed. 1877, § 14, p. 1229; Tennessee Code, ed. 1884, §§ 2291, 2293; Vermont Rev. Laws, ed. 1880, § 4253.

Article 10, section 4081, of the Alabama Criminal Code provides for the punishment by fine and imprisonment with or without hard labor, of any person who enters, or goes sufficiently near a dwelling-house and in the presence or hearing of the family of the occupant or any member thereof; or of any person who uses abusive, insulting, or obscene language in the presence or hearing of any female.

By section 507 of the Revised Statutes of Arizona, page 713, it is a misdemeanor to willfully disturb or disquiet any religious assemblage by profane discourse or unnecessary noise.

Messrs. John W. Reed and Harry R. Wilson, for appellees:

Common nuisances are a species of offenses against the public order and economical regimen of the state; being either the doing of a thing to the annoyance of all the king's subjects, or the neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires.

4 Bl. Com. 167.

page 714, makes it an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment to use obscene or vulgar language in the presence or hearing of any woman or child in any public place, or to use the same to a woman or child or to another in their presence.

Section 18415, of the Penal Code of California, (§ 415) Hittell's ed. page 1257, relates inter alia to persons maliciously and willfully disturbing the peace or quiet of any neighborhood, family, or person, by loud and unusual noise or by tumultuous or offensive conduct.

By section 1372, of the Criminal Code of Colorado, Mills' Anno. Stat., page 945, ed. 1881, any person disturbing public worship by reason of, inter alia, profane swearing or vulgar language, is guilty of a high misdemeanor punishable by fine.

By section 1596 of the Connecticut General Statutes, ed. 1888, page 844, every person who blasphemes against God, either of the persons of the Holy Trinity, the Christian religion or the Holy Scriptures is liable to fine and imprisonment and to be bound over to his good behavior.

And under section 1596, the profane use of an oath, or the wicked cursing of another, is punishable by fine.

The Penal Code of the Dakotas, chapter 4, section 31, page 1141 of Levisse's Code of Dakota, defines blaspheming as consisting "in wantonly uttering or publishing words, casting contumelious reproach or profane ridicule upon God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Holy Scriptures, or the Christian religion.

By section 32 of the same if it appears beyond reasonable doubt that the words complained of were used in the course of serious discussion and with intent to make known or recommend opinions entertained by the accused, such words are not blasphemy.

Section 33 makes blasphemy a misdemeanor.

And section 34 defines profane swearing as consisting in any use of the name of God, or Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, either in imprecating divine vengeance upon the utterer, or any other person, or in light, trifling, or irreverent speech.

Section 35 makes the party guilty thereof punishable by fine.

If such act be committed in the presence and hearing of any justice of the peace, etc., in court, or under circumstances amounting to a violation of public decency, the party may be summarily dealt with. Section 36.

Blasphemy is a misdemeanor under the Laws of Delaware, section 1, chapter 181, page 952, ed. 1893, and punishable by fine and imprisonment in solitary confinement and in the discretion of the court by finding sureties for good behavior.

Any person of the age of discretion profanely cursing or swearing in any public street is punishable by fine under the Revised Statutes of Florida, § 2622, art. 10, title 2, ed. 1892, p. 823.

The nuisance should be described with certainty, according to the circumstances, and with the detail and fullness usual in indictments. Enough must be alleged to identify the act and to show guilt prima facie. Enough must appear to enable the court to see that an indictable nuisance is described; if the thing becomes a nuisance by force of special circumstances, these must be set forth.

Under the Idaho Penal Code, title 10, section 6959, it is a misdemeanor to use any vulgar, profane, or indecent language within the presence or hearing of women or children in a loud and boisterous manner.

Under article 2, section 3, of the Constitution of Illinois of 1870, freedom of worship is guaranteed, but it is provided that this shall not excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the state.

In Indiana, it is provided by section 1999 of Rev. Stat., vol. 1, ed. 1888, that whoever, being over fourteen years of age profanely curses or swears, avers, or imprecates by or in the name of God, Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost, is guilty of profanity, and finable upon conviction.

Where the defendant was charged with disturbing the quiet of the city of Topeka under section 22 of its Ordinance 861, by reason of loud, profane, and indecent language, the court held the offense came within the section which provides that "if any person shall disturb the quiet of the city" he is liable to fine. Topeka v. Heitman, 47 Kan. 739.

Profane cursing in any play, interlude, show, or exhibition is punishable by fine under section 7 of the General Statutes of Kentucky, ed. 1888, page 426. So also is profane cursing and swearing under section 8, each oath being a separate offense.

cursing or contumeliously reproaching the holy word of God contained in the Holy Scriptures, or exposing them to contempt and ridicule, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison or in the jail or by fine and also by being bound over for good behaviour.

And by section 20 whoever, having arrived at years of discretion, profanely curses or swears, is punishable by fine, if prosecuted within twenty days.

The Act of 1782 obviously intended to make a marked distinction between those acts which went to the denial of any God, and those affecting the Christian religion; the former being made unlawful and punishable willfully to blaspheme the holy name of God, by denying God, His creation, government, and final judgment of the world; whereas in the latter, it could only be by cursing or reproaching Jesus Christ, etc., and not by any denial. Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 208.

Under section 9236 of Howell's Annotated Statutes of Michigan, vol. 2, page 2250, any person who willfully blasphemes the holy name of God, by cursing, or contumeliously reproaching God, is punishable by imprisonment or fine.

Pub. Stat. chap. 271, § 1, p. 725.

And under section 2 of the same profane cursing and swearing is punishable.

The Revised Statutes of New Jersey, ed. of 1877, page 1229, provide, section 6, for the punishment by fine of any person or persons profanely swearing and cursing.

The New York laws relating to profanity were repealed by the Session Laws of 1832. This fact would seem to be lost sight of in the last editions of the Revised Statutes by Birdseye (vol. 2, Birds-

VI. Constitutionality of statutes.

Any offense which outrages the feelings of the community, as endangering the peace of the public, may be passed upon by the legislature and prohibited. State v. Chandler, 2 Harr. (Del.) 553.

The Delaware Act of February 8, 1826, relating to blasphemy and its punishment, has been held not to be contrary to the provisions of the constitution of that state or to that of the United States, relating to freedom of worship. Ibid.

It has been held that the Massachusetts statute is not repugnant to the second article of the Declaration of Rights in the constitution of that state which protects every one in the free use of his right and duty to worship God in any form he pleases so long as he does not disturb the peace or obstruct others, as the only intention of such statute is to punish a denial of God, made with a bad intent and in a manner calculated to give just offense. Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 208.

Neither is it in conflict with article 16 of the same relating to the liberty of the press, when applied to printed blasphemy. Ibid.

The object of the 38th article of the Constitution [art. 1, § 3] was not to withdraw religion in general, and with it the best sanction of moral and social obligations from all consideration and notice of the law. Bell's Case, 6 City Hall Rec. 38; People v. Ruggles, 8 Johns. 290, 5 Am. Dec. 335, et supra.

Though the constitution has discarded religious establishments, it does not forbid cognizance of those offenses against religion and morality which have no reference to such establishments, or to any particular form of government, but are punishable because they strike at the root of moral obligation, and weaken the security of the social ties. Bell's Case, supra.

Such article never was meant to break down the common-law barrier against licentious, wanton, and impious attacks upon Christianity itself. Ibid.; People v. Ruggles, supra.

VII. English decisions.

All blasphemies against God, as denying His being or providence; and all contumelious reproaches of Jesus Christ; all profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures, or exposing any part thereof to ridicule; all impostors in religion as falsely pretending to extraordinary commissions from God, and terrifying or abusing with false denunciations of judgments; and all open lewdness grossly scandalous,—inasmuch as they tend to subvert all religion or morality which are the foundations of government, are punishable by the temporal judges with fine and imprisonment, and also such corporal in famous punishment as to the court in its discretion shall seem meet, according to the heinousness of the crime. 8 Burns, *Ecol. Com. v. Slack, 19 Pick. 304; Moore v. Com., 6 Met. 243, 89 Am. Dec. 724; Barker v. Com. supra.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

With an earnest desire to sustain this indictment, if possible, we find ourselves unable to do so. It cannot be sustained under the Crimes Act of 1860, § 80, prohibiting blasphemy, because it does not charge that offense, nor under the Act of 1794, because it is not framed upon that act, nor is any attempt made to bring it within the special proceedings under which the act is executed. It only remains to be considered whether it can be sustained as charging a common-law offense. It cannot be doubted that profane swearing and cursing, in a loud and boisterous tone of voice, and in the presence and hearing of citizens of the commonwealth passing and repassing on the public streets and highways of the commonwealth, to such an extent as to be a common nuisance to all citizens being present, and hearing the same, is an indictable offense at common law. But this indictment omits to charge all or any of these facts and circumstances which are essential to constitute the offense as a common nuisance. It is true the indictment charges that the profane swearing and cursing, and taking the name of God in vain, alleged against the defendants, was "to the evil example and to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the state of Pennsylvania," but it does not aver the facts and circumstances which are necessary to make it a common nuisance. Profane swearing on the streets, not heard by anybody, of course, could not be a common nuisance; and, in fact, it should not only be heard by citizens, but the manner and occasion of the utterance should be of the offensive and annoying character which is necessary to make it a public and common nuisance, as distinguished from a mere private nuisance. The indictment, therefore, must contain an averment of facts sufficient, on its face, to make out the offense charged, within the legal meaning of the offense. In Wharton's American Criminal Law (4th ed. § 2362), it is said: "But an allegation in an indictment that certain facts charged were 'to the common nuisance of all the good citizens of the state' will not make it a good indictment for a common nuisance, unless these facts be of such a nature as may justify that conclusion as one of law as well as of fact." In Barker v. Com., 19 Pa. 412, Lewis, J., said: "If the language be addressed to the public, in a public place, and the intent and manifest tendency of it be to debauch and corrupt the of revealed religion are part of the common law; so that any person reviling, subverting, or ridiculing them may be prosecuted at common law. Chamberlain v. Evans, 2 Burns, Ecol. Law, 207; cited in Updegraph v. Com., 11 Serg. & R. 401; Furneaux's Letters to Sir Wm. Blackstone, Appx. to Bl. Com.

Christianity is part of the common law. Rex v. Woolston, 2 Strange, 620, where defendant was indicted for his blasphemous discourses on the miracles of our Saviour. Rex v. Hall, 1 Strange, 416; Annett's Case, 1 W. Bl. 365.

The common-law being founded on religion. Smith v. Sparrow, 4 Bing. 84, 88.

A general attack upon Christianity is unlawful because Christianity is the established religion of the country. Gathercole's Case, 2 Lew. C. C. 237.

In Gathercole's Case, supra, it was held that a man might attack Judaism, or any sect of the Christian religion except the form established by law.

It is an indictable offense at common law to publish a blasphemous libel of and concerning the Old Testament. Reg. v. Hetherington, 5 Jur. 529.

Swearing was punishable by the spiritual court, before the acts which made them temporal offenses, and in which the jurisdiction of the spiritual court is saved. Rex v. Curl, 2 Strange, 789.

In Atwood's Case, Cro. Jac. 421, the court held that justices of the peace had no jurisdiction over scandalous words defamatory of religion.

Blasphemous words are not only an offense to God and religion, but a crime against the laws, state, and government, and therefore punishable; to say that religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby civil societies are preserved, and that Christianity is parcel of the laws of England, and therefore to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law. Taylor's Case, 1 Vent. 293, 3 Keb. 607, 621.

Where rooms had been rented for the purpose of "(by teaching or advised speaking)" denying the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be divine authority, the court held the purposes illegal as being blasphemous, showing the character of Christ to be defective, his teaching misleading, and the Bible no more inspired than any other book. Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Exch. 230.

In Rex v. Waddington, 1 Barn. & C. 26, it was held that a work containing statements that Jesus Christ was an impostor and a murderer in principle was a libel at common law which had never been affected by statute neither could it be while the Christian religion was the basis of the law.

Any publications which assail and asperse the truth of Christianity in an indecent and malicious spirit, in language calculated and intended to shock the feelings and outrage the belief of mankind, are blasphemous libels. Reg. v. Bradlaugh, 15 Cox. C. C. 217.

Indecent and offensive attacks on Christianity or the Scriptures or sacred persons or objects, calculated to outrage the feelings of the community as a general body, amount to blasphemy and are indictable at common law. Reg. v. Ramsay, 15 Cox. C. C. 281.

In Reg. v. Bradlaugh, supra, it was held that publications which discuss with gravity and decency, in an argumentative way, questions as to Christian doctrine or statements in the Hebrew Scriptures, and even questioning their truth, are not blasphemous so as to be the subject of criminal action.

So the mere denial of the truth of the Christian religion, or of the Scriptures, will not per se constitute blasphemy so as to render the defendant indictable. Reg. v. Ramsay, supra. E. W.

public morals, the offense is complete." In Com. v. Mohn, 52 Pa. 243, 91 Am. Dec. 153, we sustained an indictment charging that the defendant, "intending the morals . . . of citizens of this commonwealth to debauch and corrupt, openly and publicly, . . . in the public highways, wicked, scandalous, and infamous words did utter in the hearing of the citizens of this commonwealth, and to their manifest corruption and subversion, and to the common nuisance," etc. In 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 424, note 2, it is said: "Public swearing is a nuisance at common law, but, to be indictable, it must be in a public place, and an annoyance to the public;" citing many cases. It is the publicity of the offense, and the place in which it is committed, that make it punishable as a common nuisance. Of course, there can be no publicity unless the profane language is uttered in the presence and within the hearing of the citizens present, and this is an essential and an indispensable fact, which must necessarily be charged in the indictment in order to make out a successful allegation of any offense. There is no such language in the third count of this indictment, and we must therefore pronounce it insufficient as a pleading.

Judgment affirmed.

DE BARDELEBEN COAL & IRON CO.

1. An employe engaged in repairing an engine belonging to his employer, and the engineer whose duty it is to prevent the starting of the engine while the repairer is at work, are fellow servants.

2. Negligence in the exercise of superintendence intrusted to an employe within the meaning of Code, § 2590, subsec. 2, does not exist in the case of an engineer whose duty it is personally to operate the engine, although he usually has a helper, where, in the absence of the helper, by the negligence of the engineer in starting the engine, or in failing to prevent a third person from starting it, a person engaged in repairing the engine is killed, since the primary duty of the engineer is not that of superintendence, but that of a laborer.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of defendant in an action brought under Code 1896, § 2589, for damages for negligently causing the death of defendant's employe. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bowman & Harsh and Brickell, Sample & Gunter for appellant.
Mr. Walker Percy for appellee.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is prosecuted by the personal representative of W. A. McKay, deceased, and sounds in damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which, it is insisted, resulted from the negligence of the De Bardeleben Coal & Iron Company. The first count of the complaint avers wrong and negligence on the part of the company itself, under section 2589 of the Code. The other counts are drawn under section 2590 of the Code, and severally present causes of action under subsections 1-4, of that section.

The theory of plaintiff under the first count is that the defendant company was negligent in not providing and maintaining a safe place for McKay, one of its employes, and engaged in the discharge of his duties as such when he was killed, to work in. The evidence is without conflict to the effect that McKay was killed by the movement of the piston of a blowing engine. This engine was one of five located in the same room, and all in charge of an engineer named Gould. It became necessary to repair this engine, and to that end it was stopped. It is also shown that when such engine needed repairs, it was Gould's duty to effectually disconnect it from the steam supply, and then turn it over to the repairer, after which, and while the repairs were in progress, the engineer's further duty was to keep watch upon it, and prevent any interference with it by third parties, but beyond this he had no further concern with it until the repairs were completed, and the engine turned over to him by the repairers. When the engine had been stopped, disconnected from the steam supply, and turned over to the repairers, it was their duty to further secure its inaction either by inserting timbers in the spokes of the fly wheel, which would, to the extent of the strength of the timbers, prevent its revolution, and consequently all movement of the engine, or, by propping the piston rod with a heavy timber, which would prevent its descending (its movement is vertical), and, of consequence, all movement of the machine. These methods are about equally efficacious, and are each intended to guard against any accident by which a connection might be re-established between the boiler and the steam cylinder. In this instance the evidence is without conflict that Gould did all that was required of him in disconnecting the engine from the boiler, and that McKay, before attempting the repairs he was to make, propped the piston rod in the manner indicated.

Notwithstanding all this, however, motion was in some way imparted to the engine, the piston rod descended, crushing the beam of wood intended to support it, and crushed and killed McKay, who was inside of the air cylinder, or blowing tub above the steam cylinder, by drawing after it the iron head of the rod which fills the cylinder or tub. Confessedly this movement could have been imparted to the engine in only one way; that is, by reconnecting the engine with the boilers, and turning on the steam. This was done, the inferences are, either by the engineer, or through the interference of some third person. But for this being done, McKay's place of work was a perfectly safe one, and had been made so by the performance by Gould and McKay on their respective parts of the duties which their employment imposed upon them. The company, in other words, had required these employes to provide a safe place for one of them to work. They had complied with the requirement, and the place of safety had been provided. Certainly, to this point, no corporate negligence appears. That the company had discharged its full duty in this regard is demonstrated by the result reached in the actual existence of the conditions it was under an obligation to create. It was under a further duty to maintain the safety of the place while the work was being done. It, however, was not required to insure absolute safety. Its whole measure of duty was to use all reasonable means to that end which a careful and prudent man would resort to under like circumstances. It was not to be expected that the corporation, even were it capable of direct action, would be present in person, so to speak, for the purpose of looking to the maintenance of the safe conditions it had provided. All that was incumbent upon it was to have a proper agent or servant present for this purpose. It could do no more than this, and this it did in the person of Gould, who was charged with the duty of seeing that the safe conditions in respect of the engine be not interfered with by third persons. Gould being a competent person for this service, the company's full duty was performed in having him there to perform it; and any remission of performance on his part was the negligence, not of the employer, but of a fellow servant of McKay, for which the defendant is not responsible at common law in connection with section 2599 of the Code, and not liable at all, unless, under other counts of the complaint, the evidence brings the case within section 2590 of the Code,—the Employer's Liability Act. The trial court did not err, therefore, in giving the affirmative charge for the defendant, so far as the first count of the complaint is concerned.

It remains to be considered whether the case is brought by the evidence within, or rather whether there is any evidence tending to make a case under, section 2590 of the Code. It is manifest that plaintiff's intestate did not come to his death as a proximate result of having gone into and being in the blowing cylinder or tub. His position, but for supervening negligence or unaccountable accident, was a safe one; and hence there is no merit in the contention that he suffered death in consequence of going or being there by the direction of Boyd, to whose orders he was bound to conform, under subsection 4 of the Statute; and, moreover, had such conformance to Boyd's orders borne the relation of proximate cause to the casualty, there is no evidence whatever that Boyd was negligent in giving the order. These considerations show also the grounds of our conclusion that the case is not brought under subsection 4 of the Act; and it is not insisted that the injury resulted proximately from any defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant of the defendant, within the intent and meaning of subsection 1. The chief contention of appellant is that the evidence tended to prove a case under subsection 2 of section 2590 of the Code, and that, therefore, the court erred in charging affirmatively for the defendant; and our further discussion of the case will be confined to the inquiry whether there is any evidence going to show that McKay's death was caused by reason of the negligence of any person in the service or employment of the master or employer, who had any superintendence intrusted to him, while in the exercise of such superintendence. It is conceded in the outset, for the argument, that the evidence did tend to show that Gould, the engineer, was negligent, either in himself setting the engine in motion, or in failing to prevent some third person setting the engine in motion. There can be no doubt that Gould and McKay were fellow servants of the defendant, or that the common master was not liable to the one for injuries resulting from the negligence of the other, unless that other was negligent while in the exercise of superintendence intrusted to him by the employer. Was any superintendence intrusted to him? We are aware that the eighth section of the English Employer's Liability Act, which contains a definition of the phrase, "person who has superintendence intrusted to him," is not embodied in our statute, which is taken from, or in most respects modeled after, the English statute; and we need not take issue with counsel that this is a pregnant omission, implying an intent on the part of the legislature to make the common master liable whenever the injury complained of by one servant is caused by any person in the service who has any superintendence intrusted to him, whether superintendence be his sole or principal duty or not, and whether or not he is ordinarily engaged in manual labor, provided only that the damifying negligence occurs while such person is in the exercise of whatever superintendence is in fact intrusted to him. Yet neither the incorporation of that part of section 8 to which we have referred into the English statute nor its omission from our own, neither its import in the one nor the implication involved in its omission from the other, did or can exert any influence upon the meaning of the word "superintendence." That word has the same significance in both statutes as had the definition of the expression, "person who has superintendence intrusted to him," never been incorporated in the one or omitted from the other. The definition is not of the word "superintendence" at all, but only of the amount or degree of superintendence which must be intrusted to a person to fill the terms of subsection 2, the abstract quality of superintendence being the same whether it is intrusted to a person in sufficient degree to come within the statute or not. So that we must look elsewhere than to the English statute, or to the fact that the English definition of the phrase, "person who has," etc., has been omitted from our statute for a definition of "superintendence." We find this in Webster's Dictionary: "Superintend: To have or exercise the charge and oversight of; to oversee with the power of direction; to take care of with authority,—as, an officer superintends the building of a ship or the construction of a fort: 'God exercises a superintending care over all his creatures.'"

"Superintendence: . . . The act of superintending; care and oversight for the purpose of direction, and with authority to direct. Synonyms: Inspection; oversight; care; direction; control; guidance." And this in Worcester's Dictionary: "Superintend (L. superintendo; super, over, and intendo, to direct one's attention to; in, to, towards, and tendo, to stretch): To oversee; to overlook; to have the care and direction of." "Superintendence: . . . The act of superintending; oversight; superior care; direction; inspection." The following from the Century Dictionary: "Superintend: To have charge and direction of, as of a school; direct the course and oversee the details of (some work, as the construction of a building or movement, as of an army); regulate with authority; manage." And Roberts & Wallace, in their work on Duty and Liability of Employers, say: "The word 'superintendence' seems properly to imply the exercise of some authority or control over the person or thing subjected to oversight."

. . . Accordingly it may, it is thought, be safely assumed that the person for whose negligence an employer is liable under this subsection (2) must be one to whom he has delegated some of that authority or power of control which he would otherwise himself have exercised." Pages 260, 261. To leave out of view for the moment the fact that Gould, the engineer, had a helper or assistant in the manipulation of these engines, we have simply the case of a man engaged in the manual operation of the machines. With his own hands he started the engines, regulated their revolutions, and stopped them; and all this, even to the number of revolutions per minute, he did at the direction and under the control of persons superior to him in the common employment. His was not the duty of giving, but of obeying directions. He did not draw the attention of others to a thing to be done by them, but himself was required to do whatever was to be done. His care of the engines was not for the purpose of direction, and with authority to direct, but was a care to be effectuated by his own hands. He was not to guide and control others in their operation of the engines, but to control and regulate the engines by the laying on of his own hands. He was not to direct the course and oversee the details of the operation of the machines, but the course was marked out by superior authority, and the details were executed by his personal physical exertion. He had none of that authority or power of control which the employer would otherwise himself have exercised, but all authority in the premises properly belonging to the master was exercised upon him in directing his services as a manual laborer. To say that a man oversees, overlooks, directs, guides, controls, inspects, has a care of, superintends an act which he himself wholly performs, is a contortion of language not to be tolerated. These terms, indeed, are always resorted to, to indicate that the thing done was not manually done by the person spoken of, but at his bidding. Each of these synonyms, and the word "superintendence" itself, must be taken in this ordinary and usual significance here. "Superintendence," in the statute, whatever else it may mean, has no application at all to a person whose sole duty is to be performed by personal acts of manual labor, or any direct bringing to bear of the physical energies to the end in view. It has been said, and is doubtless true in a sense, that the superintendence contemplated by the statute "may be either over men or machinery, plant," etc., but, whether over the one or the other, it must still be superintendence, power of direction, superior care, and control, with authority, as distinguished from direct personal manipulation. And while there may possibly be superintendence of the operation of a machine or a number of machines by one person without intermediate human agency, such a case is most difficult of conception. We are inclined to believe that its possibility even does not exist, and to think that what is really intended by the declaration that there may be superintendence of machinery is that where one has authority to have machinery operated, to direct its operation, to overlook it, etc., and the means at hand in others to carry out his directions, he is superintendent both of the machine to be operated and of the men who are to manipulate it as he directs. This state of facts was brought forward in the argument upon which the declaration referred to was based (Roberts & W. Liability of Employers, p. 262), and we know of no case to the contrary. The case of Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton (Ala.) 12 So. Rep. 88, virtually adopts this view, and the case of Annisston Pipe Works v. Dickey, 93 Ala. 418, is in no sense opposed to it, since this question was not decided, or at all discussed, in that case; but, to the contrary, the existence of superintendency in Calahan, who really only had manual charge of a machine, was only assumed for the purpose of placing the defense on the ground of contributory negligence, of which there was no serious doubt on the evidence. Whether, however, there may possibly be a case of superintendency purely of machinery or not, it is most clear to us that Gould's position involved no such case, dissociated from consideration of the fact that he had a helper, whose duties are shown in the evidence. Whether he had any superintendence intrusted to him, in view of this consideration, is a question not necessary to be decided in this case. If any such superintendency existed in that connection it was not a general superintendency over the helper and the machines, not a general power of having the machines operated as he directed by the hand of the helper, but only a special superintendence to direct the helper to assist him, Gould, in the manual labor of operating them. It being his duty to personally perform—not merely direct—this labor, and his right only to have the other man help him to perform it, his relation to the machinery being primarily that of a laborer, it cannot be said that he was in the exercise of any superintendence while he was discharging this primal duty of a manual laborer. His superintendence, if any he had, extended only to his actual direction of the helper, and ceased whenever he did any act in person and in the line of his duty as the engineer in charge of these machines; the case in this respect being radically different from those of Osborne v. Jackson, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 619, and Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton (Ala.) 12 So. Rep. 88, 94, in which the sole duty of the negligent person was that of superintendence, and he voluntarily co-operated in manual labor. The idea that it was not the legislative purpose to make the employer liable for the negligence of persons in charge of machinery, plant, and the like for the purpose of operating the same, unless the machinery is on or connected with railroads, is strengthened by a reference to subsection 5 of the Act, which allows a recovery when the injury is caused by the negligence of any person, etc., who has charge or control of any signal points, locomotive engine, switch, car, or train upon a railway, or of any part of the track of a railway. If the contention of counsel be sound that there may be superintendence of machinery, plant, etc., purely, there was no necessity for the enactment of this clause, since the matters provided for in it are embraced in clause 2. The legislature supposed they were not, and therefore enacted subsection 5.

The evidence in this case is without conflict to the effect that when the engine moved or was set in motion Gould's helper was not even on the premises, and that if the engine was started by Gould, it was the direct, negligent act of a manual laborer, not in any sense done in the exercise of superintendence, conceding that at any time superintendence was intrusted to him. This leaves the case outside of subsection 2 of section 2590. The death of McKay, on this hypothesis, was not caused by the negligence of a person to whom superintendence was intrusted "while in the exercise of such superintendence." On the other hand, had the jury concluded that Gould did not start the engine, but that it was set in motion by some third person in consequence of his failure to prevent outside interference, the result must have been the same. On this hypothesis Gould was a mere watchman, for whose negligence the company was not responsible to his fellow servant, McKay. Roberts & W. Liability of Employers, 260. In no possible aspect of the evidence was the plaintiff entitled to recover. The affirmative charge for defendant was properly given.

Affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Kirk E. NIMS

v.

MOUNT HERMON BOYS' SCHOOL.

(.....Mass.....)

1. An educational corporation engaged in operating a public ferry, carrying passengers for hire, cannot escape liability for negligence in the management of the ferry on the ground that the business was ultra vires.
2. A corporation may be held to have adopted the acts of its agents in conducting a business ultra vires, where its managing officers, knowing the business has been done and that the income of the business has been received and the expenses of it paid by the treasurer, has adopted the action of the treasurer and elected to keep the money.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Franklin County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in the verdict in defendant's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Dana Malone, for plaintiff:

A corporation is liable civilliter for all torts committed by its servants or agents by authority of the corporation express or implied; and it is liable as a natural person for the acts of its agents done by its authority, express or implied, though there be neither a written appointment under seal nor a vote of the corporation constituting the agency or authorizing the act.

The ferry was operated and maintained by the defendant.

Pub. Stat., chap. 55, § 1, requires that no person shall keep a ferry unless he first receives a license therefor from the county commissioners.

The records of the county commissioners show that the defendant presented a petition to rule of some earlier cases. Of the later class, see Leinlauf v. Lombard (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 48.

said commissioners, March 4, 1890, and having filed its bonds, with sureties, was duly licensed to keep said ferry for one year, to be known as "Mount Hermon Ferry."

2. Charles Deane, the ferryman, was employed to run the ferry, and was paid by the defendant.

3. The defendant paid for the repairs of the ferry and boats, and bought a new boat and paid for it from its funds.

4. The defendant took the proceeds of the ferry, paid to it by said Deane, and other amounts received for ferriage by said Nichols, their cashier.

5. The money received was duly entered on the books of the corporation kept by the cashier, also on the books of the treasurer.

6. The trustees must be presumed to know that the ferry was being run by the defendant.

The power of the trustees may be delegated to members of the board.

The defendant has enjoyed the benefits received from the running of the ferry. There is no rule of law which permits them to retain the benefits and escape liability.

There are two modes in which a corporation may expressly contract and act: first, by vote of its members; and second, by its duly authorized agents.

Being the mere creation of law, a corporation possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it. These are such as are supposed best calculated to effect the object for which it was created.

Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 636, 4 L. ed. 659.

This defendant corporation has provided that its board of trustees shall speak and act for it. Its first by-law provides for a board of twenty-five trustees, whose duty is defined to be "to conduct all the affairs of the corporation . . . in such manner as they shall deem expedient."

Neither the records of the defendant corporation nor of its board of trustees, show any vote or action at any time, that in any way or manner, relates to said ferry or its management, or to a license to operate it, or to any bond, or that the said trustees or any one of them had taken any action in relation to said ferry, or had any knowledge thereof, except as appears in the bill of exceptions.

There does not appear to have been any agent of the defendant having any authority whatever in the matter of the ferry.

The enumeration of powers granted implies the exclusion of all others.

The defendant had no power under its charter to engage in the business of a common carrier of passengers for hire, either direct or implied; such business was ultra vires or acts the corporation was not authorized to do either by express or implied powers.

Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. supra.

If the defendant's board of trustees had voted to buy and had bought, and to manage said ferry, and had attempted so to do, such acts would have been ultra vires, and the corporation not liable in this action.

It is not liable for a tort or negligence unless such act is done in the course of the business authorized by its charter and by an authorized agent.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is an educational corporation. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for injuries received through the negligence of a ferryman in managing a boat on which he was a passenger, and which, as he alleges, the defendant was using at a public ferry in the business of carrying passengers for hire. At the request of the defendant, the presiding justice ruled that there was no evidence to warrant a finding for the plaintiff, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The defendant contends that the ruling should be sustained on one or both of two grounds: It says, in the first place, that if it maintained the ferry, and hired and paid the ferryman, the business was ultra vires, and therefore it is not liable for negligence in the management of the boat. Secondly, it contends that there was no evidence to connect the corporation with the business of running the ferryboat, or to show that the ferryman was its servant.

It is a general rule that corporations are liable for their torts, as natural persons are. It is no defense to an action for a tort to show that the corporation is not authorized by its charter to do wrong. Recovery may be had against corporations for assault and battery, for libel, and for malicious prosecution, as well as for torts resulting from negligent management of the corporate business. Moore v. Fitchburg R. Corp. 4 Gray, 465, 64 Am. Dec. 83; Fogg v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 148 Mass. 513; Reed v. Home Sav. Bank, 180 Mass. 443, 39 Am. Rep. 468; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 62 U. S. 21 How. 209, 16 L. ed. 75; Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008; First Nat. Bank of Carlisle, Pa. v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. ed. 750; Gruber v. Washington & J. R. Co. 92 N. C. 1; Hussey v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 98 N. C. 84. If a corporation, by its officers or agents, unlawfully injures a person, whether intentionally or negligently, it would be most unjust to allow it to escape responsibility on the ground that its act is ultra vires. The only plausible ground on which the defendant in the present case can contend that it should be exempt from liability for the negligence of its servant in managing the ferryboat is that the contract to carry the plaintiff was ultra vires, and therefore invalid, and that the duty for neglect of which the plaintiff sues arose out of the contract, and disappears with it when the contract appears to be void. The defendant may argue that the plaintiff cannot maintain an action for a breach of the contract to use proper care to carry him safely, and that he stands no better when he sues in tort for failure to do the duty which grew out of the contract.

In Bissell v. Michigan S. and N. I. R. Co's, 22 N. Y. 258, the plaintiff founded his action on the negligence of the two defendants while jointly running cars on a railroad in a state to which the charter of neither of them extended, and it was conceded that the defendants were acting ultra vires. The plaintiff recovered, Comstock, Ch. J., holding, in an elaborate opinion, that the corporations were liable under their contract, notwithstanding that the contract was ultra vires, and that if they could not be held under their contract they could not be held at all, inasmuch as the only negligence alleged was a failure to use the care which the contract called for. Selden, J., in an equally full and elaborate opinion, held that the contract for carriage was invalid, and that there could be no recovery under it, nor for negligence founded upon it, but it was his opinion that if the contract were set aside the defendants owed the plaintiff a duty founded on his relation to them as an occupant, with their permission, of a place in their car, and that the improper management of the car was a neglect of that duty, for which the plaintiff could recover. Clerke, J., agreed with this view, and all but one of the other judges concurred in a decision for the plaintiff, without stating the ground on which they thought the decision should be placed. This case was followed in Buffett v. Troy & B. R. Co., 40 N. Y. 168, in which it was held that a railroad corporation was liable for negligence of the driver of a stagecoach which it was running without a legal right to do a business of that kind; but the opinion does not show whether the decision is founded on the opinion of Comstock, Ch. J., given in the former case, or on that of Selden, J. Like decisions have been made under similar facts in Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 76 Ala. 572, 52 Am. Rep. 358; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Haring, 47 N. J. L. 137, 54 Am. Rep. 123, and Hutchinson v. Western & A. R. Co. 6 Heisk. 684.

The better doctrine seems to be that a contract made by a corporation in violation of its charter, or in excess of the powers granted to it either expressly or by implication, is invalid, considered merely as a contract, and, so long as it is entirely executory, will not be enforced. It is not only a violation of a private trust, viewed in reference to the stockholders, but it is against the policy of the law, which intends that corporations deriving their powers solely from the legislature shall not pass beyond the limits of the field of activity in which they are permitted by their charter to work. Davis v. Old Colony R. Co. 181 Mass. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 221; Monument Nat. Bank v. Globe Works, 101 Mass. 57, 8 Am. Rep. 322; Atty-Gen. v. Tudor Ice Co. 104 Mass. 289, 6 Am. Rep. 227; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950; Leslie v. Lorillard, 110 N. Y. 519, 1 L. R. A. 456; Linkauf v. Lombard, 137 N. Y. 417, 20 L. R. A. 48; East Anglian R. Co. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 11 C. B. 808. On the other hand, courts have frequently held that while such contracts, considered merely as contracts, are invalid, they involve no such element of moral or legal wrong as to forbid their enforcement, if there has been such action under them as to work injustice if they are set aside. Courts have been astute to discover something in the nature of an equitable estoppel against one who, after entering into such a contract, and inducing a change of condition by another party, attempts to avoid the contract by a plea of ultra vires. It is said that such a plea will not avail, when to allow it would work injustice, and accomplish legal wrong. Leslie v. Lorillard, and Linkauf v. Lombard, supra. Many cases might be supposed in which it would be most unjust to hold that one who had received the benefits of such a contract might retain them, and leave the other party without remedy, as he might do in a supposable case, where another had put himself at a disadvantage on the faith of a contract with him to commit a crime. Whether, in this commonwealth, a contract entered into by a corporation ultra vires, and partly performed, will ever be enforced on equitable grounds, we need not now decide. See Slater Woolen Co. v. Lamb, 148 Mass. 420; Prescott Nat. Bank of Lowell v. Butler, 157 Mass. 548; National Pemberton Bank v. Porter, 125 Mass. 333, 28 Am. Rep. 235; Attleborough Nat. Bank v. Rogers, 125 Mass. 339; Freeman's Nat. Bank v. Savery, 127 Mass. 75-77, 34 Am. Rep. 345; Union Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 189; McCluer v. Manchester & L. Railroad, 13 Gray, 124, 74 Am. Dec. 624; National Bank of Genesee v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443; Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 494; Oil Creek & A. R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Transp. Co. 83 Pa. 160; Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413, 8 Am. Rep. 656.

In the present case, we think it makes no difference that the defendant was not a manufacturing or trading corporation, but was chartered for educational purposes only. It could acquire and hold property, make contracts, and do anything else incidental to the maintenance of the school. Doubtless, some of its officers or agents thought it would be an advantage to its students and managers to have a public ferry at the place where the plaintiff was injured. Its maintenance of such a ferry was ultra vires, but its acts in that respect were not different in kind from the ordinary acts of corporations in excess of the powers given them by their charter. We are of opinion, therefore, that if the defendant, while running the ferryboat, accepted the plaintiff as a passenger to be transported for hire, and undertook to carry him across the river, he was in the boat as a licensee; it owed him the duty to use proper care to carry him safely; and, whether an action could be maintained for a breach of the contract or not, it is liable to the plaintiff in an action of tort for neglect of that duty.

The other question in the case is whether there was evidence that the corporation operated the ferry. Under its by-laws, the management of the corporation is vested in a board of trustees. It does not appear that any vote was ever taken in regard to the ferry, and it was not shown that any officer of the corporation took out the license which was granted to the defendant by the county commissioners under Pub. Stat., chap. 55, § 1, to keep the ferry; but the records of the county commissioners show that such a license was granted, and that a bond with sureties was given to the county of Franklin, with the condition to properly perform the duty of a ferryman, executed in behalf of the defendant by one who was designated as superintendent, and witnessed by the defendant's cashier and paymaster. It further appeared that the title to the property used at the ferry was taken by Ambert G. Moody, one of the trustees of the defendant, who was then a student in Amherst College, and that he paid for it only a nominal sum above the mortgage existing upon it, and that he and the defendant's superintendent who had charge of its farm, employed one Deane to operate the ferry, who was paid by the month, and who turned over the balance of the receipts of the ferry, above his wages, to the defendant's cashier and paymaster. For the month of April, Deane was paid for his services by the defendant's paymaster, out of the defendant's funds. In June, 1890, a new ferryboat was constructed, under an arrangement with Ambert G. Moody and Dwight L. Moody, both of whom were trustees of the corporation, and was paid for by the paymaster out of the funds of the corporation. For six months, and until there was a change in the management of the ferry, the defendant's cashier and paymaster sent to the treasurer, who lived in New York, monthly accounts, showing monthly receipts and expenses on account of the ferry. Accompanying the first of these accounts was a statement that the school was running the ferry and paying the bills. The treasurer was himself a trustee of the corporation. He subsequently rendered his official report to the corporation, which was audited by another of the trustees, who did not examine the items in person, but caused the examination to be made by a man in his employment. This report was accepted by the trustees, and placed on file. The items of receipts and expenditures were entered on the books of the treasurer in an account under the title, "Ferry." The treasurer's report was not put in evidence, and was not produced, although the defendant was notified to produce it. There is no evidence of original authority from the defendant to anybody to operate the ferry on its account, but the evidence is plenary that persons connected with the management of its business assumed so to operate it. The important question is whether there was evidence that the corporation ratified the acts of these persons. We are of opinion that there was evidence from which the jury might have found such ratification. It is not necessary that the ratification should be by a formal vote. It is enough if the corporation, acting through its managing officers, knowing that the business had been done by those who assumed to act as its agents in doing it, and that the income of the business had been received, and the expenses of it paid, by its treasurer, in his official capacity, and that the balance of the receipts above the expenditures was in its treasury, adopted the action of its treasurer, and elected to keep the money. It was a fair inference of fact, especially when the corporation failed to produce the treasurer's report after notice to produce it, that the report contained a true statement of the accounts which related to the ferry, and that it was accepted with full knowledge on the part of the trustees of what it contained. Whether there was a ratification by the corporation was a question of fact for the jury, on all the evidence. If there was such a ratification, it carried with it the consequences which would have followed an original authority. In Dempsey v. Chambers, 154 Mass. 330, 18 L. R. A. 219, it was held, after much consideration, that ratification of an unauthorized act would make the principal liable in an action of tort for an injury resulting from negligence of the agent in doing the act. We are of opinion that the case should have been submitted to the jury.

Exceptions sustained.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

PENSACOLA & ATLANTIC R. CO.,

Appt.,
v.

William K. HYER et al.

"Where a railway company, having lawful authority so to do, crosses a public navigable stream or watercourse with its road, erecting in a proper manner the proper and necessary structures for such crossing, occupying therewith the space and no more than the space permitted to it, and so erects and uses such structures as that they shall not unnecessarily abridge or destroy the usefulness of such stream to the public as a navigable highway, using in a proper manner a movable drawbridge by which it crosses that part of such stream left open for the public navigation thereof, it is not liable for injuries resulting to vessels navigating such stream from coming in contact with obstructions in the open space or channel of water under such drawbridge when such obstructions are present without fault on such company's part. The open space left to be temporarily spanned from time to time by the railway's drawbridge is left not only to the free use but to the control and care of the public, and the railway company is under no more obligation to keep it free of obstructions present without its agency, than it is to care for any other part of the channel of such stream.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Escambia County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused to plaintiff's steam tug by reason of obstructions allowed to accumulate under the water in the channel left by the draw of defendant's bridge. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. William A. Blount, for appellant:

The bridge is not per se a nuisance. The Pensacola & Atlantic Railroad Company defendant was by its charter authorized to construct a railroad "from a point on the Apalachicola river . . . westward to the waters of Escambia bay at the city of Pensacola, thence to the Alabama line by the most direct route."

The court will take judicial notice of the fact that Escambia bay must be crossed by a railroad extending by a direct route from the Apalachicola river to Pensacola and thence to the Alabama line. The act then which authorized the building of the road between these two points authorized the bridging of Escambia bay lying between them.

The bridge then being built under legislative authority is not a nuisance.

Nor was the bridge constructed in an improper manner; there is no allegation that it was so constructed.

Authority to build the bridge carried with it authority to build it with no passage through it except a suitable draw.

Thompson v. Paterson & H. R. Railroad, 9 N. J. Eq. 559; People v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. 15 Wend. 118, 30 Am. Dec. 38.

If any duty exists on the part of the defendant to see that the passage through the draw is kept safe for the navigation of vessels, it must arise from express provisions in the charter or from provisions necessarily implied. There are no express provisions.

There is but one implied condition attached to the grant of the right to build the bridge, which is that it shall not unnecessarily obstruct navigation.

Ward v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 3 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 506.

In the absence of a duty to keep the draw clear at all events—of a duty to insure against accidents—the ordinary rule of negligence applies, that the owner or controller of such a structure which has been properly built is liable for any defect in its condition only if he has been put upon notice of the condition either from direct information, or from the existence of circumstances which would indicate the existence of the condition, or from an imputed knowledge of natural causes which would produce such condition.

Mr. John C. Avery, for appellees:

If this court should find that it was in contemplation of the act that the Pensacola & Atlantic Railroad Company should build a bridge over the Escambia bay, then it was certainly contemplated that such bridge should be of such design and structure as would least impede navigation.

Inasmuch as the navigation of those extensive waters was, by the act of appellant, forced into so narrow a channel in order to enable it to declared by one of the counsel in the case, "practically one of first impression," although it has a precedent in the brief case of Ward v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 3 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 506.

cross the bay at a smaller expense, it is incumbent on appellant to see that the space of the draw is kept clear of obstructions.

Where vessels were invited in business with wharf owners to use their structures, it is incumbent upon owners to see that the use is without damage or danger.

Leonard v. Decker, 23 Fed. Rep. 741; Smith v. Havemeyer, 36 Fed. Rep. 927.

How much more reasonable is it to hold to the same and even stricter responsibility a company having and using the power to compel for its own purposes, and to save money, the commerce of a bay to abandon a broad and safe channel and submit to the use of a single and narrow space for transit to and fro.

Edgerton v. New York, 27 Fed. Rep. 281; Etheridge v. Philadelphia, 26 Fed. Rep. 43; Post v. Lincoln, 25 Fed. Rep. 885.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees as owners of the steam tug "E. E. Simpson," in an action in case, in the circuit court of Escambia county, recovered judgment against the appellant for the sum of $244.58, and from this judgment the defendant below appeals.

The only error assigned is the ruling of the court below upon the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiffs' declaration, whereby the sufficiency of the declaration to warrant a recovery in law was questioned. The declaration is as follows: "Wm. K. Hyer and Albert Hyer, as partners under the firm name of Hyer Brothers, F. C. Brent, Isaac Rogers, and John J. Bowes, as owners of the steam tug named E. E. Simpson, the plaintiffs, by their attorney, John C. Avery, sue the Pensacola & Atlantic Railroad Company, a corporation, the defendant. For that, to wit, on the 6th day of March, 1888, to wit in the county and state aforesaid (Escambia county, Florida), the said plaintiffs then and there being the owners of a certain steam tug named E. E. Simpson, which they used in the business of towing vessels and timber in the waters of Pensacola bay and the tributaries thereof, and the said defendant being then and there engaged . . . under the authority of law in the business of transporting freight and passengers for hire over the line of railroad extending from the county aforesaid across the county of Santa Rosa, from east to west, the said defendant was then and there engaged in the said business and accomplishing the said transportation between the said counties by means of a certain bridge across the waters of Escambia bay, a navigable stream, and an arm of the said bay of Pensacola; the said bridge being laid upon piles driven into the soil forming the basin of the said bay, and so near together as to totally obstruct the navigation of the said Escambia bay, except at a point about the middle thereof where the defendant had and maintained a drawbridge, through which all vessels and other craft navigating the said Escambia bay were compelled to and did pass in proceeding from points north of said bridge to the city of Pensacola. And the plaintiffs in fact aver that on the day and date aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, while their said boat was engaged in the navigation of the said bay, in the prosecution of her lawful business, she was compelled to and did pass through the said draw in the said bridge, which said draw it was the duty of the defendant to keep clear of obstructions so as to enable the same to be safely navigated by all vessels which might have navigated the said waters had said bridge not been erected at all by the defendant. And the said plaintiffs in fact aver that their said boat could and would have safely navigated the said waters had the said bridge not been built as aforesaid, but the defendant permitted the . . . space of the said draw through which said boat had to pass to become obstructed by snags, posts, logs and other obstacles below the surface of the water and invisible to persons in plaintiffs' said boat, in so much that when the plaintiffs' said boat undertook to pass through the same her propeller struck against the said obstructions and was broken, so that the plaintiffs were compelled to procure a new wheel, paying therefor the sum of $254.88, its reasonable value. Yet the defendant fails to pay the same or any part thereof, to the plaintiffs' damage of $1,000, and therefore, they sue," etc. The ground of the demurrer to this declaration was: "That it sets forth no breach of any obligation of the defendant towards the plaintiffs." It will be observed from this declaration that there is no allegation therein that the occupancy of the navigable water known as Escambia bay by the defendant railway company with its railway, piles, track, and bridge was in any wise unlawful or unauthorized; but, on the contrary, it expressly alleges that the defendant "was then and there engaged under the authority of law in the business of transporting freight and passengers for hire over the line of railroad extending from Escambia county across the county of Santa Rosa, from east to west, accomplishing the said transportation between the said counties by means of a certain bridge across the waters of Escambia bay," etc.

The declaration admitting, as it does, that the defendant has the lawful authority to occupy the waters of this bay with its road, the company cannot be held in fault in having it there, unless it be that in the erection or use of its authorized structures it has, in some unlawful manner, destroyed, or unnecessarily abridged or obstructed, its usefulness to the public as a navigable highway. Our next inquiry, then, from the declaration is, Does it charge upon the defendant any default in the manner in which it has exercised its authority to cross said bay; or in the structures or use of the structures erected by it to effect such crossing; or in the structural design, position, dimensions, or use of the drawbridge designed to subserve the double purpose of affording to the railway the means of crossing the stream, and, at the same time, serving to retain for such stream its usefulness as a highway? We find no complaint against the defendant in any of these respects; therefore we conclude that the defendant has not exercised and used its authority to occupy the stream in any unauthorized manner, but that what it has done has been lawfully done. What, then, is the defendant's default that has wrought the damage complained of? We find it in the allegation that "the defendant permitted the space of the said draw through which said boat had to pass to become obstructed by snags, posts, logs, and other obstacles below the surface of the water and invisible to persons in plaintiffs' said boat, in so much that when the plaintiffs' said boat undertook to pass through the same her propeller struck against the said obstructions and was broken," etc. It will be observed that in this, the gravamen of the complaint, there is no charge that the alleged obstructions were present in the waters under the draw through any instrumentality of the defendant, or in consequence of any faultiness in its structures, but the charge is, that the defendant "permitted" the space under the draw to "become obstructed," thereby implying that the obstructions were present there, not through the active instrumentality of the defendant, but through other agencies, and that the defendant was in default in not removing them, and in passively permitting them to remain there. In other words, as is contended here, it is assumed by the plaintiffs that it is the defendants' duty at all times to keep the water highway passing through and under its draw-bridge free from all obstructions, no matter how they become present there. And the injury resulting to plaintiffs' boat from the defendant's neglect of this its alleged duty is the foundation for the suit. In this contention we cannot agree with the counsel for the appellees. The fact that the company, when authorized to construct its road across a navigable stream, is granted such authority upon the implied condition that it shall cross it in such manner that it shall retain its usefulness as a public highway without unnecessary abridgment, and that the invention of the movable draw-ridge enables it to comply with this condition in its authority, necessarily carries with it the idea that the open space, simply spanned by its draw, is left, not for the company's use nor under its care or control but free and clear of any of its structures, as the public highway, for use by the public, subject to the same custody, control and care as any other part of the stream spanned. The company, except to span it with their movable draw, temporarily for the passage of its trains, has no more authority or control over such open space, than it has over any other part of such public stream not in contact with its works; and is not charged with the duty of keeping it free and clear of obstructions present without any instrumentality or fault on its part, and is under no more obligation to remove them from time to time, than it is under to keep any other part of the stream free from similar obstructions. Its whole duty is performed when it properly occupies with its necessary and proper structures the space, and no more than the space, permitted to it, and so uses its structures that they shall not unnecessarily abridge or impede the rights of the public. The open space left to be simply spanned by its draw is left, not only to the free use, but to the control and care of the public. From this conclusion it becomes apparent that the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiffs' declaration should have been sustained. Ward v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Tenn.) 3 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 506.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to sustain the defendant's demurrer to the declaration.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

RE Will of Bridget GUILFOYLE, Deceased.

(96 Cal. 596.)

1. The name of the testator written at the beginning of a will is sufficiently near his mark at the end to make the mark a valid signature within a statute requiring the name to be written near the mark, if the intention that the mark should represent the testator's name clearly appears.

2. A testator, knowing how but being unable because of physical weakness

A will is not invalid on account of the testator signing the same with his mark. Upchurch v. Upchurch, 16 B. Mon. 102; Dack v. Dack, 19 Hun. 630; Main v. Ryder, 84 Pa. 217; McNinch v. Charles, 2 Rich. L. 229; Re Dilke, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 164, 43 L. J. P. 88, 30 L. T. N. S. 805, 22 Week. Rep. 456; Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 830; Smith v. Dolby, 4 Harr. Though not directly decided the same was held in the following cases: Robins v. Coryell, 27 Barb. 556; Miles' Will, 4 Dana. 1; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 30 N. J. Eq. 193; Lemalne v. Staneley, 1 Freem. 538; Rash v. Purnell, 2 Harr. (Del.) 448; Butler v. Benson, 1 Barb. 626.

In Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Convention, 10 22 L. R. A.

Paige, 85, 4 L. ed. 896, 40 Am. Dec. 225, the court said: "It has been determined that the making of his mark by the testator is a sufficient signing." But this was not decided as the will signed by name and not by mark was refused probate for want of proof of proper acknowledgment, but the testatrix had previously signed documents by mark.

And a will may be signed by mark instead of name even if testator could write. Baker v. Denning, 3 Nev. & P. 228, 8 Ad. & El. 94, 1 W. W. & H. 148, 2 Jur. 775.

And may be signed by mark alone, the name of the testator not appearing at the mark. Re Bryce, 2 Curt. Ecol. Rep. 225. See also the main case, RE GUILFOYLE.

And may be signed by mark, under Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 62, § 6, requiring that a will shall be signed by the testator, or by some one in his presence and by his express direction. Nickerson v. Buck, 12 Cush. 333.

to write his name, is within the meaning of a statute permitting a mark "when the person cannot write."

APPEAL by proponent and the administratrix from orders of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco, revoking the probate of the will of Bridget Gullfoyle, deceased, and the appointment of an administratrix. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the Commissioner's opinion.

And may be signed by mark although the testator may be blind. Ray v. Hill, 3 Strobb. L. 207, 49 Am. Dec. 647.

And may be signed by mark though only one witness saw the act of making the mark. Sprague v. Luther, 8 E. L. 232.

And this though the witnesses did not see him make it, if he acknowledges the will as required by the statute. Shanks v. Christopher, 3 A. K. Marsh. 144.

The presumption is that a testator signing a will by mark knew the contents of such will. Doran v. Mullen, 73 Ill. 342.

An imperfect signature to a will may be regarded as a mark. Hartwell v. McMaster, 4 Redf. 393.

And where a will is signed by the testator by mark that is the signature and not his name written near it. Jackson v. Jackson, 39 N. Y. 153; Pool v. Bufum, 3 Or. 438; Re Will of Cornelius, 14 Ark. 675.

The contrary is held in Missouri so that while a will may there be signed by mark, yet if the testator's name is written near the mark, such name will be held to be the signature and not the mark, and this name must be attested by the party who wrote it saying that he subscribed the testator's name at his request and such witness must sign his own name. Simpson v. Simpson, 27 Mo. 238; St. Louis Hospital Asso. v. Williams, 19 Mo. 609; St. Louis Hospital Asso. v. Wegman, 21 Mo. 17; Northcutt v. Northcutt, 20 Mo. 206.

In New York a will signed by name and mark where the name of the scrivener writing such name was not also signed, was sustained, as 2 Rev. Stat., 3d ed., 124, § 33, provides that such omission shall not invalidate. Hollenbeck v. VanValkenburgh, 5 How. Pr. 281.

A mark is superfluous if made after a will has been signed and acknowledged, where the name had been written for the testator by another. Lechrest v. Edwards, 4 Met. (Ky.) 163; Rosser v. Franklin, 6 Gratt. 1, 52 Am. Dec. 97.

And a will signed by mark was not invalid although the name written was the former maiden name of the testatrix. Re Clarke, 1 Swab. & T. 22, 27 L. J. P. 18, 4 Jur. N. S. 24.

Or where the scrivener wrote the wrong name at the testator's mark. Bailey v. Bailey, 35 Ala. 687.

And the same was held where the will was signed and executed by a mark by A who was wrongly described throughout the will as B. Re Douce, 2 Swab. & T. 593, 81 L. J. P. 172, 8 Jur. N. S. 723, 6 L. T. N. S. 789.

And the same was held where the wrong surname of a witness attesting by marks was written. Re Ashmore, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 755.

And a will was sustained where the testator had his hand guided in making his mark. Cozzens' Will, 61 Pa. 196; Higgins v. Carlton, 23 Md. 115, 92 Am. Dec. 666; Wilson v. Beddard, 12 Sim. 23.

But a mark made by holding the testator's hand is invalid, when he did not so direct, as required by 23 L. R. A.

Mr. F. J. Castelhun for appellants.
Messrs. H. G. Platt and Oscar T. Shuck for respondents.

Vancielief, C., filed the following opinion:

Proceeding to revoke the probate of the will of the deceased. The bill of exceptions shows that the matter was submitted to the court on the following stipulation as to the facts:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the application to revoke the will of the above-named deceased be, and the same is hereby, submitted upon the following statement of

Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 47, § 5, allowing a will to be signed for the testator by his express direction. Waite v. Frisbie, 45 Minn. 361.

And the same was decided when the testator did not understand what was done, although at a subsequent day he said "it was just as he wanted it." Dunlop v. Dunlop, 10 Watts, 153.

A statement that "testatrix being illiterate has made her mark" is not sufficient under La. Code, § 1572, providing if testator "knows not how, or is not able to sign, express mention of his declaration, as also of the cause that hinders him from signing must be made in the act." Re Carroll's Succession, 28 La. Ann. 388.

A will signed by testatrix's mark was not sustained where the declaration that it was her will did not follow the signature as required by 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. p. 63, § 40. Heyer v. Burger, Hoffm. Ch. 1, 6 L. ed. 1043.

And a will was invalid which was written on a card having the testator's mark in the middle of the writing and the initials of the witnesses on the back, as it was not signed at the foot or end as required by statute. Margary v. Robinson, L. R. 13 Prob. Div. 8, 56 L. J. P. 42, 35 Week. Rep. 350, 57 L. T. N. S. 261, 51 J. P. 407.

So it was formerly held in Pennsylvania under Pennsylvania Act 1833, requiring a will to be signed by the testator or by another by his express direction, a signature by the testator with his mark is not sufficient. Assay v. Hoover, 5 Pa. 21, 45 Am. Dec. 713; Grabill v. Barr, 5 Pa. 441, 47 Am. Dec. 418; Cavett's App. 8 Watts & S. 21, 42 Am. Dec. 232; Snyder v. Bull, 17 Pa. 60.

Assay v. Hoover, supra, overrules a dictum in Stricker v. Groves, 5 Whart. 397, that a mark would be sufficient.

And the Pennsylvania Act of 1848, rendering valid such wills and those made prior to that act, is unconstitutional as to wills made prior to the Act. Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am. Dec. 567; Shinkle v. Crook, 17 Pa. 159; McCarty v. Hoffman, 23 Pa. 507.

But a will made in Pennsylvania before 1848, to which was subscribed the name and mark of the testator, was held prima facie valid, where the witnesses on probate testify that they saw the testator sign the will, since the addition of a mark does not import that he did not sign his name. The court also says: "They may have considered the affixing of a mark as a signing of the will." Davies v. Morris, 17 Pa. 206.

The Act of 1833 is not discussed by the court.

The Pennsylvania courts, in construing Pennsylvania Act of 1833, have not followed the decisions of other states in recognising a will made by mark until a special statute was passed in 1848.

But when called upon to construe a statute of California similar to the Pennsylvania Act of 1833, which had not been construed in California, the court refused to adopt the construction placed on such act by its former decisions, and adopted that of other states. Flannery's Will, 24 Pa. 502.

And a prior will signed by mark is valid if the facts, to wit: Said will is in pencil, and barely covers a single page of small note paper. It is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"August 29, 1891. I, Bridget Guilfoyle, leave $500 (five hundred dollars) for masses at St. Patrick; also want a nice funeral, and all other expenses to be paid from what I leave, and the rest to my two nieces, Maria and Aggie Johnson, equally.

"Witnesses: Ellen O'Connor. Emma Endres. Mary Daly."

"The will was written by the witness Emma Endres, at the request of the deceased. After it was written, the witness Emma Endres read the will to the deceased in the presence of the other subscribing witnesses. The deceased was then asked whether that was her will. The deceased answered that it was. She was then given a pen by the witness Emma Endres. The deceased knew how to write her name, but was physically too weak to do so. She made a cross at the end of the paper, and declared that such paper was her last will, and requested the said Emma Endres, Mary Daly and Ellen O'Connor to sign the same as witnesses thereto.

testator did not die until the Act of 1848 took effect. Long v. Zook, 18 Pa. 400; Burford v. Burford, 29 Pa. 221.

Or if made after the Pennsylvania Act of 1848. Carson's App. 59 Pa. 498.

An acknowledgment by a testator, where the mark was not made in the presence of witnesses, is not a compliance with N. J. Rev. Laws, 7, requiring a will to be signed and published in the presence of three witnesses. Den v. Mitton, 12 N. J. L. 81.

The following cases hold that a will may be valid although signed by mark, but the question involved in the cases was the sufficiency of the evidence to establish its due execution. Engles v. Bruington, 4 Yeates, 346, 2 Am. Dec. 411; Re Simpson's Will, 2 Redf. 29; Re Kane's Will, 2 Connolly, 246; Re Dockstader's Will, 6 Dem. 106; Worden v. VanGieson, Id. 237; Re Reynolds, 4 Dem. 66; Re Phelps' Will, 1 Connolly, 463; Walsh's Will, 1 Tucker, 132; Re Maddock, L. R. 8 Prob. & Div. 169, 43 L. J. P. 29, 30 L. T. N. S. 606, 22 Week. Attesting will by mark.

A will is not invalid because an attesting witness signs by mark. Wright v. Wright, 7 Bing. 457, note; Ford v. Ford, 7 Humph. 92; Montgomery v. Perkins, 3 Met. (Ky.) 448, 74 Am. Dec. 419; Den v. Mitton, 12 N. J. L. 81; Pridgen v. Pridgen, 35 N. C. 269; Addy v. Grix, 8 Ves. Jr. 504; Harrison v. Harrison, Id. 185; Doe v. Davis, 11 Jur. 182, 9 Q. B. 648; Needham v. Needham (Mass.) 8 Dane, Abr. 452.

The same was held in Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 330, where the mark of such witness was identified by peculiarities and other circumstances corroborating.

See, as to identification of marks by peculiarities, Fogg v. Dennis, infra.

In Chase v. Kittredge, 11 Allen, 49, 87 Am. Dec. 694, and Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 102, it was held that a will may be attested by a witness making his mark, although this question was not directly involved in those cases.

And in Re White, 2 Notes of Cases, 461, 7 Jur. 1045, it was held that he must make his mark or sign his name himself.

So a will may be attested by mark, where one attesting witness writes the name of the marking witness. Derry's Estate, Myrick's Cal. Prob. Ct. Rep. 202.

And it may be attested by mark where the testator wrote his own name, notwithstanding Ala. Code, § 1, provides that if the testator or grantor cannot write but subscribes by mark the attesting witnesses must write their names. Garrett v. Hedin (Ala.) June 7, 1893.

And a will attested by mark was not invalid 23 L. R. A.

where the scrivener did not sign his name as witness to the mark, although Ark. Code, § 6344, provides that a signature shall include mark when the person cannot write, his name being written near it, and witnessed by the person who writes his own name as a witness. Davis v. Semme, 51 Ark. 48, See Ex parte Miller, infra.

But the witness using a mark must have so intended it as a mark, and a dash made by the scrivener in a hurry where he failed to sign his name will not be a signature. Re Enyon, 21 Week. Rep. 556.

And a will may be established although both of the attesting witnesses sign by mark. Crowley v. Crowley, 80 Ill. 469.

The mark of an attesting witness need not have any peculiarity to enable him to identify it under Ga. Code, § 2415, providing that a witness may attest by mark if he can swear to the same. Thompson v. Davitte, 59 Ga. 472. See Fogg v. Dennis, infra.

A will was not invalid on account of one attesting witness signing by mark, although the other subscribing witness was dead when the will was attempted to be established. Morris v. Kniffin, 37 Barb. 636.

Attestation of a will by marks is invalid if the parties so attesting did not see testator's signature and did not know what they were attesting. Pearson v. Pearson, L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 451, 40 L. J. P. 52, 24 L. T. N. S. 917, 19 Week. Rep. 1014.

A will was sustained where all the witnesses were dead, and two of them signed by marks. Doe v. Caperton, 9 Car. & P. 112.

But their marks must be identified in some way. Collins v. Nicola, 1 Harr. & J. 899.

Deeds, notes, and contracts signed or attested by mark.

A deed is not invalid on account of the grantor signing the same by his mark. Devereux v. McMahon, 12 L. R. A. 205, 108 N. C. 134; Sellers v. Sellers, 98 N. C. 13; Strong v. Brewer, 17 Ala. 706; Truman v. Lore, 14 Ohio St. 144; Lyons v. Holmes, 11 S. C. 429, 32 Am. Rep. 433.

The same was held in Carrier v. Hampton, 33 N. C. 307, although the question actually involved was the sufficiency of proof.

But it is questionable if a deed could be established if subscribed by grantor's mark under Mo. R. C. 1845, § 223, § 27, requiring the witnesses proving the same to state on oath that they well knew the signature of the party whose name is subscribed to the deed. Allen v. Moss, 27 Mo. 354.

And a deed was not invalid where one attesting witness recognized his signature, although he did not remember the other witnesses who attested by marks and who were dead. Collins v. Lemasters, 2 Ball. L. 141.

A deed that is defective because attested only by

From these facts the court concluded, "that said document is not subscribed at the end thereof by the testatrix herself, nor did any one in the presence of the testatrix, and by her direction, subscribe the name of the testatrix thereto;" and accordingly revoked its former orders admitting the document to probate and appointing an administratrix. From these orders revoking the probate and the appointment of an administratrix, the proponents and administratrix bring this appeal.

As to what amounts to a "signing" by a testator under the Statute of 29 Car. II., it is said, in Jarman on Wills (page 201): "It has been decided that a mark is sufficient and that, notwithstanding the testator is able to write, and though his name does not appear on the face of the will." To the same effect is section 808 of Schouler on Wills, citing American cases. Section 14 of the Civil Code provides that "'signature' or 'subscription,' includes 'mark,' when the person cannot write, his name being written near it, and written by a person who writes his own name as a witness." In this case the whole body of the will, including the name of the testatrix, was written by Emma Endres, who signed as a witness. If the mark can be regarded as subscription by the testatrix, the execution of the will was in perfect accordance with section 1376 of the Civil Code.

It is contended, however, by counsel for rethe marks of the witnesses respectively will be upheld as a valid contract to convey. Sparks v. Woodstock Iron & Steel Co. 37 Ala. 294. See also Carrier v. Hampton, supra.

A statute providing "that the word 'signature' or 'subscription' includes mark when the person cannot write, his name being written near it and witnessed by a person who writes his own name as a witness," does not exclude other proof if not so attested. Ex parte Miller, 49 Ark. 18. See Davis v. Semmes, 51 Ark. 48.

But under this statute a mark is not a sufficient signature to a deed which has not been both acknowledged and filed where the person writing the grantor's name has not subscribed his own name. Watson v. Billings, 38 Ark. 278.

This construction was held in Ex parte Miller, supra, to mean that such signature is not to be taken as prima facie genuine without other proof.

And such a statute does not mean that a party cannot bind himself by mark signature to a note without such attestation. Brown v. McClanahan, 9 Bax. 347; Vanover v. Murphy, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 738.

The same is held in regard to a chattel mortgage. Alabama Warehouse Co. v. Lewis, 56 Ala. 516; Breene v. McCrary, 52 Ala. 154; Bickley v. Keenan, 66 Ala. 295; Jones v. Hough, 77 Ala. 437.

It was held under this statute that an indorsement on a note by mark which was not attested was not a signature. Flowers v. Bitting, 45 Ala. 448.

But this was overruled in Wimberly v. Dallas, 52 Ala. 196, holding that a signature by mark to a note unattested was a valid signature unless its execution was denied under oath.

If a note signed by a mark is declared upon and the signature is not denied under oath as required by a rule of court, it will be upheld as a genuine signature. Willoughby v. Moulton, 47 N. H. 205.

A note was held not valid where the payee signed the name of the obligor to the same which purports to be signed by the obligor's mark. Carlisle v. Campbell, 76 Ala. 247.

But in Johnson v. Davis, 95 Ala. 208, this is claimed to have been so decided on the ground that the payee made the mark also, although it does not clearly appear in the opinion, and the latter case holds that a mortgage and note where the name of the grantor and obligor was written by the payee but signed by mark by the obligor and properly attested were valid.

So a bill of exchange payable to the drawer, indorsed by her by mark, her name being in the handwriting of plaintiff, an indorsee, was sustained where the mark was identified by peculiarities. George v. Surrey, Mood. & M. 518. See also Fogg v. Dennis, infra.

A note may be signed by the obligor with his mark and will be valid. Hilborn v. Alford, 22 Cal. 22 L. R. A.

483; Williams v. Riches, 77 Wis. 569; Whitney v. Clary, 145 Mass. 156.

The following cases also hold that a note may be signed by mark, but the question involved in the cases was the sufficiency of the proof. Whitelocke v. Musgrove, 1 Cromp. & M. 511, 8 Tyrw. 541; Ballinger v. Davis, 29 Iowa, 512; Wolff v. Mackrell, (Pa.) Nov. 7, 1887; Robinson v. Robinson, 20 S. C. 567; Bussey v. Whitaker, 2 Nott & McC. 374; Lever v. Lever, 1 Hill, Eq. 62; Paisley v. Snipe, 2 Brev. 200; Jones v. Jones, 12 Rich. L. 116.

And a note signed by mark may be valid even if the maker's name is not written there. Zimmerman v. Sale, 3 Rich. L. 76.

And it need not be witnessed under Ind. Stat., 3 Gavin & Hord, 388, providing that where the signature of a person is required the proper handwriting or his mark shall be intended. Shank v. Butsch, 28 Ind. 19.

And a note signed was also held valid where the attesting witness was in the adjoining room when the note was read to the signer by the scrivener within the hearing of the witness. Whitney v. Clary, supra.

And such signature by mark may be identified by peculiarities. Fogg v. Dennis, 8 Hump. 47; Pearcy v. Dicker, 13 Jur. 997; George v. Surrey, Mood. & M. 516; Gervais v. Baird, 2 Brev. 37; Shiver v. Johnson, Id. 397; Nellus v. Brickell, 2 N. C. 19. See also Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 330; Thompson v. Davitte, 59 Ga. 472.

The case of Reap v. Featherstone, 4 Luzerne Legal Reg. Pa. 4, which we have not been able to examine, is said in Brightly's Pennsylvania digest to hold that a mark is a sufficient signature, but must be proved if disputed.

A contract also may be signed by the party to be charged, with his mark. Foye v. Patch, 183 Mass. 105; Zacharie v. Franklin, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 151, 9 L. ed. 1035; Madison v. Zabriskie, 11 La. 251; Watts v. Kilburn, 7 Ga. 356.

So a recognizance may be signed by surety by mark. Vincennes Nat. Bank v. Cockrum, 64 Ind. 229.

And the same is true of a bail bond. Hammons v. State, 59 Ala. 164, 31 Am. Rep. 18.

And of an appeal bond. State v. Byrd, 96 N. C. 624.

So an officer's return may be signed by mark. Cox v. Montford, 66 Ga. 62.

And so may a power of attorney that is acknowledged. Eichelberger v. Sifford, 37 Md. 380.

In Louisiana the ordinary mark of a party places the evidence of the instrument on a footing with all private instruments in writing. Tagliacoe v. Molinari, 9 La. 512.

And an affidavit made in America signed by mark, where the notary stated that it was read to deponent, was sustained although the English practice is to set forth in the jurat that the attesting witness saw the mark made. Savage v. Hutchinson, 24 L. J. Ch. 232.

spondents that the name of the testatrix, which appears in the body of the will is not "near" the mark, and therefore that the use of the mark to represent her name was not authorized. The only conceivable object of requiring the name to be written "near" the mark, is to show what name the mark is intended to represent. In this case it clearly appears that the mark was intended to represent the name of the testatrix. It is therefore near enough to her name, as written in the body of the will, to satisfy the requirement of section 14 of the Civil Code.

It is further contended that the mark was unauthorized, because the testatrix knew how to write, though she was physically unable to do so; and, from an extract from the opinion of the learned judge who decided the case, copied into respondents' brief, it would appear that the decision rested upon this ground. The extract is as follows: "In the case at bar it is especially proper to enforce the strict letter of the law, as it appears that the proposed paper was written and witnessed and marked as and for the act of a woman who could write, but who was too ill to even write her name. Wills executed under such conditions are presumably the wills of persons other than the one then actually dying." If the presumption mentioned should be indulged in any case, it surely cannot apply to this case, since there is no allegation of fraud, and no question that the testatrix was of sound and disposing mind at the time she made her mark and declared the instrument to be her will. Persons who know how to write may become physically incapable of writing their names by reason of rheumatism, or paralysis of the hands, and other causes besides general physical debility, though of sound mind; and it seems unreasonable that the legislature intended to exclude all such persons from the privilege of subscribing a will or other instrument by a mark. The language of the Code is, "when the person cannot write." This fairly includes all persons who are unable to write from any cause, even though they know how to write. I think the orders appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders appealed from are reversed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

NEWARK PASSENGER R. CO., Pff
in Err.,

v.

Fannie BLOCH.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Essex County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed

Statement by Magie, J.:

Fanny Bloch, the defendant in error, brought an action of tort against the Newark Passenger Railway Company, the plaintiff in error, in the Essex circuit, to recover damages for an injury received from a car of the company running in a public street. After the evidence was all in, counsel for the railway company requested the judge to direct a verdict in its favor. The request was refused, and exception was taken. Other exceptions were taken to the charge, and to refusals to charge as requested. After judgment in favor of defendant in error, the cause was removed by writ of error to the supreme court, and error was assigned on the exceptions. The judgment was there affirmed.

Mr. A. Q. Keasbey, for plaintiff in error:

The testimony shows that plaintiff was injured because she ran hastily across the street diagonally looking backward when warned, and plunging directly upon the car, before it could possibly be stopped. Therefore, the court erred in refusing to direct the jury to render a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the whole evidence showed contributory

1. When a trial judge is requested to nonsuit or direct a verdict in the trial of an action to enforce a liability for negligence, his duty is to determine whether facts have been established by evidence from which negligence may be reasonably inferred. If the real facts are in substantial dispute the case cannot be taken from the jury.

2. The rule requiring one exercising his lawful rights, in the place where the exercise of lawful rights by others may put him in peril, to use such precaution and care for his safety as a reasonably prudent man would use under the circumstances, is the measure of duty for one who crosses a public highway on foot. He must use his powers of observation to discover approaching vehicles, and his judgment how and when to cross without collision, but his observation need not extend beyond the distance within which vehicles moving at lawful speed would endanger him. If obstacles temporarily intervene to prevent observation, he should wait until the required observation can be made.

3. Street-cars propelled by electricity, and running along land burdened only with the easement of a public highway, cannot be run at a rate of speed incompatible with the lawful and customary use of the highway by others with reasonable safety.

*Headnotes by MAGIE, J.

NOTE.—The above is in view of the wonderful extension of electric car routes, a very important case on the lawful speed of electric cars as well as on the negligence of a person who is struck by negligence on the part of the plaintiff and no negligence on the part of the defendant.

Although the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, whereby the plaintiff was injured, yet, if the plaintiff was guilty of any negligence or want of care which contributed to the injury he cannot recover.

Drake v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 441; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Righter, 42 N. J. L. 180.

That one may walk upon a sidewalk and, relying on its continuity being unbroken for its whole width, may, without being guilty of negligence, permit his attention to be diverted from the pavement in front of him, is undoubtedly settled law. But such a rule is inapplicable to a pedestrian crossing a street used for the passage of vehicles drawn by horses. He is bound to look in the direction in which he is moving and to observe approaching vehicles.

Sheets v. Connolly Street R. Co. 54 N. J. L. 518.

The rule of law, with respect to steam railroads, is not based upon the exclusive character of the right of way enjoyed by a steam railroad, but upon the fact that the public convenience requires that the trains should run at a high rate of speed, and that public safety requires that people crossing the tracks should take care to avoid collisions.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Righter, supra.

The horse car has as good a right to the use of its tracks as the steam car has to the use of the railroad at a street crossing. Its use is, to a certain extent, exclusive. It has the right of way of necessity, because it cannot turn off the track.

Camden Horse R. Co. v. Citizens Coach Co. 28 N. J. Eq. 145; Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 Duer, 683, 20 N. Y. 65, 75 Am. Dec. 375; Thomp. Neg. § 397; Whart. Neg. 820; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 462.

If the injury was occasioned in any degree by the conduct of the plaintiff herself in crossing in an incautious and improper manner, defendant will be entitled to the verdict.

Whatever distinction may be drawn between the steam road and the electric railway traversing the streets of a city under present conditions, with respect to the duty of pedestrians crossing their tracks, it must be held that some degree of care is necessary, and it cannot be sound law to hold that in the one case a person crossing must stop, look, and listen for a train that is visible or audible, and in the other to refuse to charge a jury that any duty of caution whatever is required and to charge that if he steps in front of a rapidly moving car approaching in plain sight without seeing it until it is upon him and is injured, the culpable negligence of the driver may be inferred.

The negligence of a minor not a mere child will defeat recovery as in the case of adults.

Nagle v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 88 Pa. 35, 83 Am. Rep. 413; Atlas Engine Works v. Randall, 100 Ind. 298, 50 Am. Rep. 798; Burke v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 49 Barb. 529.

A street railway company is not liable for injuries to a child who its motorman sees standing five feet away from the track, and who suddenly breaks loose from its companions and runs across the track, where the motorman uses all the means then at his command to stop the car.

Paducah Street R. Co. v. Adkins, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 425.

A street railway company is not liable for the death of a person who on a clear night stops behind a cable car going in one direction in front of another going in the opposite direction, having a bright headlight and visible for a long distance, although it was proceeding at a high speed and the gripman having seen such person standing at the side of the track engaged in conversation has turned his head away.

Scott v. Third Ave. R. Co. 41 N. Y. S. R. 152.

The gripman on a cable street-car is not bound to anticipate that children on the sidewalk will run suddenly towards the track; nor is it absolutely his duty to stop the car at once if he sees a boy running towards the track, but he may exercise his judgment to determine whether the boy will see the car and stop; and if he acts as a reasonable and prudent gripman ought, and makes every effort he can to avoid the injury, the company will not be liable for injuries to such boy.

Mr. Edward Q. Keasbey, also for plaintiff in error:

Messrs. Louis Hood and Samuel Kalsch, for defendant in error:

An ordinary railway has a proprietary right in its track. It owns its roadbed, which it acquires by process of condemnation. Its tracks cannot be used by ordinary vehicles. The only right which the public has, is the right to cross the tracks at the street crossings. It operates its road with a power not easily controlled. A railroad company has the exclusive use of its tracks and roadbed. The legislature prescribes what duties a railway company owes at street crossings.

See Rev. 1877, p. 910, pl. 6, 11, p. 920, § 67; Citizens Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 33 N. J. Eq. 274, 36 Am. Rep. 542.

A street railway has no proprietary right in its roadbed. Their tracks are used in common by their cars and the traveling public. Its use of the public highway is merely in aid of the identical use for which the street was cre ated, and not a new and independent one; and for this reason an abutting owner to a street railway is not entitled to damages.

Lynam v. Union R. Co. 114 Mass. 83; Shea v. St. Paul City R. Co. (Minn.) July 7, 1892; Ehrisman v. East Harrisburg City Pass. R. Co. 17 L. R. A. 448, 150 Pa. 180; Citizens Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. supra.

Defendants were authorized to exercise their rights, not to the exclusion of the public, but having regard to the rights of the public in the public streets.

Citizens Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. supra.

Street-cars are in the main governed by the same rules as other vehicles on the street, with such modifications as grow out of the necessities of the situation. Where the cars are propelled by electricity, the duty resting upon the street railroad is not modified. Their motormen must be on the alert, not only at street crossings but everywhere upon the tracks, to see that citizens are not run down and injured.

Shea v. St. Paul City R. Co. supra; McClain v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 118 N. Y. 459; Gallagher v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 24 N. Y. S. R. 746; North Hudson R. Co. v. Isley, 49 N. J. L. 468; Ehrisman v. East Harrisburg City R. Co. 17 L. R. A. 448, 150 Pa. 180; Chicago West. Div. R. Co. v. Ingraham, 83 Ill. App. 351.

On the other hand, the traveler must use due care to keep out of the way of the street-car. In crossing the street of a crowded city he is not bound to wait until all the vehicles are out of the street before he attempts to cross, for if such a rule prevailed he would be compelled during the whole of his life to stay on one side of the street. He must fairly act in a reasonable manner respecting the right of a street railway. He is bound to use reasonable care under the circumstances and do what a prudent man under the circumstances would do.

McClain v. Brooklyn City R. Co. supra; Fenton v. Second Ave. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 625; Fleckenstein v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 105 N. Y. 655; North Hudson R. Co. v. Isley, supra; Shea v. St. Paul City R. Co. supra; Shapleigh v. Wyman, 184 Mass. 118; Bowser v. Wellington, 126 Mass. 391; Creamer v. West End Street R. Co. 16 L. R. A. 490, 156 Mass. 820; Chicago City R. Co. v. Robinson, 4 L. R. A. 126, 127 Ill. 9; Moebus v. Herrmann, 108 N. Y. 854.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that it is the duty of a person crossing a highway upon which street cars are operated to look and listen—for in this case the plaintiff did look and listen—may the plaintiff cross even if there be an approaching car? It is patent, in view of the condition which a much traveled highway presents, that one may cross.

Fenton v. Second Ave. R. Co. supra; Wells v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 58 Hun. 899.

It is the rule in steam railways that when a railroad company has created extra danger it is bound to use extra precautions; and if the track is put in a position where trains, when close to their transit over a public street or road cannot be seen, that is an extra danger calling for more than ordinary cautionary signals.

New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Randel, 47 N. J. L. 144.

Where street-car tracks are in close proximity, to run a car or train of cars in one direction at rapid speed, and without signal or warning, over a sidewalk crossing, while a car or train bound in the opposite direction is discharging passengers at such crossing, and where, as in this case, the view of the approaching train is obstructed by the standing cars from which the person injured has just alighted, is surely conduct which fairly tends to prove culpable negligence, even though the rate of speed of such approaching train does not exceed that which is permitted by ordinance, and it cannot be said, as matter of law, that such conduct is not negligence.

Plaintiff had a right to rely also upon the defendant's running its cars at a safe rate of speed and to give some warning or signal on approaching a crossing.

Orange & N. H. R. Co. v. Ward, 47 N. J. L. 563.

The rule of law in regard to the negligence of an adult and the rule of law in regard to that of an infant of tender years is quite different.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In support of the assignment of errors founded on the exception to the refusal of the trial judge to direct a verdict for plaintiff in error, it is insisted that the evidence (all of which is contained in the bill of exceptions) showed that there was no negligence on its part producing the injury for which the action was brought, but that there was negligence on the part of the defendant in error producing, or contributing to produce, her injury. In reviewing a judgment founded on a verdict directed by the trial judge after the whole evidence was in, this court declared that a jury should only be controlled in its verdict by a peremptory instruction when the testimony is of such a conclusive character as would compel the court, in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, to set aside a verdict in opposition thereto, or, as the learned chancellor who delivered the opinion said: "To put it more forcibly and more accurately, if the evidence be such that the court would set aside any number of verdicts rendered against it, the jury may be controlled." Crue v. Caldwell, 52 N. J. L. 215. This rule must furnish the test of the propriety of refusing a peremptory direction to find a verdict. It has been questioned elsewhere whether, in actions to enforce a liability arising from negligence, the trial judge can withdraw from the jury, by nonsuit or direction for a verdict, the question of negligence, which is a mixed question of law and fact. In this state the power of the trial judge to nonsuit has been exercised and approved for many years in a long line of cases too familiar to need to be referred to. The power to direct a verdict is identical with, and rests upon the same foundation as, the power to nonsuit. When in such cases the trial judge is requested to nonsuit or to direct a verdict, his duty is, as was well expressed by Lord Chancellor Cairns in Metropolitan R. Co. v. Jackson, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 193, to say whether any facts have been established by evidence from which negligence may be reasonably inferred. If none, there is no case to go to a jury; but if, from facts established, negligence may reasonably and legitimately be inferred, it is for the jury to say whether from those facts negligence ought to be inferred. In performing this function the trial judge must take care not to trench on the peculiar province of the jury to determine questions of fact, and must bear in mind that the question is not whether he would infer negligence from the established facts, but whether negligence can be reasonably and legitimately inferred therefrom by the jury. It follows that, if the real facts have not been established by the evidence but remain in substantial dispute, the trial judge must submit them, and the inferences to be drawn from those which the jury find established, to the determination of the jury. Moebus v. Becker, 46 N. J. L. 41; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Shelton, 55 N. J. L. 342. When this request was made, it was obviously impossible for the trial judge to say what facts had been established. The evidence was contradictory to a degree unusual even in cases of this sort. It was impossible of reconciliation, and the real facts could only be determined by the jury settling the credit to be given to witnesses, and weighing and comparing their variant testimony. Under such circumstances it would have been error to withdraw the case from the jury.

The argument in behalf of the plaintiff in error is next addressed to an exception taken to the ruling of the trial judge upon a request to charge. To make the request intelligible, it should be stated that the evidence of defendant in error in respect to the mode in which she received her injury was that she was struck and run over by a car of plaintiff in error, propelled by electricity, and running on the west-bound or north street-car track in Springfield avenue, in Newark; that, when struck, she was crossing the avenue from south to north on a crosswalk at the intersection of Prince street with the avenue; that an east-bound car running on the south street-car track had stopped upon the crossing, and she had waited until it passed, when she went on, "looking both sides;" that, not seeing any west-bound car, she stepped on that track, and was immediately struck and run over. It appeared by the evidence of witnesses called by her that the east-bound car stopped at the crossing and went on, and the west-bound car passed it, running at great speed, and without giving signals; one witness estimated the speed at fifteen miles an hour. The request in question was as follows: "If the jury believe the account of the plaintiff and her witnesses as to the fact that one car stopped at Prince street and passed the other below that street, it was the duty of plaintiff to wait long enough before crossing to allow the down car to pass far enough for her to see whether another was coming; and if she neglected that duty she was guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover, although the jury may believe that the up car was going at an unusual rate of speed,—the track being straight, and the car visible far enough to avoid it at any possible speed." The judge declined to charge in that respect otherwise than he had charged, and this exception was taken. The request is open to criticism as asserting a fact respecting the distance at which a car was visible, which was in dispute. But it may be considered, however, as raising the question of the duty of the injured person under the circumstances above set out, and whether the request correctly states that duty.

It is first contended that the question of duty in this case is affected by the fact that defendant in error was crossing a highway along which cars propelled by electricity constantly ran. It is argued that the duty to take precaution against danger varies with the degree of peril; that the lawful use of a highway by such cars has, by reason of their running at greater speed, created additional danger to others using the highway; and that their duty in respect to such danger has thus been enhanced and enlarged. It is even insisted that the duty of persons traversing highways on which such cars run is like that imposed on persons passing along a highway where it is crossed at grade by a railroad operated by steam power. It is not pretended, and the case does not show, that plaintiff in error has acquired by legislative grant any right to run its cars in the highway at any rate of speed. Such a grant to use a rate of speed in highways which would be destructive of its customary use by others, and incompatible therewith, would not be within legislative competency, except on compensation made to the owners of the land traversed by the highway. Public highways have been acquired by dedication or condemnation for the use of the public in passing and repassing. Up to very recent times the public have used the rights of passing and repassing on highways, on foot or on horseback, or in vehicles drawn by horses or other animals. When authority was granted to lay rails on highways, and to run thereon cars drawn by horses for the carriage of passengers, it was long questioned whether such a use of the highway did not impose an additional burden upon the land, and whether such a grant could be made without compensation. It was finally settled by the weight of authority that the use of the highway by such cars was only a modification of the original use to which it had been devoted, and that no additional burden was imposed by such grant. That doctrine was adopted in this state. Citizens Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co., 83 N. J. Eq. 267, 36 Am. Rep. 542. But it must be conceded that a grant of a right to use the highway in a mode incompatible with its customary use by the public would impose an additional burden, and could not be made without compensation. The public has acquired such rights in the use of highways as the owners of the lands traversed thereby have yielded or been deprived of, and it may not be restricted in the enjoyment of such rights by a use of the highway inconsistent and incompatible therewith, at least without legislative grant. Whether the public rights thus acquired may be thus diminished or destroyed by legislative grant when no compensation is made to landowners is not a question involved in this case, and no opinion is intended to be expressed thereon. As has been stated, no legislative grant in this case is shown. The contention of plaintiff in error rather takes this shape: It asserts that its cars, propelled by electricity, are capable of being run at greater speed than other vehicles in the highway, and that the public convenience demands, for passengers carried in such cars, what is called "rapid transit;" and it draws the inference that its cars may therefore be run at such speed as will satisfy this public demand, and that other persons lawfully using the highway in the customary modes must govern themselves and use the highway accordingly. Judicial opinions have been cited to us which appear to support these extraordinary propositions. I am unable to subscribe to the notion which carried to its logical conclusion, would permit this company, and other companies running cars in public highways propelled by electricity, cables, etc., to run at any rate of speed which they may deem a demand, undefined and unrecognized by law, to require. The right to use the highways by such cars is not paramount to the rights of others in the customary use thereof. It must be used in a manner consistent with such rights of others. Such a paramount right as is contended for could not, in my judgment, be granted without compensation, and it surely cannot be acquired from a vague notion of a public demand for rapid transit. There is no just analogy between the right of a street railway running such cars longitudinally along the highway and the right of a railroad company running its trains across a highway at grade. The latter company acquires by condemnation a right to run its tracks over the lands covered by the highway, and so burdens it with an additional easement. By legislative grant it uses the easement so acquired in the passage of trains run at great speed, and to a certain extent the public easement of passage is, at such crossings, modified. No grant for the acquisition and use of such additional easement has been made to the street railways, and in the absence of such grant no right to run cars at excessive rates of speed exists. Their only right in this respect is to run at such rate as will not interfere with the customary use of the highway by others of the public with safety.

Let us now consider whether the request under consideration correctly states the duty of defendant in error under the circumstances supposed. The duty devolving on one using a highway for passage on foot varies with circumstances which are infinitely various. It may be of one degree when the highway is a quiet country road, and of another degree when it is the crowded street of a great city. It may differ at different hours of the day, with respect to different vehicles and the differing rates of speed at which they are moving, and by reason of different opportunities of observation. It is impossible, in my judgment, to classify these variant circumstances, and to lay down a precise rule as to the degree of care required in each class. In dealing with cases of this sort we must recur to the general rule which requires one, in exercising his lawful rights in a place where the exercise of like rights by others may put him in peril, to use such precaution and care for his safety as a reasonably prudent man would use under the circumstances. From this rule it may be said, in general, that one who passes on foot along a sidewalk or footpath of a highway must use his powers of observation in respect to other passers thereon, and a reasonable judgment to avoid collision. In crossing the roadway a foot passenger must likewise use his powers of observation to discover approaching vehicles, and a like judgment when and how to cross without collision. In the latter case, doubtless, the degree of care required exceeds that required in the former case, not because the right of the foot passenger and the right of the driver of a vehicle differ, but because of the circumstances. The vehicle usually travels at a greater speed; it cannot be so quickly stopped or diverted from its course. A street-car cannot deviate from its track, while the passer on foot may quickly stop, turn aside, or even retrace his steps. So it may also be generally said that, if obstacles temporarily intervene to prevent observation, reasonable prudence would dictate delay until such observation as is requisite has been made.

But the request before us brings into question the extent to which one crossing the roadway on foot must extend his observation. Its claim is that such observation must be extended to any approaching car, no matter how distant. But this is obviously an exaggerated notion of the duty required. The most prudent man would never suppose himself required to thus observe. If such a rule of duty were adopted and practiced in a crowded city, the crossing of many streets would be barred to pedestrians for a great part of the time. The general rule to which we have recurred does not justify this excessive view of the duty required. It will require one crossing the roadway on foot to extend his observation only to the distance within which vehicles proceeding at customary and reasonably safe speed would threaten his safety. Under this rule the defendant in error should doubtless have waited until she could have observed any westbound car which, traveling at customary and reasonably safe speed, might imperil her in crossing; but she was not bound to delay until she could have seen any car on that track at any distance, coming with excessive and dangerous speed. The charge was ample and correct on this subject, and the instruction asked for was properly refused.

The trial judge was further requested to charge that any one approaching a crossing must take notice of it, and exercise a reasonable measure of care to avoid contact with the moving car; and "if, by looking, the plaintiff could have seen and so avoided an approaching car, she cannot recover." The request was not refused, but the trial judge said that he had "charged substantially according to his understanding of the law on that subject." An exception was then taken to the charge so far as it did not embrace "that secondary proposition." Such an exception does not draw into review an omission in the charge. If counsel conceived that a pertinent proposition of law had been omitted, he should have specifically requested the desired instruction, and excepted to a refusal. If the proposition in question had been requested and refused, I think there would have been no error. It is a proposition applicable to the crossing of the highway by the lines of a steam railroad. It is inapplicable to the crossing of a street railway, the cars on which must not exceed such speed as will permit the lawful, customary use of the highway by others with reasonable safety. Prudence doubtless requires one about to cross a railroad track to use his eyes to observe any approaching car within his vision; but, as has been shown, prudence does not require one crossing the track of a street railway to extend his observation to the whole line of track within his vision, but only to such distance as, assuming the required care in their management, approaching cars would imperil his crossing.

Other requests to charge, the judge declined to give otherwise than already given. The charge correctly stated the law in the particulars covered by these requests, and there was no error in declining to repeat, in other language, the doctrines already laid down as law.

The remaining exceptions are to portions of the charge which, it is urged, tended to improperly affect the jury. But the charge imposed on the jury, in the plainest terms, the duty of deciding the disputed questions of fact, and settling the inferences to be drawn therefrom. When that is done, comments, or even expressions of opinion, by the judge upon the evidence, are not open to exception. Engle v. State, 50 N. J. L. 272, and cases cited. I may add that, if the rule were different, the language of the charge is not, in my opinion, open to any criticism of this sort.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

L. D. LOWE and Wife, Appts.,
v.
James HARRIS.

(112 N. C. 472.)

1. A statute allowing parole testimony to identify land insufficiently described in a contract is not retrospective.

2. A receipt which was void for uncertainty as a contract for land cannot be made valid by subsequent statute allowing parole testimony to identify the land.

(Burvell and Clark, JJ., dissent.)

(May 5, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wilkes County in NOTE.—Constitutionality of statute legalizing an invalid private contract.

This note will attempt to collect the authorities upon the power of a legislature to make enforceable an attempted contract which for any cause the parties failed to make enforceable by their own action.

Under Federal Constitution.

So far as the federal courts have passed upon the question they seem to agree that there is nothing in the Federal Constitution to prohibit a state legislature from making a contract enforceable which otherwise would not be so. And the cause of the difficulty seems to be immaterial. For the same rule has been applied in cases where the contract was void because against the policy of the state and where it was simply unenforceable because not having the formal requisites prescribed by statute.

It has been held that the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit the passing of retrospective laws, or of laws divesting antecedent vested rights of property. Watson v. Mercer, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 88, 8 L. ed. 876.

Consequently the attempt has been most frequently made to defeat the statute on the ground that it impaired the obligation of a contract.

In Satterlee v. Matthewson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 880, 7 L. ed. 468, affirming 16 Serg. & R. 169, a lease had been entered into in Pennsylvania of land claimed under a Connecticut title, which, according to the decisions of the courts of Pennsylvania, was void. The tenant subsequently acquired a title under a grant from the state of Pennsylvania and the legislature then passed an act validating the contract of lease. This act was attacked on the ground favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The defense to the action was that defendant purchased the lands described in the complaint from Mrs. A. P. Calloway, the mother of the feme plaintiff, and went into possession under his contract, cleared the land and made improvements thereon. He paid all of the purchase money except $6 and received the following receipt: "Wilkesboro, N. C., April 19th, 1880. James Harris has paid me twenty dollars on his land. Owes me six more on it. A. P. Calloway."

Defendant was an ignorant colored man and relied on the honesty of Mrs. Calloway to perfect his title. Mrs. Calloway had only a life estate in the land and both she and the feme plaintiff, her daughter, encouraged defendant to make payments on the land, and when he objected to paying more without his deed both told him to have no fears but go on and pay, and as soon as the payments were completed he should have the deed. Subsequently the feme plaintiff bought a sixty-eight-acre tract of land from Mrs. Calloway and from the other remainderman, which tract included the land previously sold to defendant. At the time defendant bought the land, the price paid was its full value.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. L. D. Lowe, for appellants:

His honor erred in allowing the defendant to set up a parol contract for the sale of land, and allowing him to introduce the receipt in question.

Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. 77; Mallory v. Mallory, 45 N. C. 80; Plummer v. Owens, Id. 254; Allen v. Chambers, 89 N. C. 125.

This case is almost identical with the case of Fortesque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, and in this case it was held: "There is no land described in this receipt, and the receipt being vague and indefinite, parol testimony was insufficient to fit the location to the description."

See also Holler v. Richards, 103 N. C. 545; Browning v. Berry, 10 L. R. A. 736, 107 N. C. 231.

His honor erred in holding that the Statute, N. C. Laws 1891, chap. 465, § 1, covered this case, for the reason that this alleged parol contract, if made at all, was entered into about the year 1880, nearly or quite eleven years before this statute was passed, and this suit was commenced more than a year before this act took effect.

Leak v. Gay, 107 N. C. 468; Edwards v. Kearzey, 79 N. C. 664.

Mr. W. W. Barber for appellee.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The extreme limit of liberality in sanctioning the admission of parol proof to explain ambiguous descriptions in deeds and contracts for the sale and conveyance of land was attained in Carson v. Ray, 52 N. C. 609, 78 Am. Dec. 267, where the premises were described as "my house and lot in the town of Jefferson," and the plaintiff was permitted to show that the grantor had but one house and lot within the boundaries of that place.

that it was an unjust exercise of legislative power; was retrospective; was an exercise by the legislature of a judicial function and created a contract where none previously existed, as well as impaired the obligation of a contract. The Supreme Court of the United States said: "It is not easy to perceive how a law which gives validity to a void contract can be said to impair the obligation of that contract," and held that the act was not void on that ground. It furthermore held that the law could not be condemned under the Constitution of the United States as being retrospective or as divesting vested rights.

A statute validating the contracts of an institution, which has without authority engaged in the banking business, does not impair the obligation of a contract. Milne v. Huber, 3 McLean, 212.

An act validating loans made contrary to the policy of a state by a foreign corporation does not impair the obligation of a contract. Gross v. United States Mortg. Co. 108 U. S. 477, 27 L. ed. 796.

A statute providing that deeds of conveyance made by married women shall not be void because of a defective acknowledgment thereof does not impair the obligation of any contract, and it cannot be pronounced void under the Constitution of the United States. Watson v. Mercer, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 88, 8 L. ed. 876.

Curing a mere formal defect in the acknowledgment of a married woman's release of dower does not impair the obligation of a contract. Raverty v. Fridge, 3 McLean, 230; Doe v. Nelson, 3 McLean, 383.

In Carpenter v. Dexter, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 513, 19 L. ed. 426, a statute validating acknowledgments to past deeds taken by officers who at the time had no authority was upheld, apparently without question as to its constitutionality.

The state courts have not always followed the doctrine of the federal courts to its full extent.

Thus in Pearce v. Patton, 7 B. Mon. 162, 45 Am. Dec. 61, in which it was attempted to make applicable to the acknowledgment by a married woman of a deed attempting to convey her separate property a curative statute, the court held that the deed relied on as passing her title was a nullity as to her and her heirs, and intimates that the statute impaired the obligation of the contracts of conveyance under which she held title and that it impaired a vested right in her heirs and was void, and refused to follow the doctrine of the United States Court, both on the question of impairing obligation of contracts and also as to the definition of ex post facto laws.

But the doctrine that the validating of a contract does not impair its obligation has been accepted in a majority of the cases in state courts even to the extent of holding that a state law which makes valid a void contract does not impair the obligation of a contract within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. Welch v. Wadsworth, 80 Conn. 149, 79 Am. Dec. 339.

Consequently resort has been had to the provisions of the state constitutions in most of the questions in which an enforcement of such a contract has been resisted, and the state decisions are not fully in accord even when the constitutional provisions are similar.

Retroactive laws and vested rights.

In attacking validating statutes most reliance has been placed on the claim that the laws are retroactive and that they impair vested rights. If the state constitution in terms prohibits retroactive laws much legislation will fail which would otherwise be valid.

If retrospective laws are prohibited by the state

In discussing that case, and distinguishing it from Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. 77, Judge Battle, delivering the opinion of the court, took the ground that in connection with the designation of the town in which the lot was located, given in the deeds passed upon in both of them (in the one case Hillsboro, and in the other Jefferson), the description had been made more definite by use of the personal pronoun "my," so as to open the way for proof that the grantor had but one lot in that village, which he meant to refer to as the place of his residence. The contract under consideration is in the following words: "Wilkesboro, N. C., Apr. 19, 1880. James Harris has paid the twenty dollars on his land. Owes me six more on it." As the location of the land is not fixed, directly or inferentially, within the state of North Carolina or within the United States, the receipt is still more vague than either of the instruments discussed by Judge Battle, and it may be assumed that no one will venture to maintain that it was not void for uncertainty before the passage of the Act of 1891. Indeed, the case of Fortieque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, is authority for holding that no right, title, or interest in any land passed to the defendant upon its signature or delivery to him, since the receipt relied on by the defendant was almost identical with that under consideration. The policy of the law in existence before that statute was enacted was to remove as far as possible the temptation to perjury by permitting parol proof to be used in aid of a defective description only where it pointed by its terms to some extrinsic evidence for explanation of its ambiguous meaning. Allen v. Chambers, 89 N. C. 125; Mussey v. Belisle, 24 N. C. 170; Leigh v. Crump, 86 N. C. 299.

The principle stated is fully conceded in Perry v. Scott, 109 N. C. 374, where, though the distinction drawn by Judge Battle between cases where the personal pronoun constitutes or does not form a part of the description is disapproved, the necessity for indicating the locality by some means is clearly recognized. The receipt being utterly ineffectual to transfer any interest whatever to the defendant in 1880, when it was delivered to him, both the legal and equitable estate in the land remained vested in Mrs. A. P. Calloway for life, with remainder in fee in her children. The legislature unquestionably had and has the power to modify or repeal the whole of the statute of frauds in so far as it applies to future contracts for the sale of land, but its authority to give the repealing statute a retroactive operation is as certainly restricted by the fundamental rule that no law will be allowed to so operate as to disturb or destroy rights already vested. Did the legislature intend that the Act of 1891 (chap. 465) should be construed to operate retrospectively, and, if so, is the law, in so far as it relates to pre-existing rights, unconstitutional? No law which divests property out of one person and vests it in another for his own private purposes without the consent of the owner, has ever been held a constitutional exercise of legislative power in constitution, the deed of a person of unsound mind cannot be ratified by subsequent legislation. Routson v. Wolf, 35 Mo. 174.

But in Webb v. Den, 68 U. S. 17 How. 578, 15 L. ed. 36, a statute, enacting that whenever a deed has been registered twenty years or more it shall be presumed to be upon lawful authority no matter what may have been the form of acknowledgment, the effect of which was to admit ancient deeds in evidence as proof of title, although they were defectively acknowledged, was held not to be a retroactive law under the constitution of Tennessee, which the legislature was forbidden to pass.

Different views have been taken upon the question how far such legislation impaired vested rights.

In speaking of a state law validating a sale made under a power of attorney which was at the time ineffectual, the court says "to the objection that such laws violate vested rights of property, it has been forcibly answered that there can be no vested right to do wrong. Claims contrary to justice and equity cannot be regarded as of that character. Consent to remedy the wrong is to be presumed. The only right taken away is the right dishonestly to repudiate an honest contract of conveyance to the injury of the other party. Even where no remedy could be had in the courts, the vested right is usually unattended with the slightest equity." Bandall v. Krieger, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 137, 23 L. ed. 124.

When an act of the legislature goes no further than to bind a party by a contract which he has attempted to enter into, but which was invalid by reason of some personal inability on his part to make it, or through neglect of some legal remedy or in consequence of some ingredient in the contract forbidden by law, it is only a question of policy and not one of constitutional power. United States Mortg. Co. v. Gross, 93 Ill. 483.

attorney, under which her real estate was sold, does not as against her impair the obligation of a contract or divest a vested right. Dentzel v. Waldie, 30 Cal. 138.

When a purchaser has paid for lands and the prior owner is under a moral obligation to convey, the legislature may cure a defective conveyance by retroactive legislation as against such owner, his heirs and widow, but such legislation cannot affect the title of a subsequent bona fide purchaser. Newman v. Samuels, 17 Iowa, 523.

The Constitutions of Ohio, 1851, art. 2, § 23, and Kansas, 1855, art. 4, § 20, authorized laws to enable courts to carry out the manifest intention of parties by curing defects, arising out of want of conformity with the requirements of a statute.

And this provision was held to authorize the insertion in a deed of the name of a married woman which was omitted by mistake. Goshorn v. Purcell, 11 Ohio St. 641.

If the intention of husband and wife is to convey the entirety of land owned by them as tenants in common, and the deed is made to convey only his interest and her dower rights therein, it may be reformed. Smith v. Turpin, 20 Ohio St. 478.

The power to correct and cure a "deed or other conveyance of husband and wife" on account of any error, defect, or omission therein is coextensive with the defect and with the powers the parties themselves possessed. Whatever they could have done and intended to do, the court can do, and whatever mistakes they or the officer have made whereby the intention of the contracting parties has been defeated, may be cured. It is the power to cure and not the power to make deeds. Dengenhart v. Cracraft, 36 Ohio St. 549.

The legislature has power to confirm conveyances defectively executed. Dulany v. Tilghman, 6 Gill & J. 461.

Even in England, where there are no written constitutions, a statute will not commonly be construed to divest vested rights, and, when giving it a retrospective effect may lead to that result, it is allowed to operate prospectively only. Moore v. Phillips, 7 Mees. & W. 536; Couch v. Jeffries, 4 Burr. 2462.

The radical difference between the rules of construction prevailing in the two countries grows out of the fact that the courts in England are forced to concede the supreme and unlimited power of parliament, while in the United States legislatures are bound to observe, and the courts to enforce, the restrictions imposed upon all the co-ordinate branches of the government by the federal and state constitutions. Philosophical writers upon law generally in all countries, however, deny the power of the legislature to pass statutes that impair a right acquired under the law in force at the time of its enactment, and insist that the right to repeal existing laws does not carry with it the power to take away property, the title to which vested under and is protected by them. But the legislature of North Carolina is restrained by article 1, § 10, of the Constitution of the United States, and article 1, § 17, of the Constitution of North Carolina, not only from passing any law that will divest title to land out of one person and vest it in another (except where it is taken for public purposes, after giving just compensation to the owner), but from enforcing any statute which would enable one person to evade or avoid the binding force of his contracts with another, whether executed or executory. Robinson v. Barfield, 6 N. C. 419; Butler v. Com. supra; Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Nesbit, 51 U. S. 10 How. 395, 13 L. ed. 469; Fletcher v. Peck, supra; Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 43, 3 L. ed. 650; Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 519, 4 L. ed. 629.

The first case in which the constitutional inhibition against the passage of a law impairing the obligation of a contract came before the Supreme Court of the United States for construction was Fletcher v. Peck, supra. The legislature of the state of Georgia had, by an Act passed in 1795, granted land to Grinn and others, and the defendant Peck was a purchaser for a valuable consideration, holding through several mesne conveyances under the patentees named in the act. In

A distinction has been made between unauthorized or null conveyances and those which were merely irregular.

Thus it has been held that if a married woman has no power to convey land, an attempted conveyance cannot be ratified by a subsequent statute. Laue v. Soulard, 15 Ill. 123.

If the attempted deed by the married woman is a nullity it cannot be cured, as where the statute requires her to convey her property by her husband joining with her in the conveyance and the husband fails to join in the deed, there is no deed and there can therefore be nothing to cure. Miller v. Hine, 13 Ohio St. 565.

But this distinction is not universally followed for in Pennsylvania it has been held that an unauthorized conveyance by a married woman of her separate estate may be confirmed. Jones' App. 57 Pa. 369.

It is competent for the legislature to render illegality of consideration no defense to an action on any contract. Hill v. Smith, 1 Morris (Iowa) 70.

A statute prohibiting the defense to a suit on a contract that it was made on Sunday, unless the defendant restores whatever of value he received under the contract, is not, as applied to prior contracts, unconstitutional as divesting vested rights. Berry v. Clary, 77 Me. 482.

The statutory defense to a stock-jobbing contract may be taken away by subsequent repeal of the statute. Washburn v. Franklin, 35 Barb. 569.

A contract with a corporation which is invalid because the corporation has not paid to the state the required percentage of its dividends, which failure has resulted in the forfeiture of the corporate franchises, may be rendered enforceable by a subsequent statute. Bleakney v. Farmers & M. Bank, 17 Serg. & R. 64, 17 Am. Dec. 636.

A bond invalid when executed because not bearing the proper stamp may be rendered valid by a subsequent law repealing the requirement for the stamp. State v. Norwood, 12 Md. 186.

In some cases it is held that the repeal of a law rendering a contract void will not validate it. Mays v. Williams, 27 Ala. 267. Such cases, however, do not go far enough to properly come within the scope of this note.

Due process of law.

It has been held that a subscription to the stock of a corporation which is invalid when made because the requisite percentage was not paid at the time cannot be validated by a subsequent statute dispensing with such requirement, because it would be taking property without due process of law. New York & O. M. R. Co. v. Van Horn, 57 N. Y. 473.

But it has also been held that the right to avoid a contract because of noncompliance with a statutory requirement cannot be considered as property, and therefore a statute permitting the affixing at any time of a stamp to a contract, the validity of which depended upon the existence of a stamp, does not deprive one of his property without due process of law. Gibson v. Hibbard, 13 Mich. 214.

Application of the rules to acknowledgments.

Since a deed not properly acknowledged may be as ineffectual as a source of title as though the contract of sale was itself invalid, legislation curing the defects may perhaps be considered with that validating defective contracts. In general the same rules have been applied to both classes of defects.

A deed ineffective because of the failure of the notary to affix his official seal to the acknowledgment may be cured by the legislature. Maxey v. Wise, 25 Ind. 1.

In Logan v. Williams, 76 Ill. 175, without discussing the constitutionality of the act, it was held 1796 the same body enacted a statute repealing the Act of 1795, and declaring it and all grants issued under its provisions null and void, on the ground that its passage was procured by undue influence and corruption. The court held that the Act of 1796 could not be construed to divest the title out of the defendant Peck and invest it in the state, and rested its rulings not only upon the clause of the constitution mentioned, but also upon more general principles arising out of the organic law of all of the states. The court said upon this subject: "To the legislature all legislative power is granted; but the question whether the Act of 1796, transferring the property of an individual to the public, be in the nature of a legislative power, is well worthy of serious reflection." This was the earliest intimation that, if the prohibition had been omitted in the Federal Constitution, the legislature of the state would have had no power to revoke its own grant without the consent of innocent persons holding under it. It has since been held in the appellate courts of the states generally that a law which provides for the transfer of the interest of an individual in land to another person or to the state, except for public purposes, and upon just compensation, is void, because it is in conflict with the provisions of the organic law that the three co-ordinate branches of the government should be kept forever separate and distinct, and that no person should be deprived of his property but by the law of the land. Stanmire v. Taylor, Hoke v. Henderson, King v. Hunter, and

Wesson v. Johnson, supra. It is true that the legislature may alter the remedy if its efficacy is not impaired, or take it away if one that is not calculated to diminish the value of the debt be provided in place of it. Long v. Walker, 105 N. C. 90, and the authorities there cited. The rules of evidence may be changed by legislative enactment, too; but if, by giving a retrospective operation to a statute passed for that purpose, it would divest any right of property that had already accrued, it should be construed to operate prospectively only, if at all. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. p. 195. 1 Kent, Com. 455, says: "A retrospective statute affecting and changing vested rights is very generally considered in this country as founded on unconstitutional principles and consequently inoperative and void." After a legacy had been bequeathed to a married woman, and when, under the law then in force, the husband had a right to it, subject to certain contingencies, the legislature of New York passed an act declaring that the real and personal property of any female then married should be her sole and separate property. The appellate court said: "The application of this statute to this case would be a violation of the constitution of this state, which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Westcott v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202, 62 Am. Dec. 160. While acknowledging the right of the lawmaking power to pass remedial laws, and especially statutes of limitation operating prospectively, the supreme court of Pennsyl-that an act to validate acknowledgments taken by an officer who had no authority to take them would have the effect of rendering the acknowledgment valid.

And generally it is held that a defective acknowledgment to a deed may be validated by a legislative act, if vested rights of third parties are not thereby impaired. Green v. Abraham, 43 Ark. 420; Ferguson v. Williams, 68 Iowa, 717; Barton v. Morris, 15 Ohio, 406; Stevens v. Martin, 18 Pa. 101; Skellinger v. Smith, 1 Wash. Terr. 370.

Some of the courts are, however, inclined to treat curative legislation in this class of cases not as validating the contract but as more nearly affecting the evidence of title.

It has been said that since the bargainor's title is inchoately divested by the execution of the deed, and the acknowledgment of the execution is simply necessary to entitle it to registration, statutes validating imperfect acknowledgments are not unconstitutional though retroactive, because they did not affect rights but only evidence of facts. Montgomery v. Hobson, Meigs, 437.

In discussing the question of the effect of a statute curing the defective acknowledgment of a deed, the supreme court of Iowa said: "Deeds defectively acknowledged, or even without an acknowledgment, are good between the parties to them. The acknowledgment in the manner required by law is essential to admit them to record and make them notice to third persons. If defectively acknowledged and third persons have actual notice of their existence, they are bound by them." Brinton v. Seever, 12 Iowa, 389.

A legislature has power in the absence of any inhibiting constitutional limitation and except as against prior vested rights to cure, by retroactive legislation, defective acknowledgments of deeds in all cases where the purpose of the acknowledgment is the admission of the instrument acknowledged to record or its use in evidence. Summer v. Mitchell, 14 L. R. A. 815, 29 Fla. 179.

There has been some tendency to make a distinction between deeds of married women and those of other persons.

In Grove v. Todd, 41 Md. 683, 20 Am. Rep. 76, a man and wife had executed a deed of his property which was acknowledged before an officer having no authority to take the acknowledgment. Subsequently an act was passed validating defective acknowledgments and the court in discussing the application of such act to the deed in question said that "since the husband might at common law make a deed without an acknowledgment, the curative act would operate against him and his heirs, but that since a wife cannot make a deed except in a particular mode not complied with in this case, her attempted deed was no more than a blank piece of paper, and that upon the death of her husband her right to dower became vested and could not be divested by a subsequent act attempting to validate the acknowledgment.

An acknowledgment by a married woman to a deed of her husband's property, which fails to state that she releases her dower right in the property when the statute requires such a statement, cannot be cured by a subsequent statute, because her dower right is a vested right and can only be divested by her own act in the mode prescribed by the law, or by doing some act which the law has declared shall be attended with a forfeiture of the right. Russell v. Rumsey, 36 Ill. 362.

But a majority of the cases seem to hold that if there is nothing more than a defective acknowledgment it may be cured.

Some early Ohio cases held that the legislature cannot enact a law which shall pass the land of a married woman by an instrument not binding on vanias said: "It would be contrary to the spirit of legislation in Pennsylvania from the date of its charter to the statute in question to deprive a man of his land instantaneously under the pretense of limiting the period within which he should bring his action." Eukin v. Raub, 12 Serg. & R. 340. In Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 494, 51 Am. Dec. 567, Chief Justice Gibson discussed a statute which changed the rules of evidence by providing that every last will and testament made and not finally adjudicated prior to the passage of the act, to which the testator had made his mark or directed his name to be written, should be deemed valid, and admitted to probate on proof of the fact. The learned judge said that the law was "destitute of retroactive force, not only because it was an act of judicial power, but because it contravened the constitutional provision that no man should 'be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by the law of the land.'" Our statute is one providing for a different mode of establishing a deed or contract which may infuse life into a contract void at the option of the party to be charged, just as that act proposed to make operative a void will.

In this state it has been settled that the legislature is not empowered to pass an act that provides for depriving a person of his property in an unexpired term of office even by a general law or amendment to the constitution prescribing a different mode of election, or by creating a new office, and turning over the emoluments and perquisites belonging to the officer during the residue of his term to the incumbent of the newly created place, because an officer has a vested right in his office for the term prescribed by law. Hoke v. Henderson, and King v. Hunter, supra. In Den v. Foy, 5 N. C. 87, this court held that, where escheated land had vested in the trustees of the university, the legislature was restrained by the clause of the Constitution (art. 1, § 17) which declared that no person ought to be deprived of property but by the law of the land from passing an act to take away from that institution the escheated land donated to it by a former statute. In Sutton v. Askew, 66 N. C. 172, 8 Am. Rep. 500, and in Wesson v. Johnson, 66 N. C. 189, it was held that where the land was acquired by the husband, and the marriage was contracted before the passage of the Act of 1868, restoring to married women their common-law right of dower, that statute would not be construed to operate retroactively, because to give such effect to it would interfere with the vested right of the husband to alien without the consent of the wife, and to pass an estate in the land free from incumbrance of an inchoate dower right. So that this court has, in these cases also, distinctly held that no law can be so construed as to take property from one person, except for public use, and after making just compensation, and give it to another, or to incumber the property of one person by her at the time of its execution. Good v. Zercher, 12 Ohio, 384; Silliman v. Cummins, 13 Ohio, 116. But these cases were overruled in Chesnut v. Shane, 16 Ohio, 599, 47 Am. Dec. 387.

And now it is held that a defective acknowledgment of a married woman may be cured. Dengenhart v. Cracraft, 36 Ohio St. 549.

The omission of an officer to certify the separate examination of the wife may be cured. Kilbourn v. Furry, 26 Ohio St. 163.

A statute validating the acknowledgment of deeds of married women is not void as divesting vested rights. Johnson v. Richardson, 44 Ark. 385.

The failure to state in the certificate of acknowledgment that the contents of the deed were made known to the grantor, a married woman, may be lawfully cured. Barnet v. Barnet, 15 Serg. & R. 72, 16 Am. Dec. 516; Tate v. Stooltzfoos, 13 Serg. & R. 36, 16 Am. Dec. 546.

The certificate of acknowledgment to the deed of a married woman may properly be amended so as to give validity to it. Stroud v. McDaniel, 12 Lea. 617.

An imperfect acknowledgment by a married woman may be ratified. Matthewson v. Spencer, 8 Sneed, 513; Rainey v. Gordon, 6 Humph. 345.

Though the statute must be complied with in order to pass title to a married woman's separate property, it does not necessarily follow that an instrument willingly executed by her and actually acknowledged as required by law is absolutely void simply because of the officer's failure to make the proper certificate, which the facts authorized and which the law required him to make, and a statute may properly authorize the correction of the certificate. Johnson v. Taylor, 60 Tex. 380.

Application of the rules to contracts unenforceable because usurious.

a law forbidding the defense of usury, states that such laws have been upheld as against all objections as depriving parties of vested rights or impairing the obligation of contracts; that the privilege of resisting payment belonged to the remedy and formed no element in the rights inhering in the contract; and that the right which the curative or repealing act takes away is the right in the party to avoid his contract,—a naked legal right which it is usually unjust to insist upon and which no constitutional provision was ever designed to protect.

A statute taking away the defense of usury will not be declared invalid either on the ground that it makes contracts good that were before illegal, or on the ground that it impairs vested rights. Woodruff v. Scruggs, 27 Ark. 23, 11 Am. Rep. 777.

A statute prohibiting setting up the defense of usury is not unconstitutional. Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 663.

And the weight of authority is that in the absence of a constitutional provision prohibiting the passage of retrospective laws, a contract, void for usury, may be validated. Savings Bank of New Haven v. Bates, 8 Conn. 506; Mechanics & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Assn. v. Allen, 23 Conn. 97; Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 149, 79 Am. Dec. 239; Andrews v. Russell, 7 Blackf. 474; Hays v. Walker, Id. 540; Grimes v. Doe, 8 Blackf. 371; Wood v. Kennedy, 19 Ind. 63; Perrin v. Lyman, 23 Ind. 16; Baughner v. Nelson, 9 Gill, 289, 62 Am. Dec. 604; Wilson v. Hardesty, 1 Md. Ch. 66; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9.

Some of the usury laws have not avoided the contract but have simply declared a forfeiture. In respect to such a law it has been held that a law permitting the recovery of the legal rate of interest upon a contract entered into, when a law declaring a forfeiture of three times the interest reserved in case of usury takes away no vested right, for the law recognizes no such right in giving another such right or interest in it as will interfere with his pre-existing power to alien. Hughes v. Hodges, 102 N. C. 236. In Leak v. Gay, 107 N. C. 478, it was said that "when the effect of a law is to divest the vested right of property, except for the use of the public, and then only after providing for payment of its value, it will be declared void." In the case of Stanmire v. Taylor, 48 N. C. 207, it appeared that the legislature had passed an act purporting to give validity to a certain grant theretofore issued, but which had been declared void by the court in Stanmire v. Powell, 85 N. C. 312. The act was passed by the General Assembly in October, 1852 (after this court, in June previous, had declared the grant relied on by the plaintiff in the then pending suit to be void), and provided that the grant should be thereby validated and declared "good and effectual to pass all the right of the state in and to the said land, any law to the contrary notwithstanding." The defendant held under a subsequent valid grant from the state. Chief Justice Nash, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If the Act of 1852 [declaring plaintiff's grant valid] was intended to give life to the void grant under which the plaintiff claims the premises, by giving a construction to it, the act was a judicial one, which it was not in the power of the legislature to pronounce. If it be considered purely a legislative grant to the lessor of the plaintiff, then it violates the contract it made with the defendant Taylor, and is void."

It is contended, however, that the legislature has the power to pass remedial acts, and especially is authorized to so alter the rules of evidence as to afford relief to litigants. But the limit to such authority is transcended, said Judge Seawell, when a law is enacted which in its enforcement has the effect of depriving "one individual of his property without his consent and without compensation, and transferring it to another." Robinson v. Barfield, supra. The principle governing this controversy was as clearly stated by Judge Daniel, in an opinion delivered in the same case, when he said that "the transfer of property from one individual, who is the owner, to another individual, is a judicial, not a legislative, act. When the legislature presumes to touch private property for any other than public purposes, and then only in case of necessity, and upon rendering full compensation, it will behoove the judiciary to check its eccentric course by refusing to give any effect to such acts."

We think that where a deed or contract purporting to convey passes an equitable interest in land, it is not upon its face void, and the legislature has the power to enact remedial laws regulating the probate and registration of such instruments, though the incidental effect may be to admit to registration a deed or contract which could not pre-penalties, and it does not violate the obligation of a contract. Parmelee v. Lawrence, 43 Ill. 381.

There are, however, decisions on the other side of this question. In Florida a statute invalidating usurious contracts was repealed, and the court in discussing the effect of the repealing statute on prior contracts said: "Would we not by applying the principle contended for give the repealing law an ex post facto operation and really impair the obligation of contracts? Is not the exoneration by virtue of the law governing the contract at the time it was entered into a right vested by the law of the land and can it now be divested by posterior legislation,—and the contract was not enforced although there was nothing in that case to show that there was anything more than a simple repeal of the statute, with no intention on the part of the legislature to validate prior contracts. Mitchell v. Doggett, 1 Fla. 356.

If a statute makes void a contract in which usury is reserved, the contract cannot be validated by a subsequent statute. Morton v. Rutherford, 18 Wis. 290.

A contract entered into while a law is in force, which provides that if usury is reserved only the amount actually loaned may be recovered back, cannot be made enforceable for the full amount of both principal and interest by the passage of a subsequent statute. Gilliland v. Phillips, 1 S. C. N. S. 152.

And the course of dealings between the parties may have vested a right which cannot be subsequently taken away.

When a settlement is made of the amount due under a usurious contract, and the right to recover back the amount of overpayment because of usury has become fixed, the right cannot be taken away by subsequent legislation. Williar v. Baltimore Butchers Loan & A. Assn., 45 Md. 545.

Contract with judicial power.

A private act that certain deeds of married women shall be deemed and taken to be effectual in law is void, as interfering with the powers of the judiciary. Robinson v. Barfield, 6 N. C. 390.

An act attempting to validate defective acknowledgments to deeds of married women is invalid as attempting to break down the dividing wall between the legislative and judicial departments of government in declaring not only what the law is but what it has been; as depriving the citizen of property without due process of law; and as divesting vested rights. Alabama L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Boykin, 38 Ala. 510.

Rights of third persons cannot be impaired.

Acts curing defective acknowledgments cannot interfere with the rights of third persons vested at the time of their passage. McGehee v. McKenzie, 43 Ark. 153.

Rights of third persons which have actually vested cannot be cut off by a statute curing defective acknowledgments in a deed. Brinton v. Seever, 12 Iowa, 389.

The deed of a married woman holding property under a will which limits it to her separate use and to her heirs, and expressly states that she shall have no power to sell, cannot be confirmed by subsequent legislation so as to cut off the rights of her children. Shonk v. Brown, 61 Pa. 327.

A conveyance cannot be validated so as to cut off the subsequently acquired rights of third parties. Meighen v. Strong, 6 Minn. 177, 80 Am. Dec. 441; Thompson v. Morgan, 6 Minn. 232.

But it has been held that a curative act throws on the subsequent purchaser the burden of showing that he purchased bona fide and without notice. Fogg v. Holcomb, 64 Iowa, 621.

And in Journey v. Gibson, 56 Pa. 57, it is decided that a defectively acknowledged mortgage which is placed on record may be made effectual so as to cut off the rights of third persons acquired after the record by a statute passed subsequently to the acquisition of such rights.

viously be proven, and to enable the person claiming under it to use it in establishing his title. It has been suggested, however, that the legislature has the power to give efficacy retrospectively to contracts like that under consideration, which have been so often declared void for uncertainty, because it has also been held that they were void at the election of the person to be bound thereby (just as in the case where the agreement is merely verbal), and that, being voidable, the legislature had the power to impart vitality to them. But we do not think that the line of demarcation which indicates the limit of legislative authority can be made to depend upon the question whether the agreement is void or voidable. The deed of a married woman is void; that of an infant void at his option on arriving at maturity; and the leading authorities concur in sustaining the general proposition that the contracts of infants are voidable only; yet it will not be contended that a statute allowing all conveyances theretofore made by infants to be registered, and declaring them effectual to pass the land described in them, would be held constitutional, so as to divest title out of such infants without their consent. How can such a statute be distinguished from one which operates to divest title out of a party against his will because he has signed a paper or entered into a verbal agreement which the law declares, just as in the case of an infant, has passed no interest, legal or equitable, in the land which purports to be the subject of the agreement? An unregistered deed, executed with all of the formalities prescribed by law, conveys an equity which would descend to the heirs of the grantee. A law which gives efficacy to the probate of such a deed merely provides for transferring the legal estate by certain proof to the person who had previously been the real owner in equity. It transfers the legal estate to such equitable owner, as did the statute of uses, but it does not disturb the vested beneficial right. If, in that case, the deed were ineffectual upon its face to pass any interest, legal or equitable, no remedial statute could impart efficacy to it. Robinson v. Barfield, supra. It would seem, therefore, more accurate to declare that the power to enact remedial statutes giving effect to contracts for the sale and conveyances of land extends only to those cases where the grantee or other person deriving benefit from their enforcement had, previous to the passage of the law, an equitable right, and not to cases where the policy of the law or the express provision of a statute had prevented the transmission of any interest whatever by the instrument or agreement relied on. Contracts are made with a view to the legislative authority to provide for proving in the readiest manner that the parties actually entered into them, but the parties are not deemed to have acted in reasonable contemplation of such an alteration in the law as to change its policy, and thereby transfer both the legal and equitable estate in land without the consent of the owner. As the case involves an important principle, it may not be improper to cite numerous additional authorities from the appellate courts of many of the states, in which an effort has been made to fix and determine the limit to the authority to pass remedial laws.

In Alter's App., 67 Pa. 341, 5 Am. Rep. 438, the supreme court of Pennsylvania declared it incompetent for the legislature to empower the courts to correct a mistake in a testator's will which rendered it inoperative, and thereby deprive his heirs-at-law of property that had descended to them. In another case it was held by the court of Nevada that, where a testator left no heirs, the legislature had power to waive the right of the state to take his property as an escheat by validating a will in favor of his devisees, but could not have divested the title of his heirs-at-law if any had been known. Re Sticknoth, 7 Nev. 229. In Hasbrouck v. Milwaukee, 13 Wis. 37, 80 Am. Dec. 718, that eminent jurist Chief Justice Dixon, in discussing an act to validate a contract, void when executed, for want of power in the city authorities of Milwaukee, said: "A contract void for want of capacity in one or both of the contracting parties to enter into it is as no contract; and to admit that the legislature, of its own choice, and against the wishes of either or both of the contracting parties, can give it life and vigor, is to admit that it is within the scope of legislative authority to divest settled rights of property, and to take the property of one individual or corporation and transfer it to another." It should be noted that the deed in that case was void at the election of the city. See also Mills v. Charleston, 29 Wis. 413, 9 Am. Rep. 578. Where a conveyance is void for want of power in the grantor to convey the estate that it purports to pass, it cannot be validated by statute. Shonk v. Brown, 61 Pa. 327. It has been held that a lease void under the statute cannot be validated by the receipt of rent. Sedgw. & W. Trial of Title to Lands, 379, and notes. When the subsequent ratification by the contracting party cannot give validity to an agreement to rent because it is void under this same statute of frauds it is difficult to understand how the legislature, despite the protest of the parties to a deed and their privies, can, by altering the rules of evidence, restore it to life. In Underwood v. Lilly, 10 Serg. & R. 99, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said "that the retrospective operation of laws would be supported when they impair no contract or disturb no vested right, but only vary remedies, cure defects in proceedings otherwise fair, which do not vary existing obligations contrary to their situation when entered into and when prosecuted." The supreme court of New Hampshire held that the legislature had no power, as against parties not assenting, to validate a fraudulent sale of corporate property. White Mountains R. R. v. White Mountains (N. H.) R. R. 50 N. H. 50.

To declare by statute, in terms that Mrs. Calloway intended to convey when she actually aliened nothing, would be a legislative usurpation of judicial power; and to change the general remedy applicable to pre-existing contracts so as to pass an estate now, when no equitable right vested in Harris at the time of the execution of the paper, even if it be accomplished by modifying the rules of evidence, would be to disturb a vested right by transferring the land without compensation to the owner from whom it is taken after it had been aliened to a purchaser for value. Norman v. Heist, 5 Watts & S. 171, 40 Am. Dec. 493. There is a general presumption against the retroactive operation of statutes, and they will, in cases like that at bar, where it will impair vested rights to apply them to past transactions, be construed to affect rights accruing after their enactment. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 271-274; Richardson v. Cook, 37 Vt. 599, 88 Am. Dec. 622.

Where deeds are executed by virtue of a judicial decree, and are voidable only, not void, by reason of some irregularity growing out of a failure to follow the mode of procedure prescribed by law in the conduct of the action or proceeding, it is clearly competent to cure such defects by remedial legislation; and where the action or proceeding has been instituted and prosecuted in good faith, it is not only eminently just, but it serves the important end of preserving the public confidence in the stability of judgments of the courts, to resort to the lawmaking power for such relief. Hence the curative acts, affecting irregularities in special proceedings, have been upheld by the courts, as they cannot be collaterally impeached, and are voidable only in the absence of such remedial acts at the instance of a party to them; not void. Edwards v. Moore, 99 N. C. 1; Ward v. Lowndes, 96 N. C. 387; Bell v. King, 70 N. C. 330; Herring v. Outlaw, Id. 334. In such cases the curative statute divests no vested right, because the theory of the decisions upon the subject has always been that an estate vests under the decree, subject, however, to be avoided in the absence of legislation on notice of a party to the proceeding, or to be validated and made conclusive on the parties by a proper statute. Moore v. Gidney, 75 N. C. 34. Such proceedings differ widely from contracts of infants, or such as are not enforceable under the statute of frauds. In the one instance a prima facie title passes, though it is defeasible; in the other the contract is unlawful in its incipency,—passes nothing. The one is valid until it is avoided; the other is void until it is validated. Parties are supposed to contract with reference to the power of the lawmakers to withdraw the mere right to avoid, but not in contemplation of the enactment of a statute which would operate as a compulsory ratification, and divest a vested interest without the consent of him who holds it. It is like the distinction between destroying a mere right or possibility, which must have been expected when it was created, and the taking of an interest in land without compensation. Bass v. Roanoke Nav. & W. P. Co., 111 N. C. 439, 19 L. R. A. 247. Thus the distinction between this line of cases and those in which the right of recovery depends upon giving effect to a deed or contract that has once been on its face absolutely void, or voidable at the election of the party to be bound, because executed contrary to the prohibition of a statute or not in the only mode declared by it to be sufficient, or in violation of a rule declared by public policy. In Condry v. Cheshire, 88 N. C. 375, it was held that a void judgment could be attacked without any direct proceeding to vacate it. Doyle v. Brown, 72 N. C. 393; Stallings v. Gully, 48 N. C. 344.

The statutes that provide for supplying lost records are also within the scope of legislative authority, because they only give to certain persons the means of setting up and establishing valid titles, and the parties who actually aliened and passed title to them cannot complain because all right has already been divested out of them, and they are presumed to have conveyed with reference to the legislative power to provide for restoring the evidence of what had been actually accomplished, not simply attempted, in the face of a statute declaring the attempt in advance ineffectual. Adle v. Sherwood, 3 Whart. 484. As we have already stated, after a deed has been executed, if it be valid upon its face, the grantee takes an equitable estate under it, till by force of registration (which is our modern substitute for livery of seisin) the legal estate vests in him. He being the owner in equity, it is no interference with vested rights to provide by law a more convenient mode of proving the execution, or to ratify a probate that is informal, or was taken by an officer not empowered to do so, but who mistook his power. Freeman v. Person, 106 N. C. 251; White v. Connelly, 105 N. C. 65; Young v. Jackson, 92 N. C. 144; Tatom v. White, 95 N. C. 453. The probate is but an ex parte ascertainment, by authority of law, that the instrument registered is authentic (Young v. Jackson, supra), and does not conclude the parties to it as to its legal effect. It is competent for the legislature to cure a defective probate where the instrument has already been recorded, as it is to prescribe the mode of proving in future; and parties contract with a view to the possible, if not probable, exercise of this power. The legislature is empowered, unquestionably, to pass a law extending the statute of limitation, or making the time shorter, if a reasonable time is given for the commencement of an action before the bar takes effect. Strickland v. Draughan, 91 N. C. 103. The principle announced in this case is not inconsistent with the doctrine (laid down in Eakin v. Raub, supra) that a man cannot be deprived of his land "instantaneously under the pretense of limiting the period in which he should bring his action." Neither can he be instantaneously robbed of his property, the possession of which he is about to recover in the courts, under the guise of modifying the rules of evidence. So the principle decided in Alexander v. McDowell County Comrs., 70 N. C. 208, has no bearing upon this case. Where one holds what purports to be a contract made on behalf of the state by an agent, but which is in reality void for want of authority in the agent to bind the state, the legislature has the power to assume the obligation, just as it could have provided for payment of the claim if no agreement had been entered into. "Municipal corporations are mere agencies of the state, through which the sovereign acts in matters of social concern." Boas v. Roanoke Nav. & W. P. R. Co., supra; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 488. The right to limit involves the power to dispense with limitations. Ibid. But the legislature cannot take the property of one man and give it to another, though an attempt may be made to transfer it by a judicial proceeding,—as by a sheriff's sale. Id. § 484, and note.

Where a party prays an appeal to an appellate court, the judgment of the court below is thereby vacated, subject to the condition that he shall perfect his appeal either under any law existing when he appeals, or that may be enacted before his cause is heard in the appellate court; and a curative act which gives him a status in the higher court is considered to have been in contemplation of the parties at all times, and divests no title, but simply provides the means of fairly ascertaining the rights of the litigants.

Walker v. Scott, 104 N. C. 481. Judge Cooley says (Const. Lim. 371), in treating of irregularities that may be cured by statute: "And if the irregularity consists in doing some act, or in the mode or manner of doing some act, which the legislature might have made immaterial by prior law, it is competent to make the same immaterial by subsequent law." But where the defect which the act seeks to remedy affects the jurisdiction of the court, it is in violation of fundamental principles to give it a retrospective effect. Ibid. The learned judge must not be understood as maintaining that the legislature has the power to pass any retroactive remedial law that it would have been within the scope of its authority to have enacted for future operation. Under such a principle no man's property would be secure against the judicial authority of the lawmaking department of the government. If the receipt was void for uncertainty as a contract, and the defendant acquired no legal or equitable right that could then be enforced, the general assembly had no more authority, even under the guise of changing the rule of evidence or providing a new remedy, to transfer the life estate of Mrs. A. P. Calloway, and the remainder in fee of her daughters to the defendant by a general than by a special act naming the parties, and setting forth their relation to each other. Such special acts have been declared by this court to be in contravention of the organic law, not only as attempts to divest vested individual rights, but as infringements on the part of the legislature upon the power of the judicial branch of the government. Stannire v. Taylor, supra. We conclude, therefore, that the legislature did not intend that the statute should apply to pre-existing contracts, but only to those entered into after its passage. In permitting the defendant to explain what land was referred to we think there was error for which a new trial should be granted.

New trial.

Shepherd, Ch. J., concurring:

Under the view I have taken it is unnecessary to determine whether the statute in question should be construed as prospective only in its operation, as I am very clearly of the opinion that it did not have the effect of changing the existing law in reference to descriptions contained in deeds or contracts for the conveyance or sale of land. The statute provides that "in all actions for the possession of or title to any real estate parol testimony may be introduced to identify the land sued for, and fit it to the description contained in the paper writing offered as evidence of title or right of possession; and if the jury is satisfied that the land in question is the identical land intended to be conveyed, . . . then the said paper writing shall be deemed and taken to be sufficient in law to pass such title . . . as it purports to pass," etc. Section 1, chap. 465, Acts 1891. Whatever may have been the intention of the legislature, it is, I think, very evident that the foregoing language does not change in the slightest degree the existing law upon the subject to which it refers. It is but a plain and concise exposition of the rules of the common law, and, if the legislature intended to abrogate these rules, in whole or in part, it should have expressed such intention in the clearest and most unmistakable manner. Statutes which "innovate upon the common-law rules of evidence," or which "provide for proceedings unknown to or contrary to the common law, are construed strictly [and] the courts cannot properly give force to them beyond what is expressed by their words, or is necessarily implied from what is expressed." Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 400. The same author also declares it to be a cardinal principle of judicial interpretation that, "where a statute uses a word which is well known and has a definite sense at common law or in the written law, without defining it, it will be restricted to that sense, unless it appears that it was not so intended." And he further states that "rules of interpretation and construction are derived from the common law, and, since that law constitutes the foundation, and primarily the body and soul, of our jurisprudence, every statutory enactment is construed with reference to its cognate principles." Sections 253-289. Keeping in mind these well-settled principles, let us inquire whether there is anything in the statute which sustains the defendant's contention that it was the purpose of the legislature that the word "description," as therein employed, should be so construed as to practically repeal the statute of frauds, and thus destroy in a great measure the stability of titles to the landed property of the state. We should be loath to attribute to the lawmakers a purpose to place our state in a position of such exceptional and unenviable prominence, and I am quite sure that their real object in passing the statute may be explained upon other and more reasonable grounds, to which I shall hereafter refer. The statute provides that parol testimony shall be admissible for the purpose of fitting the land to the description contained in the deed, and the question is whether the word "description" is to be taken in its ordinary and legal signification—that is, a description which has a legal susceptibility of being aided by testimony so as to identify the land—or whether it means a description which in law is no description whatever, and is sometimes called an “insufficient description.” I am really unable to conceive of any principle upon which the latter proposition can be supported, unless it be that the legislature must have intended something different from the common law, and that it is our duty to discover it, and, by a process known as “judicial legislation,” insert it into the statute. This involves not merely the difficulty of departing from the generally accepted meaning of the terms of a statute, but also an absolute contradiction of such terms, resulting in a complete change, in many instances, in the rights of property. In other words, instead of reading the statute “that parol testimony may be received for the purpose of fitting the land to such a description as is recognized as legally sufficient,” we are to substitute the words, “such a description as is so vague and indefinite as to have been heretofore held to be legally insufficient,” or one which, in the language of Judge Pearson in a case similar to this (Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. 78), is “no description at all.” I cannot see how a word in a statute having such a plain legal signification can, in the absence of something in the context requiring it, be stricken out, and other words of an entirely different signification inserted in its place. The failure of the legislature to accomplish what it is argued it attempted to do affords no warrant to the court to supply the supposed omission. Even if the language were not altogether free from ambiguity, we should hesitate to place upon it the construction insisted upon, for it is a universally accepted rule that “a construction which must necessarily occasion great public and private mischief must never be preferred to a construction which will occasion neither, or not in so great a degree, unless the terms of the instrument absolutely require such preference.” Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 823. If the statute means that testimony may be introduced to the jury in all cases where the description has heretofore been held void by reason of vagueness, it would be exceedingly difficult for any court to determine what is a sufficient “insufficient description” which should be submitted to the jury. It would seem from the construction insisted upon that, if there is a mere semblance of a description, however indefinite it may be, its legal sufficiency is to be determined by the jury; for if they find that the parties intended to convey a certain piece of land, the description shall, by reason of such finding, be deemed in law sufficient to pass the title. It is impossible to estimate the confusion which would result from such a substantial reversal of the functions of the court and the jury. I suppose that any attempt at a description would be sufficient to put the jury in full control of the matter without any interference on the part of the court. Thus, if I have ten stores on Fayetteville street in the city of Raleigh, and convey to A. “a store on Fayetteville street in the city of Raleigh,” this will be sufficient to go to the jury, and they may determine which of the ten stores was intended to be conveyed.

This, of course, would be an abrogation of the statute of frauds. Could the legislature have intended this? But to go still further. If I should afterwards sell to B. one of the stores, specifically describing it, what is to prevent A. from identifying it as the one sold to him under his vague and imperfect description? Under the statute there can be no equitable principle asserted for the protection of B., as it contains no saving in favor of third persons, but expressly provides that in all cases the evidence shall be received, and, if the property can be identified by the jury, then the description shall be deemed in law sufficient. If the description is thus made sufficient by the finding of the jury, it must be sufficient for all purposes. That this construction is not the true one is entirely clear by a reference to the second section of the act, which provides “that no deed . . . shall be declared void for vagueness in the description by reason of the use of the word ‘adjoining’ instead of the words ‘bounded by,’ etc. The provision was intended to meet a suggestion that there was a distinction between the words ‘bounded by’ and ‘adjoining’ as affecting the legal sufficiency of a description, and was rendered unnecessary by a subsequent declaration of the court in Perry v. Scott, 109 N. C. 374.

It recognizes that there is such a thing as a description which may be declared void by the court for “vagueness,” and enacts that in certain instances it shall not be so declared void. Now, it is asked with absolute confidence, why was it necessary to provide for the cases mentioned in this section, if what had been suggested to be an “insufficient description” for “vagueness” was provided for in the first section, which is the one we have under consideration? Very clearly there would have been no necessity for such legislation if the present contract and the similar one in Fortesque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, were covered by the first section under the construction contended for. I think that it was the purpose of the legislature to meet the suggestion referred to, and this is certainly all that was effected by the terms of the statute. I do not impute to the legislature a purpose to enact such a law as to produce the evils which would result from the construction insisted upon, and I am of the opinion that the real object of the statute was such as I have indicated. The common law, then, not having been changed in respect to this contract, and it being void under the decision in Fortesque Case, supra, I concur in the ruling that there should be a new trial.

Burwell, J., dissenting:

The following issue was submitted to the jury without objection on the part of the plaintiff: “Is the land of which the defendant is now in possession, and which is sued for in this action, the identical land which is referred to in the paper writing set up in the answer, and alleged to have been executed to defendant by A. P. Caloway?” Defendant offered this writing in evidence, and plaintiff objected “on the ground that it was too indefinite in describing any land.” His motion overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence, and the plaintiff excepted. The writing referred to is as follows: "Wilkesboro, N. C., Apr. 19, 1880. James Harris has paid me twenty dollars on his land. Owes me six more on it. A. P. Calloway." I assume that the contention of the plaintiffs was that parol evidence was not admissible to locate the land to which the defendant alleged this receipt referred, and show that it was the same land which plaintiffs were seeking to recover of him in this action, she also claiming under A. P. Calloway. Her objection should have been to the parol testimony when it was offered. The writing was clearly admissible in evidence. Its legal effect was a matter to be determined after it was introduced. But for the Act of 1891 (chap. 465, § 1), the case of Fortesque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, would be decisive of this controversy, for there, as here, the only words in the receipt descriptive of the land are "his land," and some other words that show that what was there styled "his [the defendant's] land" was, prior to the alleged sale, the land of the person signing the receipt.

The act referred to seems to have been enacted to meet and avoid the hardship of such cases as that cited above and this one now before us. Whether that legislation is wise or unwise is not for us to say. We should give to it all proper effect. We have here a memorandum in writing, which, under the law as it stood before the Act of 1891, would not have availed the defendant, because it was not then permissible to show by parol evidence that the land therein designated by the vendor as "his land" was the land in controversy, and for that reason alone. The expression is very vague and indefinite, but it is a "description." In Bread v. Munger, 88 N. C. 297, "his 100 acres of land" is called an "insufficient description." In Fortesque v. Crawford, supra (the receipt being similar to the one here under consideration), this court said of the defendant's offer of parol testimony that he was endeavoring "to help out the insufficiency of the description." If, then, there was a written memorandum available, and sufficient of itself for defendant's protection in his possession, when the action was begun, if the description had not been insufficient and imperfect, that imperfection and insufficiency could be remedied by the verdict of the jury founded upon the writing, and parol testimony which the act had made competent "to identify the land, and fit it to the description contained in the paper writing" offered as "evidence of the right of possession." There was no error, I think, in his honor's allowing defendant to put the writing in evidence, and the introduction of parol evidence to identify the land. The statute is, in my opinion, applicable to all actions to be tried in the courts, no matter when the contract was made. It does not contravene any provision of the constitution, for it affects a remedy, and not the rights of any citizen. "Laws which change the rules of evidence relate to the remedy only" (Tabor v. Ward, 88 N. C. 291); and such laws are not unconstitutional, though retroactive (Hinton v. Hinton, 61 N. C. 410; Wilkerson v. Buchanan, 88 N. C. 296; Phillips v. Cameron, 48 N. C. 390). The act now under discussion, if applied to this case, will disturb no vested right of Mrs. Calloway or her vendee with notice. It will merely prevent the perpetration of a wrong by giving to the defendant a preventive for that wrong by changing the rule of evidence so as to allow him, in defense of his possession of his home, to submit to the jury parol testimony that was not admissible when the alleged contract was made. The contract was not void, but only voidable at the option and upon the proper plea of the alleged contractor. Loughran v. Giles, 110 N. C. 425, and cases there cited. The act does not assume to make that a contract which was not one, but merely declares that the jury may determine what the contract was, and to that end may hear and consider certain parol evidence. This will disturb no vested rights, nor deprive any one of what is his own. It may be that it is better for the commonwealth that a few should have the privilege of doing what all men feel to be wrong,—taking from honest purchasers land sold to them by defective descriptions,—than that some should be tempted to swear falsely. Of that we say nothing. All such legislation as that under consideration involves a question of policy, and not of constitutional power. Coeley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 460.

Clark, J.: I concur in the above dissenting opinion.

plaintiff on the property of shippers construed as an insurance for the benefit of plaintiff only to the extent of its liability as carrier and warehouseman.

dence. In an action to enforce rights dependent on a written contract, although the suit be between strangers to the instrument, or between a stranger and one of the parties to the contract, the rule against varying a written instrument applies. A liability incurred by the plaintiff on a collateral contract to procure insurance on the property of shippers is not a liability as carrier or warehouseman, within the meaning of the policy.

(November 18, 1893.)

CROSS-APPEALS from orders of the District Court for Hennepin County entered in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance, the plaintiff appealing from an order reducing the amount of recovery allowed by the jury, and the defendant appealing from an order denying its motion for a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. A. H. Bright and Kitchel, Cohen & Shaw, for plaintiff:

The contract as established by the parol evidence was a contract under the common-law liability of carriers to carry the grain to Gladstone, and thence deliver it through its elevator upon the vessel of the next water carrier at Gladstone; it was not an agreement to insure but an agreement at common law to deliver to the next connecting carrier.

The insurance taken by the carrier was primarily for its own protection. The carrier, in effect, re-insured the risk which the law imposed upon it by virtue of the agreement.

Lawrence v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 15 Minn. 390, 2 Am. Rep. 130.

The oral evidence was properly received.

The rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written instrument is applied only in suits between the parties to the instruments, or their privies, and not to suits where the issue is between one of the parties to the instrument and a third person.

Rep. 239; Lowell Mfg. Co. v. Safeguard Fire Ins. Co. 88 N. Y. 591. See also Greenl. Ev. § 279; Whart. Ev. § 928.

The evidence was admissible as showing that the bill of lading was in fact never accepted as the contract between the parties.

The shipping receipts bound the carrier to the common-law liability of the common carrier.

At common-law a common carrier is an insurer of the goods entrusted to him and he is responsible for all losses of the same, save such as are occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy.

Christenson v. American Exp. Co. 15 Minn. 270, 2 Am. Rep. 122.

The evidence was sufficient to warrant the reformation of the bill of lading as between the shippers and the railway company.

Buxton v. Beal, supra.

If the railway company be held liable for the grain in the elevator as a common carrier, then in the absence of proof as to the origin of the fire, defendant was liable for the grain destroyed in the elevator.

Messrs. S. E. Hall, H. S. Durand, and Cole, McVey & Cheshire for defendant.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the policy in suit the defendant insured the plaintiff "on flour, corn, grain, seeds, provisions, and other merchandise, excluding petroleum or its products; it being understood and agreed that the insurance under this head is to cover the liability of the insured as carriers and warehousemen, as well as their own property, . . . while contained in their elevator situated at Gladstone, Mich." It is too plain to admit of argument that, as to the property of others entrusted to its custody, this was not an insurance for the benefit of the shippers, but for the benefit of the plaintiff exclusively, and only to the extent of its own interest. It is well settled that, if the carrier would insure for the benefit of the owners of the property, this must appear from the use of apt terms in the policy to that effect. There is not a word in this policy that indicates any intent to insure any other interest than that of the plaintiff to the extent of its liability as carrier and warehouseman. It necessarily follows that to entitle plaintiff to recover it was incumbent on it to prove that it was liable as carrier or warehouseman to the owners for the loss of the grain destroyed by fire in its elevator at Gladstone. Recognizing this fact, the plaintiff alleged in its complaint agreements between itself and the several shippers that it would procure at its own expense policies of insurance on their grain against loss by fire while in this elevator. Upon the trial the plaintiff itself introduced the bills of lading issued by it to the several shippers, by the terms of which it was expressly provided that plaintiff should not be liable for any loss of or damage to the property by fire not caused by its negligence or that of its agents. It may be here stated that the grain was consigned to Buffalo, and was destroyed by fire while in the elevator at Gladstone, awaiting delivery by plaintiff to the next succeeding line of carriers. The plaintiff was then permitted, against the objection and exception of the defendant, to introduce parol evidence of an agreement between itself and the shippers, made at or prior to the shipment of the grain, and prior to the execution of the bills of lading referred to, that it would procure insurance on the grain as alleged in the complaint. Even if this evidence was otherwise competent, it was inadmissible for the reason that it did not tend to prove any liability of plaintiff as carrier or warehouseman, which was all against which the defendant had insured it. But to this point we shall refer hereafter.

One ground on which counsel seek to sustain the admissibility of this oral evidence is that the rule against varying a written contract by parol applies only to controversies between parties to the instrument and their privies, and not to controversies between strangers to the contract, or between one of the parties to the instrument and a stranger to it. The rule is as stated, with this limitation, however: that the right in the latter class of cases to vary a written contract by parol is limited to rights independent of the instrument. As to rights which originate in the relation established by the written contract, or are founded upon it, the rule against varying it by parol applies. Browne, Parol Ev. § 28; Sayre v. Burdick, 47 Minn. 367; Wodock v. Robinson, 148 Pa. 508. In the present case plaintiff is claiming under this policy rights wholly dependent upon its liability to the shippers of the grain. That liability is at once both the basis and the measure of defendant's liability; and it would be most unreasonable that it should be allowed, as against defendant, to establish that liability by proof of oral promises to the shippers which the latter could not prove against it. If the bill of lading is conclusive between the shippers and the plaintiff, it must be equally so, in this case, between the plaintiff and the defendant. Counsel further claims that this parol evidence was also admissible as showing that the bills of lading were in fact never accepted as the contract between the parties; in other words, as we understand counsel, they propose to throw aside the bills of lading as never having become operative, ignore the express oral agreement to insure, and then rest their case upon an alleged oral contract of carriage, in which there were no exceptions to the common-law liability of carriers. With all due respect to counsel, it seems to us that this contention is entirely baseless. The complaint was framed, and the case tried throughout, upon the theory that the liability of plaintiff to the shippers grew out of the express agreement of the former to insure the grain, and the record contains nothing even suggestive of the present contention of counsel. The evidence furnishes no support to this contention. The undisputed facts are that the manner in which the business was done was that, immediately upon loading a car, a short bill, or, as it is called, a "shipping receipt," was issued to the owner, and, when a sufficient number of cars had been loaded to constitute a "shipment," the shipper surrendered these receipts to the plaintiff, and received in their place a regular or large bill of lading, of the form already described, to which was attached a list of all the cars in the shipment. These bills of lading the shippers attached to the drafts drawn on the consignees. This had been the customary and uniform manner of doing business between the parties for years. These large bills of lading had always been accepted and used by the shippers without objection. This conclusively proves that the owners perfectly understood, when shipping the grain, that these large bills of lading, and neither their preliminary talk nor the small "shipping receipts," were to be the final repository and sole evidence of the contract between themselves and the plaintiff. In the absence of fraud or mistake, of which there is no claim, the bills of lading must be conclusively presumed to be the final and complete expression of the engagements of the parties: certainly, at least, of the obligations and liabilities of the plaintiff as carrier or warehouseman in the transportation of the property. Whether, as between the shippers and the plaintiff, the former could show by parol, as a collateral agreement, an undertaking to procure insurance on the grain, it is unnecessary to consider, for under such an agreement the liability of the plaintiff would not be as carrier or warehouseman, against which alone the defendant insured. The undertaking of the defendant to insure the plaintiff against its liability as carrier and warehouseman can have but one meaning, viz. the liability growing out of the relation of carrier and warehouseman as such. It was never intended to cover liabilities which the plaintiff might incur by virtue of special contracts as to matters entirely outside of their common-law liability as carriers and warehousemen. It is no part of the duty of common carriers to procure insurance on property intrusted to their custody for the benefit of the owners. Had this plaintiff, in order to secure the business of these shippers, guaranteed them a certain profit on their grain, or the receipt of a certain price for it after its arrival at Buffalo, there would have been as much reason for claiming that the liability thus incurred was covered by this policy as that incurred by the agreement to procure insurance on it. Counsel are not correct in saying that the liability incurred by the agreement to procure insurance is nothing more than the unqualified common-law liability of a carrier. Suppose, for example, the plaintiff had, in the exercise of ordinary diligence, secured policies of insurance on this grain, and some of the insurance companies had become insolvent. The plaintiff would not have been liable on its contract to procure insurance, but it might have been liable as carrier. Again, suppose plaintiff had failed to procure insurance, and the grain had been destroyed from some cause for which a common carrier is not liable, it would nevertheless have been liable for its failure to perform its contract to procure insurance. But further discussion is unnecessary. The policy was never intended to cover liabilities which the plaintiff might incur regarding the property by special contracts entirely outside of and foreign to its common-law duties as carrier or warehouseman. It may be added that there is no claim that the loss was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff, and hence not within the operation of the stipulation in the policy exempting it from liability for loss by fire. Under no view of the case can the plaintiff recover.

On defendant's appeal the order appealed from is reversed.

On plaintiff's appeal that part of the order appealed from is affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

James A. SMITH et al., Appts., v.H. H. McDOWELL, State's Atty., ex rel. M.
H. HALL et al.

1. Error in sustaining exceptions to portions of an answer is immaterial, if the averments excluded could not have changed the result.
2. An ordinance attempting to vacate a street or portion thereof for the sole purpose of allowing a private person to occupy a portion for an area and stairways in connection with the basement of a building is ultra vires and void, where the only statutory authority is a general power to lay out, improve, and vacate streets.
3. An obstruction of a street for the length of 85 feet and the width of 5 feet by a stone wall enclosing an areaway to a basement is a purpresture which is a public nuisance per se, beyond the power of municipal authorities to license without express authority.
4. The inconvenience of the public, or the sufficiency of the remainder of the street for public uses, is immaterial on the question of abating a purpresture in a street in proceedings by the public.
5. An injunction to prevent the continuance or creation of a nuisance by obstructing a highway may be granted at the suit of the proper officers.

(October 23, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Livingston County enjoining defendants from the alleged construction and maintenance of a purpresture in a public highway. Affirmed.

Statement by Shope, J.:

This was a bill in chancery, filed by H. H. McDowell, state's attorney in and for Livingston county, this state, on the relation of M. H. Hall and William Cowling, citizens and electors of the village of Chatsworth, in said county, on their own behalf, as well as the general public, to restrain the construction of a purpresture, consisting of an areaway and stairs therein, in one of the principal streets of said village. The bill alleges, in substance, that on June 8, 1859, the then proprietors of certain described lands surveyed and platted the same into lots, blocks, streets, alleys, and public grounds, as the town of Chatsworth; that said town afterward became incorporated under the general law, as a village; that by virtue of said plat, and the terms of dedication in the acknowledgment thereto, and the recording thereof, all the said streets, etc., became dedicated to the use of the public, and have ever since been so used; "that in said village is a public street, named 'Fourth Street' " on said plat; that the president and board of trustees of said village "have undertaken, by ordinance, to dispose of" a portion of said street "for private purposes and uses;" and an ordinance of the village is set out, as follows: "An ordinance to vacate part of Fourth street in the village of Chatsworth. Be it ordained by the president and board of trustees of the village of Chatsworth, that to enable the owners of lot nine, (9,) in block twenty-two, (22,) in the original town (now village) of Chatsworth, to erect and maintain a brick building on said lot nine, (9,) with an area and entrance way to the basement of such building in said Fourth street, on the west side of such building, the part of said Fourth street in said village of Chatsworth beginning at the southwest corner of said lot nine, (9,) and running thence west five (5) feet in said Fourth street, thence north in said Fourth street eighty-five (85) feet, thence east five (5) feet, to the east line of said Fourth street, and thence south eighty-five (85) feet to the place of beginning be, and the same is hereby, vacated. Approved September 8, 1891. James A. Smith, President. Attest: John Taggart, Village Clerk."

It is further alleged, in substance, that said lot 9, of which said Smith is the owner, is located on the corner of Fourth and Locust streets, principal thoroughfares in said village, and that the sole purpose and object of said ordinance was to give to said Smith the 5 by 85 feet vacated, for an area and stairways, in connection with the basement of his building being erected on said lot, and that to permit the construction of such area and stairways in said street will create a purpresture therein, and a permanent obstruction thereof; that it will be a public nuisance, and permanently deprive the public of that portion of the street, so given to Smith, over which the public has hitherto traveled upon a sidewalk along said lot. The bill makes said James A. Smith and the village parties defendant; prays that the ordinance be declared void, and that said Smith has acquired no right thereunder, and, if any excavation or area has already been made, that same be declared a nuisance, and abated accordingly; prays injunction restraining said Smith from excavating in said street, and from constructing and maintaining said area and stairways, and from using said street for such private purpose, and that the injunction be made perpetual.

A temporary injunction issued. Answer was filed, admitting all the material allegations of the bill, but averring new matters, to which exceptions were filed and sustained,

NOTE.—The relative rights of individuals and the public in highways concerning which there is a continuing development of the law, and which are of constantly increasing importance, are presented in the above case with a clear showing of the public trust existing in streets. and by consent the parties proceeded to a hearing upon the bill and the remaining portions of the answer to which exceptions had not been filed and sustained. This practically treated the allegations of the bill as true. The court below entered decree in favor of complainant, finding the ordinance void, and awarding a perpetual injunction. The defendants prosecute this appeal.

Messrs. Strawn & Norton for appellants.
Mr. N. J. Pillsbury, for appellee:

By virtue of the statutory dedication of the streets and alleys and its acceptance by the village, it became seised in fee of the streets and alleys for the use of the public as expressed in the dedication (Rev. Stat. 1845, § 21, p. 175), and they must be held for such use and purpose and for no other whatever.

The city may improve and control them and adopt all needful rules and regulations for their management and use but she cannot alien or otherwise dispose of them.

Any permanent obstruction to the free use of a public way is a nuisance at common law and made an indictable offense by our Criminal Code, § 277, Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 88, where it is declared to be a public nuisance "to obstruct or encroach upon public highways, private ways, streets, alleys, commons, landing places, etc."

If the village can legally vacate five feet in width of a street for private use it can in like manner give twenty feet for the same purpose. Such obstructions being a public nuisance there is no authority in a municipality to license the erection thereof.

A thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute unless it be within the intention of the makers, and courts in determining the meaning of a statute are not confined to its words, but may regard its purpose, consider it in connection with other statutes in pari materia and in view of the conditions existing.

The very essence of the right to use the margin of a street and the right of the city to license depends upon the question whether it be for temporary use only and arise upon a necessity and the use itself must be in a reasonable manner. For if such use is prolonged for an unreasonable time, or if it is of such a nature as to unnecessarily or unduly interfere with the right of the public to pass and repass it will constitute a nuisance.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, pp. 480, 481, and authorities cited.

The general public is not required when it sees its rights invaded and the trust declared for its use prevented to wait and see if the trustee will not at some time in the future correct the wrong and revoke its illegal acts.

As the village did all it could to assist Smith and still stands by and upholds him, it is not reasonable to suppose that it would prosecute, so the village can be made defendant.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The important question presented by this record is whether, under the statute, giving municipal corporations control of the streets and alleys within the municipality, power exists in the corporate authorities to vacate a street, or a portion of a street, for the benefit and use of a private person. It is charged, and the answer practically admits, and indeed the ordinance on its face purports, that the attempted vacation of a strip, 5 feet wide and 85 feet long, off of the side of the street, was for the single purpose of permitting its use by appellant Smith, president of the board of trustees of the village, as an areaway, connected with the basement of his proposed building. The doctrine is sought to be invoked that the motives of the trustees of the village in the passage of the ordinance cannot be judicially inquired into. That position is at once conceded. Whether their motives were honest or otherwise in voting for the ordinance is not a subject of inquiry. But the purpose accomplished by the ordinance—the object attained—may always be considered, indeed must be, in determining the validity of the ordinance. If the purpose effected by the ordinance is within the power of the city council, their act will be valid. The question to be determined is one of power in the municipality, in the determination of which the legal effect of the action of the municipality becomes the controlling matter for consideration. In Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46, it was held that the effect—the result of the action of the city council—was the exclusion of the general public from a portion of the public street, opened and sought to be opened; and the power of the city to so exclude the public was denied. No such purpose was expressed in the ordinance, but, that being the effect of what was done, the court looked to the result, and, that result requiring the exercise of power not conferred upon or existing in the municipality, the ordinances were declared void. The answer avers that, under and by virtue of the ordinance in this case, Smith had taken possession of the locus in quo, and excavated for and erected a stone area wall, enclosing the strip of the street proposed to be vacated. The purpose sought to be attained, and actually accomplished, if the ordinance is valid, is not left in doubt. This strip of ground was to be delivered over to Smith, for his private use, and the control of the municipality over the same, as a part of the public street of the village, extinguished.

Before proceeding further, it will be proper to notice the contention that the court erred in sustaining exceptions to portions of the answer. The practice in chancery in this state in respect of exceptions to answers, which are mere pleadings (the verification having been waived in the bill), has been so repeatedly determined that no discussion will be necessary. Fulton County Supra. v. Mississippi & W. R. Co. 21 Ill. 838; Brown v. Scottish American Mortg. Co. 110 Ill. 235; Miz v. People, 116 Ill. 265. Conceding, in view of these authorities, that the court erred in this respect, it is manifest that defendants were not prejudiced thereby. A careful examination of the answer will fail to disclose a single averment of fact to which exception was sustained which, if retained and proved in the most ample manner, would have changed the result. Thus, proof of the fact that it was agreed between the village and Smith that he should enclose the areaway with a substantial iron railing, and extend the sidewalk around it, and the like facts, would in no wise affect the question of whether a purpresture was created in the street, or the power of the village authorities to vacate that portion of the street for the private use contemplated.

It is contended—First, that the power of the village authorities to vacate streets is plenary, and that, they having, in the exercise of their legislative discretion, vacated the strip of ground mentioned, their action is not the subject of judicial review; and, secondly, if the vacating ordinance be invalid, it is nevertheless a license to Smith to occupy that portion of the street, and such occupancy by him is not therefore a nuisance. It is insisted that as the statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 24, § 62, cl. 7), grants power to municipalities, organized under the general incorporation act, "to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave, or otherwise improve streets, alleys, avenues, sidewalks, wharves, parks, and public grounds, and vacate the same," the power to vacate is absolute, to be exercised in the discretion of the municipal authorities. We cannot concur in this view. By the platting of the village, the streets, in their entire width and length, were dedicated to the use of the public as streets. The village thereby became seised in fee of the streets and alleys, for the use of the local and general public, holding them in trust for such uses and purposes, and none other. Alton v. Illinois Transp. Co. 12 Ill. 38, 52 Am. Dec. 479; Carter v. Chicago, 57 Ill. 285; Chicago v. McGinn, 51 Ill. 266, 2 Am. Rep. 295; Jacksonville v. Jacksonville R. Co. 67 Ill. 540; Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 231, 20 Am. Rep. 243; Kreigh v. Chicago, 86 Ill. 410; Stack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619; Lee v. Mound Station, 118 Ill. 312.

These municipal corporations are instrumentalities of the state, exercising such powers as are conferred upon them in the government of the municipality. Their power is measured by the legislative grant, and they can exercise such powers only as are expressly granted or are necessarily implied from the powers expressly conferred. The legislature, representing the great body of the people of the state, when no private right is invaded or trust violated (Jacksonville v. Jacksonville R. Co. supra), may repeal the law creating them, or exercise such control in respect of the streets, alleys, and public grounds within the municipalities of the state as it shall deem for the interest of the people of the state. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 541; Chicago v. Rumsey, 87 Ill. 355; People v. Walsh, 96 Ill. 253, 86 Am. Rep. 135; Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 397, 40 Am. Rep. 598; West Chicago Park Comrs. v. McMullen, 134 Ill. 170, 10 L. R. A. 215. It does not follow, however, as seems to be supposed, that, by the use of the general words "and vacate the same," the absolute power of the legislature was intended to be conferred upon the municipal authorities. The grant of power in this particular is to be construed in view of the purposes for which the municipality is invested with the control of its streets, alleys, and public grounds. The municipality, in respect of its streets, is a trustee for the general public, and holds them for the use to which they are dedicated. The fundamental idea of a street is not only that it is public, but that it is public in all its parts, for free and unobstructed passage thereon by all persons desiring to use it. In Allton v. Illinois Transp. Co., supra, we said, in treating the subject there under consideration: "Whatever title to these public grounds may be vested in the city, she has not the unqualified control and disposition of them. They were dedicated to the public for particular purposes, and only for such purposes can they be rightfully used. For these purposes the city may improve and control them, and adopt all needful rules and regulations for their management and use, but she cannot alien or otherwise dispose of them. At most, she but holds them in trust for the benefit of the general public." In Quincy v. Jones, supra, after quoting with approval the foregoing language, it is said: "It is the unquestioned duty of the city, in controlling and improving the streets, to prepare them for public use as streets, . . . as the public necessity may require. Holding them in trust for the public, and having no authority to convey or divert them to other uses, it would seem inevitably to follow that they can have no power to grant to individuals rights or easements in the streets which might in any way interfere with the duty of preparing them for public use." And in Chicago Dock & Canal Co. v. Garrity, 115 Ill. 155, in considering the power of the municipality to grant rights in the public streets of the city, it was said: "It is not claimed that the use of the streets can be permanently granted for private purposes, and we recognize as unquestionable law that the use of the streets . . . must be for the public, and that no corporation or individual can acquire an exclusive right to their use, or to the use of any part of them, for private purposes." In Glasgow v. St. Louis, 87 Mo. 678, under power "to establish, open, vacate, alter, widen, extend, pave, or otherwise improve all streets," etc., it was held that an ordinance to vacate a portion of one of the streets of the city for the use of private parties was ultra vires. See, also, Reimer's App. 100 Pa. 182, 45 Am. Rep. 373; St. Vincent Orphan Asylum v. Troy, 76 N. Y. 103, 32 Am. Rep. 286; State v. Berdette, 73 Ind. 185, 88 Am. Rep. 117; Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elevator Co. 82 Mo. 127; Dubach v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 89 Mo. 486. And we held that the city cannot acquire land by condemning the same for a street when the real purpose is to devote it to a private use. Ligare v. Chicago, supra. In Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. Case, supra, the court held that the corporation could not condemn property for a public use, to be appropriated to a private use. It in no wise affects the principle involved whether the street was acquired by dedication or condemnation. Glasgow v. St. Louis, supra. The municipal corporation holding and controlling its streets in trust, for the use of the general public, without power of converting them to any other use, it follows necessarily that the right to "vacate the same," is to be exercised only when the municipal authorities, in the exercise of their discretion, determine the street is no longer required for the public use or convenience. And the case of Meyer v. Teutopolis, 131 Ill. 552, is, when properly understood, not in conflict with the views here expressed. See Ligare v. Chicago, supra. It is not necessary to here discuss or determine whether the courts will in any case interfere to prevent the abuse of municipal discretion in the respect mentioned, for the reason that it is not sought to restrain the exercise of such discretion, but to prevent the perversion of their power, to the promotion of private interests, in violation of the trust upon which the streets are held. Carter v. Chicago, supra. In this case there is no pretense that the public interests required the vacation of any part of the street, or that any public interest, local or general, would be subserved by the proposed vacation. The ordinance, professedly and in terms, proposed to destroy the public right and use, for the sole purpose of enabling a private person to occupy a portion of the street, with a permanent structure, appurtenant to his building abutting upon the street. This the municipal authorities are not empowered to do, and their action was ultra vires and void.

The other contention, even if the ordinance could be regarded as a license to Smith to permanently occupy a portion of the street, is equally untenable. As we have seen, the primary purpose of a street is for public use, and it is not within the power of the municipality to divert the street to permanent private uses. It by no means follows that every obstruction of a street is a purpresture or illegal. Thus, the necessary and temporary obstructions incident to the use or repair of the street, the interruption that may be caused by the temporary depositing of earth or material in improving the adjoining lots, excavations under the street authorized by the municipality, and the like (Girdley v. Bloomington, 68 Ill. 47), if temporary and reasonably necessary, must be borne as a reasonable and necessary limitation of the free and uninterrupted right of use by the public; and when made under proper regulations, and with reasonable safeguards against accident, such interruptions are not to be regarded as nuisances; the test in all such cases being that the interruption shall be reasonably necessary, and not continued for an unreasonable time. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 581 et seq., and authorities cited; Angell, Highways, chap. 6; Wood, Nuisances, 262 et seq. And so in respect of iron gratings to admit light, openings for admission of coal, flap or trap doors, the extension of signs into the street, and the like, if authorized by the municipality and properly constructed, so as not to interfere with the public use of the street or sidewalk, are not to be regarded as nuisances. But it is indispensable, to take from the use of the street for such purposes the character of a nuisance, that the street or sidewalk be left free for the public uses, and in as safe condition as it would have been without such use; for the city government cannot exempt itself from liability for injuries resulting from an unsafe condition of the streets, or any part of them, and cannot delegate to others authority to make them so, for, although such occupation of the street may not be a nuisance, yet the owner or person creating the obstruction or using it, and the city after notice, will be liable for negligence in its construction or maintenance. Wood, Nuisances, 275 et seq., and cases cited; Dill. Mun. Corp. supra; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 480-540. Every person passing over the street has a right to presume that it is in proper condition, and in every way safe, for the purpose of his passage, with due and ordinary care; and, as the municipality itself cannot be justified in creating a nuisance, no one can justify the creation of a nuisance under a license from it.

The distinction between these uses of the street when authorized and that proposed in this city is well defined. That the obstruction extending into the street 5 feet, and for the length of 85 feet, was intended to be and was permanent, is not questioned. It was for use as an areaway, adjoining the basement of the brick building to be erected upon the adjacent lot, flush with the lot line. It was surrounded by a stone wall, on the top of which was to be placed an iron railing, and the sidewalk was to be extended around it. Its perpetual use was necessary for the purposes for which it was designated, and, if the ordinance be treated as a license merely, the right to so maintain it in the public street, to the exclusion of the public and for the exclusive benefit of the abutting lot-owner, was intended to be conferred. This being so, it falls within the definition of a "purpresture" (4 Bl. Com. 167), and is per se a public nuisance, which the village authorities had no power to license or maintain. Wood, Nuisances, 288 et seq. Section 221 of the Criminal Code (1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 815) provides: "It is a public nuisance . . . (5) to obstruct or encroach upon public highways, . . . streets, alleys, commons," etc. "The king," says Judge 22 L. R. A.

Dillon (Mun. Corp. § 521), "cannot license the erection or commission of a nuisance; nor in this country can a municipal corporation do so, by virtue of any implied or general power. A building, or other structure of like nature, erected upon a street, without the sanction of the legislature, is a nuisance, and the local corporate authorities of a place cannot give a valid permission thus to occupy the streets without express power to this end conferred upon them by charter or statute." See note. Wood, in his Law of Nuisance (sec. 742), lays down the rule that, "while a municipal corporation may provide by ordinance for the prevention and removal of, yet it cannot license, a nuisance, nor can it maintain a nuisance upon city property, but is subject to the same liability and remedies therefor, at the suit of persons injured, or in behalf of the public, as an individual would be." These texts are amply sustained by the decided cases cited in Pettis v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 139, the city of Indianapolis contracted with the owners of a building situated upon one of the public alleys of the city that they should construct a stairway in the alley, to afford access to rooms in the building occupied by offices of the city. The structure being permanent in its character, it was held to be a nuisance, and abated accordingly. The court says: "The city had no power to contract for such a structure in such a place. True, the city has exclusive jurisdiction over the streets and alleys, not to enable it to appropriate them, or any part of them in perpetuity, to the use of private individuals, but to keep them, so far as may be, open and free to all, and so regulate and control necessary temporary obstructions that they shall not become permanent." Pfau v. Reynolds, 53 Ill. 212; Com. v. King, 18 Met. 115; State v. Berdella, supra; Hart v. Albany, 8 Paige, 213, 8 L. ed. 121; People v. Cunningham, 1 Denio, 524, 43 Am. Dec. 709, and cases supra.

The permanent encroachment upon a public highway or street, unauthorized by the legislature, and the creation of a purpresture therein, which obstructs the free and uninterrupted passage of the public, is, as a matter of law, a public nuisance. The matter of inconvenience to the public, or that sufficient of the street may remain unobstructed to still accommodate the public travel, cannot be considered. The trustee of the public—the municipality—is charged with the duty of keeping and maintaining the streets, in all their parts, open and unobstructed, and in reasonably safe condition, for the public use. No question of the amount of damage done or that may ensue from the creation of the purpresture is raised, nor can it be considered in proceedings by the public, the question being simply whether there has been an invasion of the public right. Where the proceedings are instituted by a private individual for a public nuisance, the gist of his right of action is the private injury, and he must allege and prove some special damage, different in kind from that suffered by the general public. McDonald v. English, 85 Ill. 232; Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598; East St. Louis v.

O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795. The public may institute proceedings for the abatement or prevention of the nuisance by its authorized public officers, irrespective of the question of pecuniary damages. Jackson v. Norris, 72 Ill. 864; Hunt v. Chicago Horse & Dummy R. Co. 121 Ill. 638. Nor does it seem to be necessary when the erection is itself an invasion of the public right—that is, where it is a nuisance per se—that the fact should be established at law, preliminary to the jurisdiction by injunction. The public is entitled to the speediest and most effectual way to prevent the threatened invasion of its right. Wood, Nuisance, §§ 777-786; Dill. Mun. Corp. 520; State v. Mobile, 5 Port. Manhattan Gas Light Co. v. Barker, 7 Rott. 523; Eden, Inj. 11-159. And, if there has been a clear invasion of the common right,—the authorized taking for private use that which belongs to the public, as by the permanent occupation of a public street, or a portion of it,—injunction will be granted, at the suit of the proper officers, on behalf of the public, to prevent the creation and maintenance of the nuisance. 3 Pom. INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF VIGO COUNTY, App't.,

James W. STOUT et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A court has inherent power to order an elevator in the court-house to be operated by the sheriff during sessions of court, when the use of the elevator is necessary to furnish fit and convenient means of access to the court-room, although the county commissioners direct to the contrary that the use of the elevator shall be discontinued.

2. An injunction against carrying out an order of court cannot be granted by another court of similar jurisdiction, but can be granted, if at all, only by the court which made the order.

3. The proper mode of review of an order of court directing the sheriff to operate an elevator in the court-house for convenience of access to the court-room is by appeal and not by injunction against the sheriff.

A PPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vigo County in NOTE.—Power of courts to provide the necessary places and equipment for their business.

A court has the inherent power when in session to incur such necessary expense as the exigencies of the occasion may require, which are judicially determined by the court, as directing a sheriff to board and lodge the jury, at the expense of the county, where such jury should not be allowed to separate. Watson v. Moniteau County, 53 Mo. 122; Lycoming County Comrs. v. Hall, 7 Watts, 230.

The case of Lycoming County Comrs. v. Hall seems to be the leading authority for the doctrine of the inherent power of a court to provide itself with what is necessary for its business.

This may also be done at the expense of the city, when the city should furnish the expenses of the court. State v. Smith, 5 Mo. App. 427.

But not at the expense of the state in the absence of statute. State v. Clark, 57 Mo. 25.

In this case the section allowing such expense had been omitted from the statute by the legislature.

And a county where the court is held is liable for incidental expenses of the supreme court in the absence of statute. McCalmont v. Allegheny County, 29 Pa. 417.

And Orleans County v. State Auditor, 65 Vt. 492, holds that the state is liable for water furnished to the court-house under a statute making the county liable for "all other expenses connected with the courts," but the case does not show who ordered it.

And a county is liable for expenses of publication of trial lists published under a rule of court, there being no statutory provision made for the payment. Venango County v. Durban, 3 Grant Cas. 66. And in People v. Monroe County Suprs., 15 How. Pr. 225, it was held that the rules of court require the clerk to print the calendar for the general 22 L. R. A.

terms, which is clearly a county charge for which there is no provision by law, but that was not in controversy in this case.

In People v. Greene County Suprs., 39 Hun, 220, 36 Hun, 619, it was held that courts have inherent power to incur necessary expenses, but that the power to order publication of terms of court is not vested in the court, as such a construction would enlarge the terms of the statute providing for such publication.

As to further expenses, see Jones v. Lee County Suprs. infra.

In State v. Noble, 4 L. R. A. 101, 118 Ind. 360, where the constitutionality of the supreme court commission was in controversy, it was held that if they were mere assistants of the court an act authorizing their appointment by the governor would be unconstitutional as such appointment belongs to the judicial powers of the court.

And the supreme court of Wisconsin has the inherent power to appoint its own janitor, although the superintendent of public property has charge of the state house where the statute provides that he shall not interfere with any rooms appropriated to state officers. Re Janitor of Supreme Court, 35 Wis. 410.

The district court has the inherent power to appoint its own court crier and tipstaff whose duty combines that of janitor also, and as such he may be required to take charge of the steam heating apparatus for the court even to the exclusion of heat from the other county offices if necessary, and at the expense of the county. Re Court Officers, 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 196, 31 Phila. Leg. Int. 54.

But State v. Smith, 82 Mo. 51, reversing 15 Mo. App. 412, holds that in St. Louis the power to appoint a court janitor is vested in the commissioners favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from operating or interfering with the passenger elevator in the Vigo county court-house. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Faris & Hamill, for appellant:

If the board of county commissioners, as is clearly held by this court, has the control and management of county business, it surely may make orders respecting county property that may interfere with a continued running of a certain order of things as well as to put a certain order of things in motion in the first place.

O'Boyle v. Shannon, 80 Ind. 159.

If there exists any authority to call in question the management and control of the board of commissioners over the elevator in question the action should have been commenced in some regular proceeding known to the law. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 814, gives us a rule for the commencement of actions in this state, and section 1168 prescribes the method of issuing writs of mandates to inferior tribunals. The only proceeding entitled to a standing in a court of justice for the purpose of requiring a board of commissioners to answer or give an account of its control and management of county property would lie under this latter section, and a circuit court would only have the right of passing judgment on such a question, if such right exists at all, when the question was presented to the jurisdiction by the practice known under said section 1168, Rev. Stat. 1881. This record shows orders of court directed against persons who were not parties to any proceedings before it and against whom no process or notice had been directed.

Weisbach v. Arnold, 3 Wash. Terr. 111; Hoffman v. Lake County Comrs. 96 Ind. 84; State v. Clark, 4 Ind. 315; Posey County Comrs. v. Saunders, 17 Ind. 437.

Messrs. McNutt & McNutt for appellees.

Howard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit brought by the appellant board of county commissioners to enjoin the appellees from operating or interfering with the passenger elevator in the Vigo county court-house.

A demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, the appellees answered in three paragraphs, the first being in general denial and the second and third setting up affirmative matter.

It is assigned as error that the court overruled appellant's demurrer to the affirmative paragraphs of the answer and the sufficiency of these paragraphs is the only question presented for our decision.

In the second paragraph of the answer it is averred, amongst other things, that the Vigo county court-house is an iron and stone structure, 207 feet long by 150 feet wide and three stories high above the basement; that it cost $480,000, is built upon a public square in the city of Terre Haute and fronts on four streets, with a public entrance from each street. That there are two stairways at the ends of the building, but no public stair-of the board of public works by statute, subject to approval by the president of the board of public works, and the court cannot regard the appointment of an obnoxious janitor as a vacancy, and appoint another.

And under Miss. Code 1892, § 928, directing the circuit and chancery courts to make an allowance to clerks for supplies to be certified to the supervisors, it must be allowed or disallowed and not simply certified. Jones v. Lee County Supra. (Miss.) Dec. 19, 1892.

And under N. Y. Code, § 81, a court of record may order the sheriff to furnish a room and supplies if the board of supervisors fail, but the justices of the city court cannot make such an order as justices. People v. New York City Ct. 16 N. Y. S. R. 537.

A probate judge in Dakota may require the sheriff to procure room and fuel for the court, under the statutes, if the commissioners fail to furnish one, but he cannot rent an office himself and collect the expense from the county. Cleary v. Eddy County, 2 N. Dak. 387.

The power of the county commissioners to repair the court-room does not take from courts of record power to order repairs under Ind. Stat., 1 Gavin & Hord, 64, §§ 3, 5, authorizing courts to allow such sums as may be due to persons furnishing furniture for the court-room or making repairs thereof. Nash v. State, 33 Ind. 78.

But a court has no power to order the sheriff to provide suitable rooms and equipments when the county commissioners on notice immediately proceed to furnish them in time, and so notify the court, and the sheriff procures his after such notice. Barnett v. Ashmore, 5 Wash. 163.

Nor to order the sheriff to purchase matting where the statute imposes that duty on the county commissioners. Neosho County Comrs. v. Stoddard, 13 Kan. 207.

cannot select or take possession of any room in the court-house he may desire that has been assigned to another by the board of supervisors. If the court-room is insufficient the board may be required to act under Code, § 144. San Joaquin County v. Budd, 96 Cal. 47.

And under a statute authorizing a judge to direct the sheriff to furnish the court-room if the county does not, he cannot anticipate the action of the county. Los Angeles County v. Los Angeles Super. Ct. 96 Cal. 380.

Nor can he order the county treasurer to pay for such supplies which he has certified as required by the statute, when the statute does not give that power to the judge. Ex parte Widber, 91 Cal. 387.

And where the court was annoyed by the traffic on the street during its sessions, the power to prevent the noise by use of ropes across the street was sustained. Belvin v. Richmond, 1 L. R. A. 807, 86 Va. 574.

The power to hold court in the county in another place than the court-room or the court-house, will be presumed to have been properly exercised. Mohon v. Harkreader, 18 Kan. 383; Bates v. Sabu, 64 Vt. 511; State v. Peyton, 32 Mo. App. 522; LeGrange v. Ward, 11 Ohio, 257; Stafford County Comrs. v. State, 40 Kan. 21; Smith v. Jones, 23 La. Ann. 44.

But the court cannot order the court-house building to be moved to another site, but may require that it be made more comfortable. Benton County v. Thompson, 7 Ind. 265.

Of much interest on the question here presented is the Indiana case of White County Comrs. v. Gwin (Ind.) post, 402, which decides that the power to make necessary repairs to a court-house is inherent in a court, but that it cannot extend to a practical reconstruction or extension of the building.

way at or near the center; that in the original plan of the court-house, provision was made at a cost of $10,000, for an elevator in the center, to reach the several floors from the basement up. That the elevator is in keeping with the style, finish, and fixtures of said building. That it is customary to use elevators in public buildings of the dimensions and use of said court-house. That the offices of the clerk, sheriff, recorder, treasurer, auditor, and the board of county commissioners are upon the first floor. The second floor is occupied by the circuit and superior courts, the office of the prosecuting attorney and the law library. The main entrances to the circuit and superior courts are at the center of the building, near the elevator, but about sixty feet from the end stairways. The third floor is occupied by the grand jury, the petit jury, the court reporter, and the superintendent of the county schools. That the elevator is a great convenience to grand jurors and persons subpoenaed before them as witnesses; also to petit jurors: that it is a great convenience to judges, jurors, parties, attorneys, and witnesses who are compelled to attend the sittings of the courts, and to those who, as a part of the public, choose to do so; that said elevator is a great convenience in carrying the records to and from the offices of the court on other floors; that in the ways aforesaid, and in many other ways, the operation of the elevator facilitates the carrying on of the business of the courts, and is the principal means of access to the Vigo circuit court-room; that the board of commissioners, from the time the court-house was opened for use, in April, 1887, ran and operated the elevator; that the person last employed by the board to operate the elevator did not run the same to suit the convenience or necessities of the circuit and superior courts; that it was frequently shut down before the courts adjourned, or so soon thereafter that persons in attendance on the courts were compelled to go down on foot, and the records used in the courts and belonging to offices on other floors had to be carried; that the elevator frequently remained shut down after the courts had convened, so that persons attending court were compelled to use the stairways, while the records had to be carried up; that such neglect to properly operate the elevator caused those attending the courts great inconvenience and annoyance; that the Honorable David N. Taylor, Judge of the Vigo circuit court, having frequent complaints made to him of such neglect and malfeasance of the elevator-man, and himself observing the inefficiency in the operation of the elevator, and being duly advised in the premises, issued the following order:

"It is hereby ordered that the elevator running from the basement to the court-room floor be run and operated in accordance with the following schedule: During all terms of court from 8 A. M. until ten minutes past twelve noon, and thereafter so long as court shall be in session, and from a quarter past one until half past five during any term of court, and at all times during court, giving persons attending thereon a reasonable time to pass down therefrom after the adjournment of same, Sundays excepted. And the clerk is ordered to certify a copy hereof to the sheriff, and the sheriff is ordered to serve the same on the person or persons in charge of and running said elevator, and upon the board of county commissioners, and make return of such service into court."

That after the service of said order, the person in charge of the elevator failed to obey the same and failed and neglected to operate the elevator at times when the circuit and superior courts were in session; wherefore the circuit court directed the defendant, James W. Stout, who was then and is now the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of Vigo county, to take charge of the elevator and run the same according to the aforesaid schedule; that the defendant Stout is operating the elevator under the direction and by the order of the Vigo circuit court, and the defendant Lynch is the deputy of said Stout, and is acting as such in running said elevator. The board of commissioners also entered an order upon their records that the interests of the people of the county and a due regard for an economical administration of the affairs of the county, do not require the further running of the elevator, and therefore ordered it closed.

This paragraph of the answer concludes by averring that the Vigo circuit court did thereupon cause the said sheriff by himself and his said deputy to operate the elevator for the purpose of expediting and facilitating the business of the said circuit and superior courts, that the said circuit court so continued the operation of said elevator because in the exercise of its best judgment it deemed it necessary and expedient in carrying on the business of the said courts and a great public convenience. That the operation and running of said elevator is necessary in carrying on the business of the said circuit court.

The third paragraph of the answer is substantially the same as the second.

It is not seemly that a dispute such as this should have arisen between the parties concerned. We have, however, to consider the case as it comes to us. The controversy must seem trivial, but the questions involved are important.

The control of county property and the management of county business generally are confided by law to the commissioners of the county. In contemplation of law, in so far as the financial affairs of the county are concerned, the board of county commissioners is the county. The construction, maintenance, and custody of all county buildings, not excepting the court-house, are in the hands of the board. They provide and care for all the offices necessary for the conduct of county affairs, including court-rooms, offices for the clerk and sheriff of the court, jury rooms, jail and other rooms and buildings convenient and necessary for the conduct of the business of the courts. This, of course, includes the means of access to the court, whether by doors, halls, corridors, stairway, or elevators.

But while the powers and duties of the board of county commissioners within the county are thus ample and complete, as a constituent part of the administrative department of the state government, yet it must be kept in mind that these powers and duties are intrusted to the board for certain defined purposes, and that the commissioners are trustees for the carrying out of such purposes. The commissioners may not exercise their powers arbitrarily and without regard to the trusts committed to their keeping. The treasurer's office should be suitable for the safe keeping of the funds of the county. The records of deeds, showing title to the property of the people, should not be exposed to needless hazard. The jail should be such as to provide for the humane and safe keeping of those confined therein charged with the violation of the laws. And so for other trusts committed to the board.

Should any such trust be disregarded or abused, resort may be had to the courts by any aggrieved party, or by one authorized to act for the people at large. In case, however, the court itself is the party aggrieved, more delicate and important considerations are presented. The court-house, as the term implies, is chiefly for the use of the court, the remaining uses being subordinate and to a great extent incidental.

Courts are an integral part of the government and entirely independent, deriving their powers directly from the constitution, in so far as such powers are not inherent in the very nature of the judiciary. A court of general jurisdiction, whether named in the constitution, or established in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution, cannot be directed, controlled, or impeded in its functions by any of the other departments of the government. The security of human rights and the safety of free institutions require the absolute integrity and freedom of action of courts. Little v. State, 90 Ind. 338, 46 Am. Rep. 324; Smythe v. Boneoli, 117 Ind. 865; Ex parte Griffiths, 118 Ind. 88, 8 L. R. A. 398; State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 350, 4 L. R. A. 101; State v. Hyde, 121 Ind. 20; Langenberg v. Decker, 181 Ind. 471.

While the power of a court is essentially judicial, being the power to hear and adjudicate causes, yet it has also such incidental powers as are necessary to the full and free exercise of its purely judicial functions. The court may therefore make such rules and regulations as are necessary to secure its own freedom of action and to carry on its business with dignity, decorum, order, due dispatch and convenience.

The Statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1817) recognizes and asserts such implied power of the court, in addition to its strictly judicial powers, to make judgments, sentences, decrees, orders, injunctions, and to issue process, namely, the power "to do such other acts as may be proper to carry into effect the same," that is, the power to do what may be necessary for the exercise of its own proper functions. Judge Buskirk, in speaking of orders and rules of court made in pursuance of such power, says that, "while they are in force, they are as binding upon the court, parties and attorneys as though enacted by the legislature." Buskirk, Pr. 374, and authorities there cited.

Sections 1415 and 1416 of the same statutes more particularly recognize the power of the court to order the preparation of the court-house for the reception of the court, also to make orders for necessary heating, supplying furniture, and making repairs. Nash v. State, 88 Ind. 78.

Even without statutory enactment, however, the court, as we have seen, possesses all powers necessary for the free and untrammelled exercise of its functions. Considering, therefore, the facts concerning the Vigo county court-house as detailed in the answer, and as admitted to be true by the demurrer thereto, there can be but little doubt that the order made by the court as to the running of the elevator was a proper exercise of the inherent powers of the court. In the construction of the building, the elevator was made the principal, and was the only convenient entrance into and exit from the court-room. The stairways, located in a part of the building remote from the court-rooms, were plainly not a commodious means of access, nor were they intended for such purpose. Considering, too, the great cost of the edifice and of the elevator itself, it would be most unreasonable that the court, its judge, the officers, jurors, attorneys, parties, and witnesses, and the people generally who chose to attend upon the proceedings of the court, should be compelled to seek an entrance to so noble a seat of justice by way of obscure and distant stairways, when the county had provided a convenient and fit approach in the center of the building and near to the doors of the court-room. To prevent the use of the elevator under the circumstances appears as a perversion of the very purpose for which the court-house was built. It was not, perhaps, proper, except in case of urgent necessity, for the court to take upon itself the care and management of the court-house generally, or of any part of it, this being a duty confided by law to the county commissioners, the immediate representatives of the people. But under the conditions as they appear by the facts set forth in the answer, the dignified and proper administration of justice required the moderate and reasonable order issued by the court. The schedule provided for in that order was only for the time when the court should be in session and this the court had an undoubted right to ask. And when the order was disregarded by the person in charge of the elevator, the court might, as it did, direct its sheriff, by himself or deputy, to take charge of the elevator, or the court might appoint a bailiff to attend to that duty. When the order was served upon the man in charge of the elevator, and upon the board of county commissioners, it was but right and proper that they should have complied with it. It asked only that the chief purpose for which the court-house had been built and the elevator erected should be carried out. It would appear, indeed, that the elevator was expressly built for the needs of the court. The second and third floors, to which the elevator runs, are devoted almost exclusively to the use of the court, jury, and court officers. The county officers, including the commissioners themselves, are located on the first floor, and it would seem that but for the uses of the court, no elevator would have been needed in the building at all. Yet the board of commissioners went so far as to enter an order upon their records directing the total discontinuance of the elevator. The answer states that the circuit court, in the exercise of its best judgment, deemed it necessary and expedient in carrying on the business of the courts, that the elevator should be operated. It is further expressly alleged that the operation and running of the elevator is necessary in carrying on the business of the circuit court. These averments alone would make the answer good. The rule governing this case, to be deduced from what we have said, and from the authorities cited, is, that it was the right of the county commissioners, as it was their duty, to provide a suitable and convenient place for the holding of the courts of the county; but that if they failed in the exercise of such right and the discharge of such duty, the court could not, by their failure to act, or by any unwarranted act of theirs, be impeded in its own freedom of action under the constitution and laws of the state. It was the inherent right of the court, and it had the power, to provide a suitable court-room, and if that were already provided, to secure also fit and convenient means of using such court-room, including facilities for access thereto, suitable and necessary for the court itself, and in keeping with the character and plan of the building. What we have said thus far would be also applicable, if this were an appeal from the order of the court directing the sheriff to take charge of the elevator. The suit, however, was one for injunction to restrain the officers of the court from carrying out the order of the court itself. We have here, then, not an appeal from an order of court, but a collateral attack upon such order. The court had undoubted jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the approach to its own court-room, and its action could be reviewed only by appealing from its order. The order would not in any case be absolutely void, and hence could not be attacked collaterally.

There is this further to be said: The action was brought in the Vigo superior court to enjoin the carrying out of an order of the Vigo circuit court. One court is thus, in effect, asked to set aside or modify the order of another court of similar jurisdiction. This cannot be done. Gregory v. Perdue, 29 Ind. 66.

If the suit could under any circumstances be brought, it should have been brought in the circuit court. The proper procedure, however, would have been to file a petition in the Vigo circuit court asking to have the order complained of set aside or modified. From an adverse decision on such a request, if there should be one, an appeal might then be taken, and the reasonableness and propriety of the action of the court inquired into.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Long acquiescence in the universal custom of courts to sit at county seats is equal to positive law requiring the courts to be held at those places.
2. The power of courts to order necessary repairs to the court-room is inherent and incidental to jurisdiction like the power to punish for contempt.
3. The constitutional separation of the departments of government is not violated by a statute authorizing circuit courts to repair their court-rooms.
4. The power of circuit courts to authorize repairs to the court-room cannot extend to the practical reconstruction of the court-house or to the construction of lasting and permanent improvements such as extensions, additions, and enlargements.
5. A void order of court to make a practical reconstruction of the court-house is subject to collateral attack by way of injunction although the order purports to be for repairs and would have been valid if confined to necessary repairs only.

(January 23, 1894.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from carrying out a contract for the alleged repair of the court-house, which had been made under an order of the court.

Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Guthrie & Bushnell and Davidson & Lewis, for appellant:

The powers of government are divided into three separate departments.

Const. art. 3, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 160.

The board of commissioners belongs to the administrative department.

The general assembly may confer upon the boards doing county business in the several counties powers of a local, administrative character.

Const. art. 6, § 10, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 160.

The general assembly has conferred upon the board of commissioners power to make orders respecting the property of the county and take care of and preserve such property.

Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5745.

The board of commissioners has very broad powers over county finances, property, and institutions, and its discretion in the control and disposition of such finances and property and institutions is seldom, if ever, interfered with by the courts.

State v. Clark, 4 Ind. 815; Nixon v. State, 96 Ind. 111; Platler v. Elkhart County Comrs.

The general assembly has further provided that such commissioners shall cause a court-house to be erected and furnished.

Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5748; Moffit v. State, 40 Ind. 220; Kitchel v. Union County Comrs. 128 Ind. 841.

The general assembly has further provided that, "whenever it shall be necessary to construct, complete, or repair the court-house, the county commissioners may borrow for that purpose any sum of money not exceeding one per centum on the assessed valuation."

Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5749.

The board of commissioners has exclusive jurisdiction to erect and repair the court-house, including the court-room.

1. The legislative enactments and decisions confer jurisdiction in those matters upon that board, and there are no express enactments which confer jurisdiction in those matters upon the circuit court or upon any other board or officers except the board of commissioners.

2. It is the manifest policy of our laws that such jurisdiction "should belong to a single tribunal, and that should, it would seem, as is the fact, be the county board."

Benton County Comrs. v. Thompson, 7 Ind. 265.

Appellees claim that the circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction to make repairs to the court-room under the statute that "the said courts may also allow such sums as may be due to persons furnishing fuel used in term time, or furniture for court-room, or making repairs thereof."

Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1416, as construed in Nash v. State, 83 Ind. 78.

The fairest and most rational method to interpret the will of the legislator is by explaining his intentions at the time when the law was made, by signs the most natural and possible.

1 Bl. Com. § 2, p. 58; Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 128.

A statute must be construed with reference to the whole system of which it forms a part.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 284; Spencer v. State, 5 Ind. 41, 51; Marxwell v. Collins, 8 Ind. 88; State v. Harrison, 116 Ind. 304; Evansville v. Summers, 108 Ind. 193; Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 416; Taylor v. Washington County Comrs. 67 Ind. 883; Prather v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 52 Ind. 16.

And so, the practical construction given to a statute by the public officers of the state, and acted upon by those interested, and by the people, is to be considered in cases of doubt. In some cases it has been held to be conclusive.

State v. Harrison, supra; Bruce v. Schuyler, 9 Ill. 231, 46 Am. Dec. 447.

The manifest purpose of the legislature was to make it possible for tradesmen furnishing those necessary incidentals for the use of courts in term time, which it is the duty of the sheriff to provide, to get pay for the same without being compelled to wait until the commissioners of the county should be in session and to present their claims there for allowance.

Can it be reasonably maintained that what is here undertaken can be denominated repairs to the court-room, or even to the court-house—the entire structure?

Words are generally to be understood in their usual and most known signification; not so much regarding the propriety of grammar, as their general and popular use.

1 Bl. Com. p. 59.

The words themselves best declare the intention of the legislature.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 247; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 240.

To repair is to restore to a sound or good state after decay, waste, injury, or partial destruction; it is to again make ready—it is to again put into a state for use.

Webster's Dict.; Anderson's Law Dict.; Bouvier's Law Dict.

Additions or enlargements are not repairs.

Stephens v. Milnor, 24 N. J. Eq. 359.

Nor is repairing a street repairs to the premises.

Blount v. Janesville, 81 Wis. 654; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 336.

Nor does a contract for repairing a ship include furnishing a lost anchor and chain.

Anglin v. Henderson, 21 U. C. Q. B. 27.

Movable iron cells for a jail are not repairs.

Cook v. Des Moines County, 70 Iowa, 171.

To repair a building means simply to restore it to a sound condition.

First Nat. Bank of Mt. Vernon v. Sarlls, 18 L. R. A. 481, 129 Ind. 201; Weaver v. Templin, 118 Ind. 808; Pittsburgh & B. Pass. R. Co. v. Pittsburgh, 80 Pa. 72; Romack v. Hobbs (Ind.) Nov. 2, 1892; Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens Street R. Co. 10 L. R. A. 770, 128 Ind. 534.

The plain literal meaning, then, of section 1416, for the purpose of this case, is this: The circuit court may allow sums due for incidental repairs to furniture of its court-room.

Ministerial and administrative duties do not belong to the judicial department.

Ex parte Griffiths, 3 L. R. A. 398, 118 Ind. 88.

The act of the court in this case was ministerial and not judicial.

Crow v. Warren County Comrs. 118 Ind. 54; Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs. 103 Ind. 873.

No matter what court, board, or tribunal exercises such power, it is clearly ministerial and administrative. The name given to it, or the grade of court exercising it, cannot control its classification. The nature of the thing done controls. It belongs to the executive branch of the government.

While the judicial domain is sacred, so also are the other fields and departments of government, and the judiciary is bound to be equally watchful and punctilious about overstepping the boundaries of its own proper domain and invading that of either of the other departments.

Const. art. 3, § 1; Waldo v. Wallace, 19 Ind. 569.

Constitutional restraints are overstepped where one department of government attempts to exercise powers exclusively delegated to another.

Butler v. State, 97 Ind. 377.

No one of these departments can be allowed or authorized to invade the domain of the other two, or either of them, but they must remain separate, distinct, and independent.

Co. v. Howcutt*, 6 Colo. 574; Whiting v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 515.

Appellees claim that if the court had the power to make any repairs the order is not void, but simply erroneous. But the court did not order any independent separate thing that was repairs. No one integral part of the work can be eliminated, as repairs, leaving the residue as new construction. The court did not select, nor can any mind select, an item of separate repairs, nor was it the intention of the order, nor can it be construed as requiring the doing of anything less than the whole work for the whole price. And this view must be taken as true for the purposes of this appeal, in as much as appellees in their answer adopt that theory, and upon that theory the case was tried below.

Romack v. Hobb, supra; Elliott, App. Proc. pp. 481, 489, 490.

If there was an excess of jurisdiction the whole order is void.

See Freem. Judgm. § 120c; Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, § 739.

This order is void, by reason of lack of jurisdiction over the subject-matter—the court-house—and lack of power to do the thing proposed; and it is void upon its face, for the plans and specifications are made part of it. All persons contracting under this order are bound to take notice of this invalidity.

Brady v. New York, 2 Bosw. 173; Reichard v. Warren County, 81 Iowa, 381; Johnson v. Indianapolis, 16 Ind. 237.

If the order is void, it may be attacked in any manner, even collaterally, and the contractors can have no rights under it.

This action is a direct attack upon the order of the circuit court for the reason that it was brought at the earliest opportunity, in the same court, against all parties that had or could have any interest in or rights under the order, and facts are alleged in each paragraph of the complaint, which, if true, would entitle appellant to have the order in question set aside and vacated as illegal and void.

Judge, judicatory, judicial, jurisdiction, judgment, justice, are terms that relate only to the determinations of causes, or the rights of men,—not necessarily in active litigation, but in some form as they pass sub judice. Even a proceeding in rem is in fact a proceeding in personam, and the seizure is not the hearing.

Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 279, 23 L. ed. 216.

The jurisdiction of courts is the power and only the power to determine the causes of men by the regular process of the law.

Hoover v. Hanna, 3 Blackf. 48; Robertson v. State, 109 Ind. 79.

Jurisdiction is the power by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide causes.

State v. Wakefield, 60 Vt. 618.

It does not follow that courts may not exercise some other powers, or what seems to be other powers. They are, however, simply incidental to the principal power. Blot out the principal power and the incident is gone.

It would be impossible to enumerate or even to classify the acts that would be within the scope of this incidental power, but the principle is not difficult to illustrate. A court may order stationery, an additional bailiff, repair of a window, the silencing of a band of music in the street, an additional chair or table and inconceivable other things, to facilitate the transaction of its business; but such things bear no analogy to the repair or reconstruction of a building for the use of the court in after years, and for use in the transaction of business not yet originated.

In Barnett v. Ashmore, 5 Wash. 163, the court below had ordered rooms, furniture, fuel, lights, stationery, etc., suitable for the transaction of business by the court, to be provided by the sheriff. It was held that the statute did not authorize it, and the court had no such power, and that the matter belonged to the board of commissioners.

In Los Angeles County v. Los Angeles County Super. Ct., 93 Cal. 380, the court below had become impatient at the delays in finishing the new county building, and ordered the sheriff to prepare accommodations, furniture, fuel, lights, etc. The supreme court did not dignify the question with serious argument, but after a statement of the facts, in a per curiam opinion, said: "We do not think the court and judges have such power."

In Neosho County Comrs. v. Stoddart, 18 Kan. 207, an order was made by the judge of the district court. "That the sheriff of said county be and he hereby is directed to purchase eighty-one yards of cocoa matting."

The court on appeal held that the sheriff with or without the order of the court, had no power to make the purchase.

The executive, legislative, and judicial departments are forever aloof from each other. The legislature could not clothe the circuit courts with the duties of building court-houses, jails and bridges if it were so minded.

The incidental power of courts to make repairs was recognized by the supreme court in the case of Benton County Comrs. v. Thompson, 7 Ind. 265. It was recognized by the legislature by sections 1415 and 1416, Rev. Stat. 1881, and again by the supreme court in Nash v. State, 38 Ind. 78.

The White circuit court had jurisdiction of the matter of the repair of the court-room in question. The powers of that court are derived from the constitution of Indiana. That instrument vested in the supreme and circuit courts the judicial power of the state.

If the judicial department of the state government is independent of the others, if it may not voluntarily cease to continuously perform its constitutional functions, if no other department may, by affirmative act or by neglect of duty, hinder, delay, or force a discontinuance of the exercise of those powers by the judicial department, then, of necessity, courts must be held to possess the inherent power to do or cause to be done anything which if omitted would result in the cessation of the exercise, by courts, of judicial power.

If courts be held to possess inherent power to do these minor things, necessary only that the court's decrees may properly and in due form be carried out, or the dignity of the court upheld, must not this same department of government, of necessity, have power to order those things which will enable it to act, and which if not so ordered would prevent entire ly the administration of justice?

This is not the principal power of a court, but is incident to the principal power and inseparable from it.

Mitchell*, 49 Wis. 284; Bass v. Pt. Wayne, 121 Ind. 339; McIneney v. Sullivan, 126 Ind. 407.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit to enjoin the appellees, the sheriff, auditor, and treasurer of said county, and Charles Pearce and Thomas Morgan, contractors, from carrying out a certain contract entered into by said Gwin as sheriff of said county, under the order of said circuit court, on one side, and said Pearce and Morgan on the other, by which it was claimed by the appellant that the old court-house of the county was being, or about to be, demolished, and substantially a new court-house was to be erected instead of the old, at a cost of $82,087.50; while it was claimed on the other hand that the carrying out of the contract was only making needed repairs of the court-room. There is really no material controversy about the facts, but the main dispute is about the law that governs the case.

It is alleged in the complaint, and the evidence shows, that on the 16th day of May, 1892, the White circuit court made and entered a finding and order condemning the court-room as unsafe and unfit for further use, in the following words: "The circuit court, being duly advised, finds that the court-room in the court-house of this county is so out of repair that it is unsafe longer to hold the sessions of court therein, that the plastering on the ceiling is loose and liable to fall upon persons in the court-room engaged in business before this court; that the jury room is both unsafe and unfit for occupancy, and jurors while deliberating endanger their health and lives while remaining therein; that the walls of the court-room are cracked, that the records of this court are not protected and are in danger of loss by fire, and the papers in causes pending are also in danger of loss by fire and otherwise; that papers in cases disposed of and which constitute part of the records of this court, are kept in a damp and insufficient vault, where they are mildewing and rotting, and will be lost unless removed from the place where they are now kept, that there is insufficient room for the library, and no chambers for the judge nor grand jury room in said court-house; that the belfry is unsafe and liable to fall or be blown down, and thus the lives of persons going to and from the sessions of this court are endangered; that the roof over the court-room is so out of repair as to utterly fail to keep out rain, many of which defects are patent and others apparent upon investigation; and that no steps are being taken by the board of commissioners to repair said court-room so as to make it fit for use. It is therefore ordered by the court that the court-room now occupied by this court be, and is hereby, condemned as unsafe and unfit for use until repaired."

On May 26, 1892, the said court ordered said court-room repaired by an order modified on July 11, 1892, and entered of record as follows: "In the matter of the circuit court-room. The court having heretofore found that the present court-room is unsafe and unfit for the transaction of the business of this court, it is therefore now ordered by the court that said court-room be repaired. And the court now appoints James F. Alexander & Sons, competent architects, to submit plans and specifications for such repairs. And comes now said James F. Alexander & Sons, and submit such plans and specifications, which are in these words and figures, to wit: (insert) and the court having examined the same, and being duly advised in the premises, finds that said court-room can be properly repaired according to said plans and specifications, and cannot be repaired so that the same will be safe and permanent by the adoption of any other plans and specifications. Wherefore the court now approves and adopts said plans and specifications and orders that said court-room be repaired in accordance therewith.

"And it is further ordered that James P. Gwin, the sheriff of this county, proceed to cause said repairs to be made, and he shall employ persons to do said work of repairing said court-room, such employment to be made in such manner as he shall see fit, and he shall superintend the construction of said repairs. The said repairs shall be completed on or before the 1st day of November, 1892, and upon the completion of said repairs, the said sheriff shall report the fact to this court, and also certify the costs of such repairs, and the person or persons to whom the costs thereof are due, for allowance as provided by law. And said court does now appoint James F. Alexander & Sons, architects, to inspect said work and make all proper estimates during the progress of said repairs.

"And comes James P. Gwin, sheriff of this county; and reports to the court that in pursuance to the order in this matter, he has employed Pearce and Morgan to make the necessary repairs to the circuit court-room herein before ordered, and taken from them a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of said work, and the protection of this county against loss, which acts of said sheriff are approved by the court. And all persons are forbidden and prohibited from in any way hindering or delaying the progress of said repairing and from interfering with said sheriff, or any person or persons employed by him, or acting under him while engaged in the making of said repairs; and the sheriff is ordered to remove at once from the court-room all the furniture and fixtures therein so that work of repairing may begin immediately."

It is further shown that the court ordered the said sheriff to procure another room in the town of Monticello in which to hold court, which was done, and the court and its records moved out of said court-house and to the building thus secured to be occupied and used as a court-room while the work contemplated was being done.

It is further alleged in the complaint that about the year 1850 the board of commissioners of White county built the court-house now in question in the upper part of which is the court-room, giving a minute description of the building, the original cost of which is stated to be but $10,000, while the contract price of the work contemplated in the order as reduced by the modification, is $82,087.50, with a liability under the order allowing the court and architect to change the plans and specifications to reach many thousands of dollars more. That no additions had ever been made thereto, and that said court-house as originally constructed in the public square at the county seat was a substantial two-story brick court-house, 70 feet long by 48 feet wide and 30 feet high, surmounted by a wooden belfry 10½ feet square and 25 feet high, containing on the first floor offices and vaults for the clerk, auditor, treasurer, and recorder, and on the second floor a large and commodious court-room and a small jury room, which court-room and offices had been continuously used by the officers and courts up to July 12, 1892; that appellant had repaired it from time to time; that the plans and specifications require the tearing away of so much of the old building as to constitute a practical destruction of it and a remodeling and reconstruction thereof; that the contract was entered into without the plans and specifications having been first filed in the office of the county auditor, and without having advertised for bids.

The material parts of the appellee's answer are as follows:

"That the court-house at Monticello, White county, Indiana, was and still is the only place in said county provided for and as a place of holding the sessions of the circuit court of said county. That on the 16th day of May, 1892, and long prior thereto, said building was out of repair, to wit: that the plastering on the ceiling of the court-room was loose and liable to fall upon persons in the court-room engaged in business before the White circuit court; that the foundation of said building was and is defective in this, to wit: that the part thereof under ground is composed of boulders laid too loosely and not to sufficient depth to give the required strength to sustain the walls built thereon, and because of said defective foundation, the walls of said building have settled and cracked and will fall to the ground unless they are strengthened and supported. That to sustain said walls from below, it is necessary to place thereunder a sound and secure foundation of cut stone and cement, and to hold said walls in place and prevent them from splitting and falling outward, it is necessary to give them lateral support, by the erection against the same of the additional walls contemplated by the contract of the defendants, Pearce and Morgan; that by placing under the walls a new foundation, properly constructed, etc., which can be easily done under the contract of Pearce and Morgan, . . . without removing or in any wise impairing said walls, and by the erection of said additional walls, said building would be given sufficient strength and securely held in place, and that unless said walls are so strengthened and supported as aforesaid, it would be impossible to make the repairs that are necessary to the court-room, which occupies the second story of said building, and which is the only room provided for the holding of the circuit court of said county; that because of the insecure and dilapidated condition of the walls of said court-room hereinbefore mentioned, the same is unsafe and dangerous in this, to wit: that they are liable to give way and fall at any time upon the persons who may be in or near said building and because of the dangerous condition of said walls, the said court-room cannot longer be occupied or used as such. That the roof leaks, rendering it unfit for occupancy; that many of the rafters and other timbers supporting said roof, and joists supporting the ceiling and floor of said court-room, have, by reason of age and exposure to wet, become rotten and thereby weakened to such an extent that they are liable to give way and fall at any time and kill or injure persons that might then be in said building; that by reason of the cracking and spreading of the walls, the joists of the ceiling and floor of the court-room did and do not rest in or upon the walls of said room, and none of said joists have sufficient rest or footing in or upon said walls to securely support the same, and are liable to fall and endanger the lives of persons in said building and court-room."

We have set out the substance of the complaint and answers and the order of the court, so as to exhibit the version of each party as to the nature of the power exercised by the circuit court in ordering what it denominates repairs of the court-room. It appears from all these averments, and the plans and specifications which are a part of the record of the order, that the work contemplated therein will be the construction of a new foundation and basement of cut stone, bearing no resemblance to the old foundation; large portions of the old walls are to be destroyed and taken away, and those that are left to remain are to be supported by new walls, so as to support and keep them from falling. The joists, floors, and ceilings are to be made new throughout, the roof and rafters are to be made new, the windows and doors are to be made new, the inside finishing is to be made new. There are extensions and additions to be constructed beyond the dimensions of the old building, there are rooms and apartments to be added that were not in the old building. Indeed, about all that will remain of the old building when the plans and specifications are carried out will be so much of the old walls as are to be left standing, and that part of the brick that comes out of the old demolished walls that are sound, and which by the specifications may be used in the new walls for back filling.

Issue was joined and the court below, after hearing the evidence, found for the appellees and rendered judgment in their favor over a motion for a new trial. About the only point on which it can be said that there was any conflict in the evidence was as to the alleged dangerous condition of the building. As to the nature of the work to be done under the order of the court there was no conflict. It is contended by the appellee that there is a collateral attack on the adjudication of the court, by which the necessity and order for the work was adjudicated. And it is contended that mere errors and irregularities in the order are unavailable on such an attack. We have no doubt if the circuit court had the power to make the order, that this attack thereon being collateral must fail. Bass v. Fort Wayne, 121 Ind. 889.

The first inquiry which appellee's contention suggests is this: Was the order made by a court at all? A court is defined to consist of persons officially assembled at a time and place appointed by law for the administration of justice. Re Allison, 18 Colo. 525, 10 L. R. A. 790; Dunn v. State, 2 Ark. 229, 35 Am. Dec. 54; Levy v. Bigelow, 7 Ind. App.

It appears from the record of the order that when it was made the proper persons, namely, the clerk, sheriff, and judge of the White circuit court had assembled at the time appointed by law for holding said court. The place where they assembled was within the county and within the county seat of said county of White. But there is no statute fixing the place for holding the White circuit court at any particular point in the county. Indeed, we have been unable to find any statutory or constitutional provision fixing the place in any county where the circuit court should be held from the organization of the state to the present time. The nearest approach to such a provision is section 24 of the Act of 1888, for the regulation of county business, which provides that, "the circuit courts in counties where court-houses shall not have been erected, shall be holden for the time being at the place designated by law or selected by the court." Rev. Stat. 1888, p. 155.

There has always been a provision that the circuit court of each county should be held in the county, but none that such courts should be held at the county seat, or even in the court-house, or at any other particular place in the county; yet no one can doubt that it is the law that circuit courts shall be held at the county seats of the various counties. A large number of statutes proceed upon the idea that the county seat is the local habitation of the circuit court, yet none of them so expressly provides. Among them is section 5944, Rev. Stat. 1881, passed in 1858, relating to the clerk of the circuit court, and providing that, "such clerk shall keep his office open at the county seat, in a building provided for that purpose by the board of commissioners of the county every day in the year (Sundays and the Fourth of July excepted) between the hours of nine A. M. and four P. M. where, by himself or deputy, he shall attend to the duties of his office not otherwise provided for." The statute providing for posting advertisements of, and the place where judicial sales are to be made, and many others tend to show the intention to have been that circuit courts shall be held at the county seat. Rather it has been assumed by such legislature that such a law had already been passed. In construing statutes, the whole system must be looked to, and statutes upon cognate subjects may be referred to, though not strictly in pari materia, to ascertain the meaning of any particular part. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 284.

Other statutes, and the general principles of law will be considered in construing statutes. Crawfordsville & S. W. Turnp. Co. v. Fletcher, 104 Ind. 97; Stout v. Grant County Comrs. 107 Ind. 848; Evansville v. Summers, 108 Ind. 189; State v. Harrison, 116 Ind. 800.

It was held by this court in Franklin County Comrs. v. Bunting, 111 Ind. 148, that though there was no statute authorizing the county board to provide a sheriff's residence, yet as the statute made it the duty of the county board to provide and maintain a county jail, and enjoins on the sheriff the duty to keep the jail, and inasmuch as it has always been the custom of boards of county commissioners to make suitable provision for the sheriff's residence; that this custom had given a construction to the law which could not be disregarded, even if there was doubt as to the meaning of the statute. This court in that case said: "In speaking of a practical construction given to a statute, the supreme court of Illinois said: 'It has always been regarded by the courts as equivalent to positive law.'" Bruce v. Schuyler, 9 Ill. 221, 46 Am. Dec. 447.

By another court the principle was stated thus: "We cannot shake a principle which in practice has so long and so extensively prevailed. Rogers v. Goodwin, 2 Mass. 476. There are many cases which declare and enforce this principle, among them are Stuart v. Laird, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 299, 2 L. ed. 115; Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97; Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257; Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213-290, 6 L. ed. 606-682; Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162, 22 L. ed. 627; State v. Parkinson, 5 Nev. 15; Pike v. Megoun, 44 Mo. 491; People v. La Salle County Suprs. 100 Ill. 495; State v. French, 2 Pinney, 181."

It has been the universal custom to hold the circuit courts at the county seats without exception, from the organization of the state to the present time, under an interpretation of the statutes that they imperatively required the court to be so held. This long acquiescence in such a construction is equal to positive law, requiring such courts to be so held. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 808, 809; State v. Harrison, supra.

Likewise, the statute requires "the county commissioners to erect a court-house jail, and public offices for the clerks, recorder, treasurer, and auditor, . . . where the same has not been done, shall keep the public buildings of the county in repair and such offices, if practicable, shall be made fire proof, and shall be occupied by such officers respectively." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5748.

But there is no provision unless in a special act for removal of county seats requiring such court-houses or other public buildings to be built at the county seat, yet the universal practice, without a single exception, has been that court-houses and other public buildings, connected with the courts or the administration of justice, have been erected at the county seat. The Act of 1875, providing for the various duties of county boards in relation to the construction of court-houses and other public buildings of the county makes no provision that court-houses are to be built at the county seat. And yet in view of the long and uniform practical construction given to these statutes amounting now to positive law, if the board of commissioners were to attempt to erect a court-house at the expense of the county at any other place than the county seat, such attempt would be illegal, and their acts in furtherance thereof would be void and liable to be enjoined. So, too, in case the circuit court should com-vene at any place outside of the county seat the acts and proceedings at such other place would be void.

The Constitution of 1816 provided for a supreme court and circuit courts. Section 6, article 4, Constitution of 1816, General Laws of Indiana, from 1816 to 1817. This court was organized by Act approved December 28, 1816. That Act provided that the place of meeting of this court should be at the court-house at the seat of government. That had reference to the town of Corydon, in Harrison county. That Constitution was repealed and superseded by the Constitution of 1851, and there has never been any statutory or constitutional provision fixing a place for this court to meet and hold its sessions from that time to this. But it has been the universal custom and practice for this court to meet and hold its sessions at the capitol of the state, with as much regularity as if there had been a statute of the state imperatively requiring such meetings and sessions at the state capitol. That practice has been so long continued and the construction of our statutes relating to the same has been so long acquiesced in and accepted as unquestioned by everybody, and all the departments of the state government, that it amounts now to positive law that the state capitol is the only lawful place where this court can assemble to take judicial action. The more recent statutes organizing courts have provided where the same should be held. The act providing for superior courts provides that they are to be held at the county seat, and in the court-house, unless the county board furnish some other place for them to be held in the county seat. The act in relation to criminal courts makes a similar provision. The act creating the appellate court of this state provides for holding its sessions at the capitol of the state. It follows from the principles above announced that by long practice, uniformly acquiesced in all over the state giving our statutes the construction that the circuit courts must hold their sessions at the county seat, amounts now to positive law, and that the White circuit court when it made the order in question here was lawfully assembled at the time and place designated by law for the administration of justice, and was therefore a court.

These principles of construction will apply to a far more important phase of the case further on.

It is further contended by the appellant that, the circuit court being clothed with powers belonging to one department of the state government only, namely, the judicial, it can exercise no power not judicial in its nature, and that it is beyond the constitutional authority of the legislature to confer any such power upon that court, and it is contended that the power to make the order in question is not judicial, but is administrative or ministerial. The constitution divides the powers of the government of the state "into three separate departments, the legislative, the executive including the administrative, and the judicial, and no person charged with official duties under one of these departments shall exercise any of the functions of another, except as in this constitution expressly provided." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 96. Therefore the appellant contends that even though the legislature may have attempted to confer the power on the circuit courts to repair their court-rooms, such legislation is in conflict with the constitutional provision just quoted, because the power is not judicial, but is administrative or ministerial, and cannot be exercised by the judicial department. We have already seen that such power has been expressly conferred on the boards of commissioners by section 5748, Rev. Stat. 1881. The appellees claim that section 1482, 1 Burns' Revision of 1894, Rev. Stat. 1881, section 1416, also confers the power on the circuit courts. It reads as follows: "The said courts may also allow such sums as may be due to persons furnishing fuel used in term time, or furniture for the court-room, or making repairs thereof."

It is also contended on behalf of the appellees that the circuit court is possessed of this power independent of the legislature, as one of the incidental or inherent powers of the court as a judicial tribunal, of which the legislature could and cannot deprive it. An eminent author says: "Judicial power as contra-distinct from the power of the law has no existence. Courts are mere instruments of the law. Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge, always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature, that is, to the will of the law." Hawes, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 4.

"And when courts are said to exercise a discretion, it is a mere legal discretion a discretion to be exercised in discerning the course prescribed by law, and when it is discovered, it is the duty of the court to follow it." Id. § 29; Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 386, 6 L. ed. 234.

The state constitution further provides that, "the judicial power of the state shall be vested in a supreme court, in circuit courts, and in such other courts as the general assembly may establish." 1 Burns' Rev. 1894, § 161.

And that, "the state shall, from time to time, be divided into judicial circuits, and a judge for each circuit shall be elected by the voters thereof. He shall reside within the circuit, and shall hold his office for the term of six years, if he so long behave well." Id. § 160.

These constitutional provisions make the circuit courts, when organized, constitutional tribunals; but if nothing else existed in the way of constitutional provision or legislative enactment, the circuit courts would have nothing but an imaginary existence, an existence only in legal contemplation, but no real potential existence.

Browne on Jurisdiction, says: "Courts may be established, and their jurisdiction defined by the constitution or organic law of the state, or by legislative enactment. Generally, however, jurisdiction proceeds from statutory power granted, except where it is given by the constitution, of which the Supreme Court of the United States is an example; and the statutes prescribe the manner in which the court shall be conducted and the form and procedure, and appoint, or provide for the appointment or election of judges and subordinate officers, as well as the method or rules of procedure governing them. There are no courts in this country, except those so created." Browne, Jurisdiction, § 12.

In Levy v. Bigelow, supra, the appellate court said: "A court has been defined as a place where justice is judicially administered. Co. Litt. 58; 3 Bl. Com. 23. This definition, however, has been often criticized as too narrow, being limited by the word 'place.' The prominence of the word 'place' in this definition no doubt arises from the ancient idea that the king was the fountain and dispenser of justice, and wherever he was domiciled was a court or place where justice was dispensed. In modern times and under our form of government, the judicial power is exercised by means of courts. A court is an instrumentality of government. It is a creation of the law, and in some respects it is an imaginary thing, that exists only in legal contemplation, very similar to a corporation. A time when, a place where, and the persons by whom judicial functions are to be exercised are essential to complete the idea of a court. It is in its organized aspect, with all these constituent elements of time, place, and officers, that completes the idea of a court, in the general legal acceptance of the term. But the court may exist in legal contemplation without any officers charged with the duty of administering justice."

It is by legislative enactment alone that these constituent elements of the circuit courts of this state have been brought into existence, and thereby the legislature has called into being the actual and real existence of the circuit courts of this state, as contradistinguished from their existence solely under the constitutional provisions quoted above. The Legislature has made them courts of general jurisdiction. Burns' Rev. 1894, § 1366; Barkley v. Tapp, 87 Ind. 25.

The common law having been adopted by the legislature before the state was organized, and while it was a territory, which has been re-enacted and continued in force ever since, all the common-law powers of a court of general jurisdiction, not locally inapplicable and inconsistent with our form of government, are vested in the circuit courts by virtue of their reaction, as before stated, and by virtue and force of the common law in force in the state when they were called into existence by the legislature, subject only to the limitations of the constitution of the state and the Constitution of the United States, and the treaties and laws made in pursuance thereof.

One of the limitations of the constitution of the state is that the courts are inhibited from exercising any power but judicial, and therefore are forbidden from exercising administrative or ministerial powers as courts. Ordering and paying for repairs of their court-rooms is ministerial or administrative. Hamilton County Comrs. v. Cottingham, 56 Ind. 559; McCormick v. Johnson County Comrs., 68 Ind. 214; Orow v. Warren County Comrs., 118 Ind. 51, and authorities there cited; Patton v. Montgomery County Comrs., 96 Ind. 181.

But courts of general jurisdiction were by the common law clothed with what was known as incidental or inherent power. The power to punish for contempt belongs to this class, and it is to be noted that law-writers and courts nearly always designate it as the power of the court, and scarcely ever call it jurisdiction to punish for contempt. Browne, Jurisdiction, § 115 a; Hawes, Jurisdiction of Courts, §§ 221-223. The common law authorized courts to exercise this power, not because it was judicial in the strict sense, but because it was absolutely essential for the maintenance and preservation of the dignity, authority, and jurisdiction of the court. See same authorities.

Because self-preservation is said to be the highest law of nature. The courts and law-writers all agree that, "the power to hear and determine a cause is jurisdiction." Browne, Jurisdiction, § 1, p. 2; Quart v. Abbott, 103 Ind. 233, 52 Am. Rep. 662; Lantz v. Maffett, 103 Ind. 23; Hawes, Jurisdiction of Courts, §§ 1, 2.

But the power to hear and determine a contempt is never spoken of as a constituent element of the power to punish for such contempt. It is rather essential that the court have jurisdiction to hear and determine some cause and be engaged in the exercise of such jurisdiction as a condition and constituent element of its power to punish for contempt. See Browne, Jurisdiction, § 115 a, and authorities there cited; Hawes, supra.

It follows that it is out of absolute necessity that this inherent power to punish for contempt springs, and not out of the general jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine causes generally. Because, says Hawes on Jurisdiction, supra: "The power of the court to punish for an alleged contempt of its authority, though undoubted, is in its nature arbitrary, and its exercise is not to be upheld except under the circumstances, and in the manner provided by law."

The power to repair the court-room of the circuit court is akin to the power to punish for contempt. Like the power to punish for contempt, it springs out of absolute necessity, out of that highest law of nature, self-preservation, and does not belong to the general jurisdiction, but is incidental to such jurisdiction, and is inherent in the court, and was so when the circuit courts were first called into existence by the legislature. Browne on Jurisdiction, sec. 14, says: "Where jurisdiction is conferred on a court by the constitution, the legislature may nevertheless regulate the mode and manner of its exercise and such legislative enactments will be obligatory unless it practically deprives the court of the power granted."

Whether this inherent power to repair the court-room was conferred by the legislature or the constitution is unimportant to inquire, as in either case the legislature has the authority to regulate the exercise of that power so long as the act of regulation does not deprive the court of the power. The section of the statute already quoted regulates the exercise of that power without impairing it.

It is, however, to be observed that as circuit courts were in existence in the state as courts of general jurisdiction, invested with these inherent powers when the constitution was adopted, the presumption arises that it was the intention of the framers of that instrument that such courts should continue to be clothed with such inherent and incidental powers. State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 850, 4 L. R. A. 101.

Therefore, section 1482 of the Statute, supra, conferring and regulating the power of circuit courts to repair their court-rooms is not in conflict with section 1 of article 8 of the Constitution already quoted, forbidding persons charged with official duties under one of the departments of the state government from exercising any of the functions of another, except as otherwise expressly provided in the Constitution. Such is the construction the statute and Constitution has received. Benton County Comrs. v. Thompson, 7 Ind. 265; Nash v. State, 88 Ind. 78.

If there were any doubts as to the correctness of this construction, the great length of time it has been received and acted on according to the principles already laid down gives to it the force of positive law. There is no necessity for the exercise of any power beyond repairs by the circuit courts. Both the power to repair and to build court-houses has been wisely conferred upon the board of commissioners in the exercise of the large administrative and ministerial powers constitutionally vested in that body by the legislature. And the exclusive power to build court-houses and other county buildings has been vested by the legislature in such county boards.

But a doorway may be broken down by casualty or otherwise, leading to and from the court-room, so as to interfere with the due administration of justice therein, or a window broken out with like effect, or furniture destroyed or any other circumstance that transpires, by which the court-room is so impaired in its usefulness as to materially interfere with the due administration of justice therein; the inherent power of the court ought to and does exist to afford temporary relief for the time being, to order and pay for such repairs as will enable the court to continue the due administration of justice therein. But it is contended that even if this inherent power does exist, that it is not an unlimited power, and must be confined to repairs in the sense of that necessity out of which the power springs, and that it does not exist to the extent of practically rebuilding or reconstructing the court-house, or to the construction of lasting and permanent improvements, such as extensions, additions, and enlargements to the court-house. We are of opinion that this contention must prevail because such is the law. But it is contended by the appellees, on the other hand, that if the power to repair existed at all, and the White circuit court in its attempt to carry such power into execution erred and went beyond what might be termed legitimate repairs, it was a mere error in judgment, a mere irregularity that did not affect the jurisdiction, and that such error and irregularity could not be inquired into in this collateral way. Counsel say that: "The finding of the court and the decree of the court is directed to the repair of the court-room, and it finds that every part of it is necessary and proper in the making of said repairs."

regularity could not be inquired into in this collateral way. Counsel say that: "The finding of the court and the decree of the court is directed to the repair of the court-room, and it finds that every part of it is necessary and proper in the making of said repairs."

If epithets and names freely applied in an order complained of could give it a fixed character, which would be conclusive upon the courts, then the order here in question has conclusively adjudged the subject thereof to be repairs of the court-room, pure and simple, because in that short order the word "repairs" and "repaired" are used no less than twenty times. Then in addition to the details of the dangerous dilapidation of the old court-house, set forth in the order, the fact that the commissioners were taking no steps to repair it is made prominent in the order though they had ample notice of its condition. Browne on Jurisdiction, § 26, says: "When recitals in the record show any facts which negative the jurisdiction of the court, then the record is self-impeached."

This was a suit in equity. Equity looks at the intent, rather than the form; it always attempts to get at the substance of things, and to ascertain, uphold, and enforce rights which spring from the real relations of parties. It will never suffer the mere appearance and external form to conceal the true purposes, objects, and consequences of a transaction. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878.

We have already seen that when the plans and specifications made a part of the order are carried out, there will be left standing only a very small part of the old building, a small portion of the old walls; everything else will be new, and there will be additions and extensions, all of which will be entirely new. It is manifest from the face of the record of the order that the intent was to come as near building a new court-house as possible, and yet retain any semblance of repairs. It is quite manifest from the order that the only reason that any portion of the old, dilapidated wall was retained was to furnish a nucleus around which repairs could be made with some plausibility, and so that the court might be able to say the work ordered was repairs. The work contemplated and described in the plans and specifications cannot be denominated "repairs," with any regard to accuracy of expression, as we shall hereinafter see. But if a part of the work ordered were legitimate repairs which the court had power to make yet the whole is so blended as to be inseparable, which places the whole beyond the jurisdiction of the court. Freem. Judgm. § 120 c; VanFleet, Collateral Attack, 789.

It is also manifest from reading the record of the order that had the court felt assured that it possessed the power to rebuild the court-house, it would have done what all must agree ought to have been done, namely, demolish the entire building and build an entirely new court-house on the old site. It would not have gone through the unseemly process of "sewing new cloth onto an old garment, or putting new wine into old bottles." St. Mark 11: 22.

The old building originally cost but $10, - 000, and was at the time worth about $7,000. Probably an entirely new court-house could have been built for the $32,087.50, the contract price of the alleged repairs. If the appellants had courageously performed their duty and built a new court-house before their neglect had driven the judge of their circuit court into extreme measures, they would have saved their county from much needless expense and loss. But, however overwhelmingly the evidence may establish that an entire new court-house was imperiously demanded, yet if the White circuit court had no power to build one, or had no power to do what it attempted to do, that consideration cannot add to or enlarge the power of the court so as to justify the act. Counsel for appellees ask: "Must the court remain in a dangerous structure until it falls upon it and destroys the lives of the persons constituting it? Cannot the court anticipate calamities by provident use of human skill? Must a court wait until a judge is killed or maimed before resorting to that highest law, self protection. Is it not within the power of the court to protect itself against . . . a veritable death trap?" We answer the first of these interrogatories in the negative, the second in the affirmative, the third in the negative and the fourth in the affirmative.

The court is not bound to remain in a dangerous structure until it falls and destroys the life of judge or officers; it can anticipate such calamities by provident use of human skill; it is within the power of the court to protect itself against such a veritable death trap as the court-house in question seems from the evidence to have been. All these things granted, and it does not follow that that power will enable the court to build additions and extensions to such death trap and thereby and therein expend over $32,000 of the public funds of the county to hold up a death trap, the whole value of which does not exceed $7,000, under color of repairs. Under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, the court could have protected itself precisely as it could and would have done if the old court-house had blown down or burnt up some night. No one would have thought of an attempt on the part of the court to rebuild it but the court would at once have secured another room, as it actually did do, for temporary use in the administration of justice, until the proper authority could rebuild the court-house. In support of the claim that the extraordinary power attempted to be exercised here was one which belonged to the circuit court, counsel assert that "the judiciary of Indiana is entirely independent of any power on earth except the power of the people, independent even of them, except that the people might change the constitution, and in the exercise of that power, the people could not abolish either the judiciary or its inherent power without conflicting with the Constitution of the United States." This proposition is too broad. It is true, the judicial department is independent of the other two departments. The constitution erects a state government, clothed with the sovereign power of the people, and divides that power into three distinct departments, to be exercised in each exclusively by the officers of that department. In that sense alone the several departments are independent of each other. Wright v. Defrees, 8 Ind. 298; Lafayette, M. & B. R. Co. v. Geiger, 34 Ind. 185; State v. Noble, supra.

The judicial department is no more independent of the legislative and executive departments that each of them is independent of the judicial department. Smith v. Myers, 109 Ind. 1, 58 Am. Rep. 375.

The three departments being invested with the entire sovereignty of the people and constituting the state government are not so independent of each other as that those in authority in one department can ignore and treat the acts of those in authority in another department, done pursuant to the authority vested in them, as nugatory and not binding on every department of the state government. And to that extent does the appellee's contention go, as we understand it. What is meant by the independence of the judicial department is that it may exercise its functions of expounding and enforcing law in the administration of justice, and that no part of these functions can be exercised either directly or indirectly, by either the legislature or the executive; indeed, that those in authority in the other departments cannot even so much as cross the line dividing the domain of the judicial from the other departments to make a suggestion as to how the judicial department shall perform its functions or what kind of judgments or decrees it ought to render or what exposition it shall give to the laws. But when the judicial department has rendered its decree, and thereby given an exposition and construction of the law, such decree and construction is binding on both the other departments. And so, too, when the legislature is exercising its functions of making laws, those in authority in the judicial department cannot take any part in the exercise of those functions; they cannot even cross the line dividing the judicial from the legislative domain, to make a suggestion as to how the legislature should perform its functions, or what kind of laws it should make. Smith v. Myers, supra.

Indeed, the judiciary cannot make laws at all, whether in or out of their domain. But when the legislature has enacted laws that are not unconstitutional, they are absolutely binding on the judicial as well as the executive departments, no matter how unwise and impolitic they may be. Smith v. Myers, and State v. Noble, supra; Ex parte Griffiths, 118 Ind. 83, 8 L. R. A. 398.

Such laws are also binding on all the departments until they are repealed. To hold that the judiciary is so far independent of the legislative department that it may disregard and treat as nugatory legislative enactments passed in conformity to the constitution, is not only to draw the whole sovereign power of the state government into the judiciary, and thus destroy the independence of the other departments, but it erects a despotism which appellees contend cannot be abolished even by the people. Such a proposition is utterly untenable because it not only violates the constitution, but is destructive of the state government and the essential principles upon which it is founded. While each department within its own bounds exercises its powers independent of each of the other departments, yet each department is bound by the acts of each of the others done within the limits set by the constitution to such powers.

Appellee, however, contends substantially that the inherent power already vested in the circuit court was extensive enough to warrant and justify the court in all that the order proposed to have done. They cite Nash v. State, supra, and Benton County Comrs. v. Thompson, supra, as a recognition of that power. They also claim the statute above cited is also a recognition of the existence of the power. But the last case is rather against the position assumed, it holding that the circuit court could not move a court-house. The other case was simply a claim for furniture furnished to the court-room and paid for by the court. Such payment was upheld on the statute already quoted.

The appellee's learned counsel cite two cases which deserve notice. The first is Beach v. Crain, 3 N. Y. 86, 49 Am. Dec. 369, where plaintiff granted to defendants a right of way over his land and covenanted to erect a gate at the terminus, and in the same instrument the defendants covenanted to keep the gate in repair. It being removed by some unknown person, it was held that the covenant imposed the duty on the grantee to put up a new gate, likening it to the obligation of a tenant to repair, and in case of destruction to rebuild. The other case was Brecknock Navigation v. Pritchard, 6 T. R. 750, where the covenant required the defendant to keep a bridge in complete repair for seven years, the bridge having been washed away, he was held liable to rebuild the same. If these cases are applicable and controlling, we must then hold that the real purpose disclosed in the order was within the power of the court, and that the incidental power of the court to repair its court-room carried with it necessarily the power, in case of its destruction or becoming unfit for use, to build a new court-house. But there are many reasons why these cases are not in point. In each case there was a contract, imposing the duty solely on one person to keep in repair. Here there was no contract obligation, but a mere discretionary power or privilege was vested in the court for temporary self protection, extending no further than that temporary protection required, but the primary duty, as we have seen, was devolved on the county board to keep the court-house in repair, and the exclusive power to rebuild. A case much more in point, and nearly parallel, indeed, exactly parallel, with the case at bar as to the extent of the power conferred where a duty to repair is imposed by law, was decided by this court, and a conclusion was therein reached contrary to that reached in the cases above referred to. It was said by Elliott, J., speaking for the whole court in that case that: "We are unable to resist the conclusion that the trustee, under color of making repairs and removing obstructions, has changed and improved the ditch in several essential particulars. The ditch has been greatly widened and deepened, and doubtless much improved since the amount expended is almost twice the cost of the original ditch. The inference from the facts stated is that the trustee has improved the ditch instead of repairing it. Under authority to repair, there can be no enlargement and improvement except in so far as the work of repairing necessarily enlarges and improves. 'Repair,' says the supreme court of Pennsylvania, 'means to restore to sound or good condition, after injury, or partial destruction.' Pittsburgh & B. Pass. R. Co. v. Pittsburgh, 80 Pa. 72. The authority of the township trustee was to restore as nearly as practicable to its original condition, not to enlarge or improve, no matter how much the improvement may have been needed, nor how much property owners may have been benefited." Weaver v. Templin, 113 Ind. 303.

The same principle was asserted by this court in Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co., 128 Ind. 534, 10 L. R. A. 770, where it was said: "The obligation to repair a street is one thing, and the obligation to construct a street is another and different thing. To repair a thing is to restore it to a sound state after decay, injury, dilapidation or partial destruction. To reconstruct is to construct or build again. One who only assumes an obligation to repair a house could not be required to tear it down and rebuild it." So the weight of authority seems to be that the power to repair does not carry with it or imply the power to rebuild or reconstruct.

While there is, as before observed, no precedent upholding the extension of the incidental power of a court to repair its court-room to the construction or reconstruction of a court-house, there is respectable authority against such extension in the following cases: Neosho County Comrs. v. Stoddard, 18 Kan. 207; Barnett v. Ashmore, 5 Wash. 163.

This incidental power has existed as long as courts of general jurisdiction have existed under the English common law. The strongest reason why it does not extend to building court-houses, or the equivalent thereof, is found in the fact that not a single precedent can be cited upholding such a power, though numerous occasions have existed in this country for a century calling for the assertion thereof. If such a power had existed, the researches of appellee's learned counsel through all the course of the common law would have been rewarded by the discovery of precedents for its exercise in the construction of court-houses by the courts of general jurisdiction. We have already seen that a practical construction given to a statute by public officers of the state, and acted upon by those interested, the people and the courts, for a very great length of time, is always regarded by the courts as equal to positive law. See the authorities above cited on this point; also; State v. Harrison, 116 Ind. 800; Franklin County Comrs. v. Bunting, 111 Ind. 148.

Mr. Endlich, in his valuable work says: "It has been sometimes said, indeed, that usage is only the interpreter of an obscure law. Said Lord Campbell . . . there would be no safety for property or liberty if it could be successfully contended that all lawyers and statesmen have been mistaken as to the true meaning of an old Act of Parliament." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 308.

We therefore conclude that the White circuit court had no jurisdiction or power to make the order in question, and that it was void, and therefore subject to collateral attack by way of injunction. Therefore the finding of the trial court was contrary to law.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to grant a new trial.

NOTE.—Passing of title to property by delivery thereof to a carrier for transportation to consignee or vendee.

Whether or not the title will pass seems to depend almost entirely on the intention. There are certain acts which when taken in connection with the relation of the parties to each other and in the absence of explanatory or countervailing evidence will be held to manifest an intention to pass or retain the title. But in almost every instance the presumption arising from the acts will give way to the actual intention if that can be shown.

The question is one of intention. Emery's Sons v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 390, 18 Am. Rep. 390.

So the mere fact that the bill of lading was taken in the name of the seller and remained undorsed will not prevent the passing of title, if, from all the facts in the case, it may fairly be inferred that it was the seller's intention that the property should pass. Joyce v. Swann, 17 C. B. N. S. 84.

Nor will the further fact that the contract provided for cash against the bill of lading. Ogg v. Shuter, L. R. 10 Q. B. 159, 44 L. J. Q. P. 161, 33 L. T. N. S. 114, 23 Week. Rep. 319.

Although the latter case was reversed on appeal upon the ground that an intention to retain title was shown by taking the bill of lading in the seller's name and retaining it under his control for his protection. L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 47, 45 L. J. Q. P. 44, 33 L. T. N. S. 422, 24 Week. Rep. 100.

Conversely the title will not pass, if the intention of the parties was that it should not. Mason v. Great Western R. Co., 81 U. C. Q. B. 73.

The question whether or not the consignee has reserved his right is one of intention to be gathered from all the facts and circumstances of the transaction. Emery's Sons v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 390, 18 Am. Rep. 390.

The rule that delivery to the carrier is delivery to the vendee is not contravened by asserting the ius disponendi of the vendor, when the circumstances evidence an intention to retain and where there is a special agreement to that effect. The John K. Shaw, 33 Fed. Rep. 491.

Question of law or fact.

The question of intent to deliver is for the jury. Gibbons v. Robinson, 68 Mich. 146.

Whether or not the title has passed is a question for the jury, if the evidence leaves it at all doubtful. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Mount Vernon Co., 84 Ala. 173.

But when the facts are not in dispute, the question is for the court.

tions by the purchaser to venditor to send them to the purchaser, the delivery of the goods to a common carrier to be forwarded is a delivery to the purchaser, and the title passes to the purchaser, subject to the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu.

(June 19, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Passaic County to review a judgment in favor of tion as to the intent to pass the title is one of law. Smith v. Edwards, 29 Hun, 493.

The question of intention to pass title is for the jury where a merchant ships goods on board a vessel chartered by another, charging the latter a commission for his services and taking receipts in his own name as the goods are delivered on the vessel, and finally taking a bill of lading in his own name and drawing against it on his correspondent. Falk v. Fletcher, 18 C. B. N. S. 408.

Where, from the circumstances attending the case, there is uncertainty as to the intention to pass title to the consignee, as where the goods are shipped to him and a bill of lading attached to a draft, which is discounted by a third person to whom the bill of lading is transferred, the question is for the jury. Merchants Nat. Bank v. Bangs, 103 Mass. 291.

If, by the contract of sale the seller undertakes to pay the freight the question is for the jury whether the delivery is to be considered complete when the goods are placed in charge of the carrier or not until they reach the buyer. McLaughlin v. Marston, 73 Wis. 670.

If the contract is to deliver free on board, the mere fact that the bill of lading is taken in the name of the consignor and by him indorsed and transmitted to his agent to be delivered to the consignee, will not prevent the passing of title, but the question is for the jury. Browne v. Hare, 4 Hurlst. & N. 822, 20 L. J. Exch. 6, 5 Jur. N. S. 711, 7 Week. Rep. 619, affirming 3 Hurlst. & N. 484, 27 L. J. Exch. 372.

If the sale is for cash and the goods are delivered to the carrier, the vendor retaining the bills of lading and immediately drawing on the consignee for the price, there is evidence for the jury on the question of intention to deliver before the price is paid. Refining & S. Co. v. Miller, 7 Phila. 97.

a. Between buyer and seller.

Delivery to designated carrier.

A delivery of goods to a carrier designated by the purchaser is of the same legal effect for the purpose of passing title as a delivery to the purchaser himself. Merchant v. Chapman, 4 Allen, 362; Johnson v. Stoddard, 100 Mass. 308; Stafford v. Webb, Hill & D. Supp. 213; Waldron v. Romaine, 22 N. Y. 368; Wilcox Silver Plate Co. v. Green, 72 N. Y. 17; Taplin v. Packard, 8 Barb. 230; Gutwillig v. Zuberbier, 41 Hun, 361; Wade v. Hamilton, 30 Ga. 450; Biss v. Geer, 7 Ill. App. 618; Haug v. Gillett, 14 Kan. 149; Banny v. Elgby, 5 Wis. 63.

plaintiff in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain bobbins which were alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. John W. Griggs, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff was not entitled to sue for the price of the goods, but was merely entitled to recover damages for the loss of profits by reason of the cancellation of the order or the failure of the defendants to accept the goods.

If, after the goods are ordered, they are put up and marked with the purchaser's name and put on board of a steamboat designated by the purchaser, to be forwarded to his residence, the sale is complete, and the goods are the property of the purchaser notwithstanding the bill of lading is not forwarded to him, if the possession of such bill is not necessary to enable him to obtain the goods. People v. Haynes, 14 Wend. 546, 29 Am. Dec. 630.

If the agreement is that the property shall be delivered at the depot of a designated carrier, when it is so delivered the title passes, and if the carrier subsequently delivers it to a third person by direction of the seller, it will be liable to the buyer for the price. Odell v. Boston & M. R. Co. 109 Mass. 50.

If the buyer orders a particular mode of conveyance, he will be chargeable with the loss if any happen. Vale v. Bayle, Cowp. 294.

Delivery to carrier generally.

In the absence of some order or agreement on the part of the buyer to have the property sent to him by railroad, or of some evidence in regard to usage or the course of trade from which such an agreement may be implied, a delivery to a railroad company is not a delivery to the buyer. Everett v. Parks, 62 Barb. 2.

In Perkins v. Eckert, 55 Cal. 400, in which an instrument which might have been a bill of sale or a mortgage of certain wheat, had been given by defendant to plaintiffs, and the wheat had been delivered to a railroad company and bills of lading taken in the name of the plaintiffs, the court, in an action upon the indebtedness, in consideration of which the instrument was given, instructed that the shipment constituted a delivery to the plaintiffs, but the appellate court held that ruling to be erroneous, that there was nothing more than a constructive delivery which would not make plaintiffs liable for the loss.

In Allen v. Comstock, 17 Ga. 554, it was held that a general order for goods, without naming the mode of delivery, did not authorize the vendor to consider himself free from further obligation when he had delivered to a carrier so as to place the goods at the risk of the buyer, but it is intimated that he must first deliver at the place of business of the buyer.

So it was held that if there is no mention of the manner in which the goods shall be delivered a delivery to a common carrier is not a delivery to the buyer so as to place the goods at his risk. Loyd v. Wight, 20 Ga. 574, 65 Am. Dec. 636.

But in Watkins v. Paine, 57 Ga. 50, it was held that a delivery to a carrier according to the usage of trade will be a delivery to the purchaser, if the purchaser orders the goods to be shipped, although he specifies no particular carrier or class of carriers.

While in Star Glass Co. v. Longley, 64 Ga. 576, it was held that if the seller upon inquiry priced goods to the buyer and thereupon the buyer ordered at that price and the seller delivered the goods to a common carrier consigned to the buyer, there was a complete sale at the price named, so as 23 L. R. A.

Where there is a sale of goods generally (as distinguished from the sale of a specific chattel) no property in them passes until delivery.

When the vendor has not transferred to the buyer the property in the goods which are the subject of the contract, as where the agreement is for the sale of chattels not specific, or of specific goods which are not in a deliverable state, or which are to be weighed or measured before delivery, the breach by the buyer can to prevent the seller from subsequently disputing it.

If the buyer orders the goods to be forwarded by a carrier, a delivery to a carrier will pass the title to him, although he does not specially name the carrier; but a delivery to a carrier without the consent of the vendee, either express or implied, will not be treated as a delivery to him. Hague v. Porter, 3 Hill, 141.

When goods are contracted for which are to be sent to the purchaser, if the vendor send them in the mode of conveyance agreed on by the parties or directed by the purchaser; or, if no agreement be made or direction given in the usual mode; or if the purchaser being informed of the mode, assents to it; or, if there have been sales or conveyance of other goods and the vendor continues to send them in the same mode, then the goods are at the risk of the purchaser during their voyage. Whiting v. Farrand, 1 Conn. 60.

A delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the vendee, where the vendee has designated the carrier; where the carrier, though not designated, is the usual one employed to carry between the two places; where, though no carrier is designated, the one employed has been employed in other similar cases between the parties. Meyer Bros. Drug Co. v. McMahan, 50 Mo. App. 18.

In the absence of a designation of a specified carrier, a delivery to any common carrier in the usual and ordinary course of business transfers the title. Liggett & M. Tobacco Co. v. Collier (Iowa) Oct. 9, 1898.

If goods are to be sent by a common carrier, a delivery to any carrier in due course of business is a sufficient delivery to the buyer. Falvey v. Richmond, 87 Ga. 99; Dutton v. Sulomonsen, 3 Bos. & P. 582; Richardson v. Dunn, 3 Q. B. 218, 1 Gale & D. 417; Johnson v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 8 C. P. Div. 499, 39 L. T. N. S. 443, 27 Week. Rep. 459; Magruder v. Gage, 33 Md. 344, 3 Am. Rep. 177; Keasler v. Smith, 42 Minn. 494; Comstock v. Affolter, 50 Mo. 411; Hobart v. Littlefield, 18 R. I. 341; Ranney v. Higby, 4 Wis. 154; Colcord v. Dryfus, 1 Okla. 232.

And the consignee may collect the price whether the goods are received or not. Hill v. Gayle, 1 Ala. 275; Burton v. Baird, 44 Ark. 556; Diversy v. Kellogg, 44 Ill. 114, 62 Am. Dec. 154.

If a buyer gives an order to a traveling agent of the seller and nothing is said about the mode of carriage, the sale will be complete when the goods are delivered to a carrier in the usual way at the seller's residence. Copeland v. Lewis, 3 Stark. 22.

And in a similar case it was held that an action for the price of the goods would not lie at the place of the buyer's residence. Harwood v. Lester, 3 Bos. & P. 617.

It is immaterial that the carrier is a teamster. West v. Humphrey (Nev.) Dec. 13, 1890.

As soon as goods are delivered to a carrier they are at the risk of the purchaser, although the freight is to be paid by the vendor. King v. Meredith, 3 Campb. 639.

The fact that the right to reject the goods if they are short in quantity or inferior in quality is re-only affect the vendor by way of damages for non-acceptance.

If the seller agrees to furnish the property free on board cars, the title will pass when the property is shipped consigned to the purchaser. Smith v. Edwards, 29 Hun, 428.

The sale of property at a certain price, which shall cover all freight and insurance, to be sent by steamer will be complete when the goods are shipped, so that they are afterward at the risk of the buyer. Mee v. McNider, 109 N. Y. 500.

The property in goods sold in bond for exportation passes on their delivery to the carrier, although they are still subject to the custody of the custom officers and cannot leave the country until the duties are paid. Waldron v. Romaine, 22 N. Y. 363.

If goods are delivered to a carrier by the vendor addressed to the purchaser while the latter is under the age of twenty-one but do not reach him until he has attained that age, infancy is a good defense to an action for their price. Griffin v. Langfield, 3 Campb. 264.

Shipping property corresponding with the order vests the title absolutely in the buyer so as to preclude his subsequently refusing to take it on its arrival at destination. D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Van Atten, 3 Wash. Terr. 52.

If the goods are delivered to the carrier consigned generally to the buyer at a city where he resides, without any particular place of delivery being designated, the title passes. Bacharach v. Chester Freight Line, 133 Pa. 414.

The presumption that delivery to a carrier passes title may be rebutted by evidence of a course of dealing by which the seller undertook to deliver at the buyer's place of business. McLaughlin v. Marston, 73 Wis. 670.

In the absence of evidence showing a contrary intention, the seller's contract is complied with, if the goods correspond with the order at the time of delivery to the carrier. Lord v. Edwards, 2 L. R. A. 519, 148 Mass. 478.

The whole doctrine of the right of stoppage in transitu assumes that the vendee has acquired a title such as would enable him to bring trover, were it not for his insolvency. Grosvenor v. Phillips, 2 Hill, 147.

But the cases turning upon the right of stoppage in transitu depend upon principles so far distinct from the mere question whether or not the title has passed that they have been omitted from this note.

If the quantity sent and the mode of transportation do not correspond with the order, there must be an actual acceptance by the buyer to render him liable. Corning v. Colt, 5 Wend. 254.

The seller must comply with the conditions of shipment stipulated for by the buyer in the contract of sale. Woodruff v. Noyes, 15 Conn. 385.

If the goods are not of the quality ordered, the title will not pass. Ellis v. Roche, 73 Ill. 280.

If the goods did not correspond with the order, the title will not pass. Barton v. Kane, 17 Wis. 22, 84 Am. Dec. 728.

The burden is on the seller to show that he complied with the terms of the order. Wolf v. Dietzsch, 75 Ill. 206.

If the quantity delivered to the carrier is in excess of that ordered by the buyer, so that there is something to be done to complete the transaction, the title does not pass. Downer v. Thompson, 2 Hill, 187.

But if a contract for the sale of sugar provides that it shall be delivered free on board, and the course of dealing is that a cargo shall be shipped which is sometimes sufficient to cover several orders, when the sugar is placed on board it is so far at the risk of the buyer that he has an insurable interest, although the particular portion which shall be appropriated to the filling of his order has not been marked and separated from the bulk. Stock v. Inglis, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 573.

If the purchaser designates the carrier by whom the goods are to be shipped, a delivery to another carrier will not pass the title. Hills v. Lynch, 3 Robt. 42.

If the seller disregards the instructions of the buyer as to shipment, the title does not pass, and the goods are still at the seller's risk. Wheelhouse v. Parr, 141 Mass. 563.

The duty of the shipper may include giving advice of the shipment to the consignee. Goom v. Jackson, 5 Esp. 112.

The fact that, in response to an order to ship goods by any conveyance and notify the buyer of the shipment, the seller informs him that they will come by a certain conveyance, when in fact they are not sent until a later one, will not prevent them from being at the buyer's risk. Cooke v. Ludlow, 2 Bos. & P. 119.

The failure of the shipper to properly designate the owner and place of destination by reason of which the goods are lost in transit will prevent a completion of the sale, so as to render the buyer liable for the price. Finn v. Clark, 10 Allen, 484, 12 Allen, 522.

The buyer cannot take advantage of a want of insurance, if he himself ordered the seller not to insure. Elmore v. Kearny, 23 La. Ann. 479.

The mere transposition of the buyer's initials in the consignment will not defeat a recovery from him, if there is nothing to show that such error caused the loss of the goods. Garretson v. Selby, 37 Iowa, 529, 18 Am. Rep. 14.

The fact that the shipper releases the carrier from liability for damages which may result to the goods during carriage will not prevent the passing of title, if the buyer orders them to be sent by railroad and the railroad company will not transport

Messrs. Stevenson & Humphreys, for defendant in error:

As a contract can be made only by the consent of all the contracting parties, it can be rescinded only by the consent of all.

In an action for the price of goods "bargained and sold" it is only necessary to prove a valid sale; it is not necessary to prove a delivery; the right of action is perfect without delivery.

Doremus v. Howard, 23 N. J. L. 390; Fraser v. Fredericks, 24 N. J. L. 162.

When the manufacturer has finished a chattel according to order and set it apart for the buyer, the property is at the buyer's risk and he becomes liable for the price though he has not accepted the chattel or has refused to accept it.

the goods without the release. Stafford v. Walter, 67 Ill. 83.

If the delivery is to a carrier designated by the buyer, notice to him is not necessary to pass the title at his risk. Bradford v. Marbury, 13 Ala. 530, 46 Am. Dec. 364.

In order to place the goods at the risk of the buyer, the seller must in delivering them to the carrier exercise due care and diligence so as to provide the consignee with a remedy over against the carrier. Ward v. Taylor, 56 Ill. 494.

If the order is to send goods by a particular coach, and there is a rule that the carrier will not be answerable for goods above a certain value unless insured, the vendor is not bound to insure in order to clear himself of the risk, especially if there has been a course of dealing between the parties and he never has insured before. Cothay v. Tute, 3 Campb. 123.

If the goods are of such value that special precautions are necessary to make the carrier liable for their loss, a delivery to the carrier simply, without taking such precautions, is not a sufficient delivery so as to charge the buyer with their value in case they are lost by the carrier. Clarke v. Hutchins, 14 East, 475.

Effect of fraud.

If the shipment is procured by fraud, the title will not pass. Stephenson v. Hart, 1 Moore & P. 867, 4 Bing. 476.

The shipment and not the loading the important fact.

The property in oil to be laden in a barge does not pass as fast as it is placed in the barge, if the contract is for a barge-load. Rocheester & O. Oil Co. v. Hughey, 56 Pa. 322.

Under a contract for a boat-load of coal slack the title does not pass as fast as the slack is delivered into the boat, but only when the boat-load is completed. Hays v. Pittsburgh, G. & B. Packet Co. 38 Fed. Rep. 552.

While the goods are only partly delivered on board the vessel and the shipper holds the receipts for them, there has been no transfer of title. Jones v. Bradner, 10 Barb. 193.

If the agreement is that the goods shall not pass to the buyer until paid for, a modification agreement to ship before they are paid for will not change the title until they have actually passed beyond the seller's control, therefore goods in a partly loaded car still belong to the seller. Summers v. Wagner, 87 Mich. 272.

The delivery is not complete so as to pass title until the goods have passed fully out of the power of the shipper into possession of the railroad company for transportation. Wenger v. Barnhart, 55 Pa. 801.

b. Between consignor and consignee.

It has been said that the rule that delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the buyer does not apply, unless there is an actual purchase of the goods shipped. Alsberg v. Latta, 30 Iowa, 445.

A shipment made without orders, or contrary to orders, is at the risk of the shipper during the voyage. The Francis, 2 Gall. 391.

In a case where property had been captured in transitu as prize and had been claimed by the consignee, the court said, to produce a change of property from the shipper to the consignee it was essentially necessary that the goods should have been sent in consequence of some contract between the parties, by which the one agreed to sell and the other to buy. Intention of the consignor to vest the right to property in the consignee would not be sufficient to effect a change of title until the goods were received, or some evidence given of an agreement by the consignee to take them on his own account. The Francis, 13 U. S. 8 Cranch, 359, 3 L. ed. 589.

If a shipper has general discretionary orders to ship what and when he pleases, the shipment will be at his risk, unless, at the time of making it, he, by some overt, unequivocal act, designates or appropriates the shipment to his correspondent. Until such appropriation the property is not changed. The Francis, 2 Gall. 391.

But it has been held that if, by the correspondence and course of dealing between merchants in different places, one is authorized to send goods to the other without special order, the property in goods so sent vests in the latter upon the delivery to the carrier. Morberger v. Hackenberg, 18 Serg. & R. 23.

The delivery of goods to a carrier by the consignor does not necessarily vest the property in the consignee, but the general presumption that it does may be rebutted by the circumstances in the case. Dunlop v. Lambert, 6 Clark & F. 600.

In Johnson v. Stoddard, 100 Mass. 306, it is intimated that the question whether or not the delivery of the goods to the carrier, without taking a bill of lading for them and transmitting it to the consignee, would amount to a delivery, will depend largely on the question of custom.

Where a hired chattel is, by the terms of the agreement, received by the bailee at the place of the contract and then shipped by the bailor to the home of the bailee, who offers to pay the freight, the chattel is in the possession of the bailee. Ludden & B. S. Music House v. Dusenbury, 27 S. C. 464.

So far as third persons are concerned, however, the consignee may sometimes be regarded as owner.

The carrier is authorized to treat the consignee as entitled to control the manner of delivery of the goods. Sweet v. Barney, 23 N. Y. 335.

The carrier is authorized to deliver to the consignee at a place different from that stated in the bill of lading. Pennsylvania Co. v. Holderman, 69 Ind. 13.

The consignee has such an interest as to entitle him to direct as to the place of delivery of the property. London & N. W. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 7 Hurlst. & N. 400, 81 L. J. Exch. 92, 5 L. T. N. S. 350, 10 Week. Rep. 109; Cork Distilleries Co. v. Great Southern & W. R. Co. (Ireland) L. R. 7 H. L. 299, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 384.

Consignment to satisfy debt.

A mere shipment of goods in pursuance of a contract between the consignor and consignee, whereby the former was to pay the freight and the latter, after he had sold the goods, was to credit the

2 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's 4th Am. ed. p. 463; Ballentine v. Robinson, 46 Pa. 177; Bement v. Smith, 15 Wend. 493; West Jersey R. Co. v. Trenton Car Works Co. 83 N. J. L. 517; Hires v. Hurff, 89 N. J. L. 4.

The appropriation in most executory contracts of sale is by the act of the seller, usually manifested by a delivery of the goods to the buyer or to a carrier, to be transported to him. In either case the property passes when the goods are placed beyond the seller's control. 2 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's 4th Am. ed. p. 465.

When goods of a certain character are ordered, and the buyer directs that they be sent to him by a common carrier, or where from the course of trade delivery to a common carrier to be sent to the buyer, is the evident intent, in such case the property passes as soon as the goods are put in the carrier's possession.

proceeds to the account of the consignor, does not vest the title in the consignee in the absence of the bill of lading or notice of the shipment. Helena First Nat. Bank v. McAndrews, 5 Mont. 383.

But the title to property, which the debtor intends to appropriate for the payment of his creditor's debt will pass to the creditor when the debtor delivers them to a carrier, takes a bill of lading for the benefit of the creditor and mails it to the creditor, subject to the right of the creditor to repudiate the transaction when it comes to his knowledge. Brown v. Bowe, 35 Hun. 433.

A consignment to pay a debt did not formerly pass title in Louisiana. Wilson v. Smith, 12 La. 375.

But subsequent legislation modified this so far as it related to a creditor who had made advances on the consignment. Chaffe v. Heyner, 31 La. Ann. 594.

And a creditor who has made advances on the faith of the property shipped seems to be generally better protected than a general creditor.

A delivery of goods to a carrier, consigned to forwarding merchants, who have made advances on the faith of them, is virtually a delivery to them which will permit them to maintain a suit for their possession against one to whom they have been unlawfully delivered by the carrier. Fitzhugh v. Wiman, 9 N. Y. 559.

A delivery of goods to a carrier on account of a consignee who has advanced money on them gives him a priority of title over one who receives a second bill of lading for the same goods, with notice that the first had been issued. Stevens v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 8 Gray, 263.

The right of a consignee in advance to his consignor with a bill of lading in his name is a qualified property commensurate with and to support his lien and no more. Patterson v. Perry, 10 Abb. Pr. 82.

A delivery to a carrier of goods to be forwarded to one on account of his advances is a delivery to the latter so far as to pass the title intended to be passed for lien or sale. Schumacher v. Eby, 34 Pa. 521.

If in accordance with prior authority a consignor sends goods to a consignee and draws against the bill of lading, the consignee acquires a lien against the goods for the payment of past advances which will be superior to that of an attaching creditor of the consignor. Vallé v. Carré, 36 Mo. 575, 38 Am. Dec. 161.

Consignment for sale.

A factor to whom property is consigned for sale does not in general get any title to the property by the mere fact of shipment although the consignor is his debtor.

The mere consignment to a factor without more will not confer title to him. Woodruff v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 2 Head, 87.

Factors acquire no lien until they have accepted the consignment according to its terms. Winter v. Coit, 7 N. Y. 233, 37 Am. Dec. 522.

Factors acquire no lien for general balance until the property is actually received unless there is an agreement to that effect, expressed or implied from the course of dealing, and if they receive a bill of 23 L. R. A.

lading with advice of a draft against it, they can acquire no lien until they have accepted on the terms named in the letter. Ibid.

A constructive possession is not sufficient to enable a factor to retain the goods on general account. Walter v. Ross, 3 Wash. C. C. 233; Ryberg v. Snell, Id. 403; Kinloch v. Craig, 3 T. R. 112, 783, 4 Bro. P. C. 47.

To give a factor a lien on the goods consigned but not actually received by him, the consignment must be to him in terms and he must have made advances or acceptances on the faith of it. Davis v. Bradley, 28 Vt. 113, 65 Am. Dec. 236.

The mere loading of goods consigned to a factor for sale does not, prior to the forwarding of the shipping receipts, give him a lien as against attaching creditors of the consignor. Hodges v. Kimball, 49 Iowa, 577, 31 Am. Rep. 153.

If the goods are to be shipped to factors, the mere insertion of their names in the bill of lading does not invest in them the ownership of the property, if the owner retains possession of the bill of lading. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Phillips, 60 Ill. 190.

If a merchant consigns goods to a factor who receives them, the factor can acquire no title which will pass to his assignees in insolvency. Godfrey v. Furzo, 3 P. Wms. 133.

Goods consigned to a mere factor are not subject to the rule of the carrier making the goods subject to a lien not only for the freight of the particular goods, but also for any general balance due from their respective owners. Wright v. Snell, 5 Barn. & Ald. 350.

If property is delivered to a carrier upon consignment to a factor for sale, the consignee only acquires title thereto in case the shipment is accompanied by an unconditional consignment. An agreement to ship, although founded upon a good consideration, gives no title, but the owner of the property may, notwithstanding, impose such conditions upon the consignment as he chooses, and the consignee can only acquire title thereto by performing the conditions. Cayuga County Nat. Bank v. Daniels, 47 N. Y. 631.

A delivery to the master of a vessel is not a delivery to the factor, where the consignor has merely written to him apprising him of the consignment and requesting him on the faith of it to accept bills, although the bills are actually accepted in accordance with the request. Nichols v. Clent, 3 Price, 547.

If goods are shipped under a contract that they are to be sold on joint account of the consignor and consignee, or on account of the consignor at the consignee's option, the title will not pass until the consignee has exercised his option. The Venus, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 253, 3 L. ed. 553.

If goods are consigned to be sold for a certain purpose, until the consignees have done some act recognizing the appropriation of it to the purpose specified and the beneficiaries have signified their acceptance of it so as to create a privity between them, the property remains at the risk and on account of the consignor. Tiernan v. Jackson, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 530, 3 L. ed. 234.

Some cases have gone a great ways in denying the title of the factor.

2 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's 4th Am. ed. pp. 466-469; 1 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's 4th Am. ed. p. 195; Ranney v. Higby, 4 Wis. 154; The Sally Mages, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 451, 18 L. ed. 197; Wilcox Silver Plate Co. v. Green, 72 N. Y. 17.

Where the vendor is bound to send the goods to the purchaser, delivery to a common carrier is a delivery to the purchaser himself; the carrier being in contemplation of law in such case the bailee of the person to whom, not by whom, the goods were sent; the latter when employing the carrier being regarded as the agent of the former for that purpose.

2 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's 4th Am. ed. p. 909, and cases there cited; also 1 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's 4th Am. ed. pp. 443, 462; Cross v. O'Donnell, 44 N. Y. 661, 4 Am. Rep. 721; Caulkins v. Hellman, 47 N. Y. 449, 7 Am. Rep. 461; Wilcox Silver Plate Co. v. Green, 72 N. Y. 90; Fragano v. Long, 4 Barn. & C. 319;

It was held that the shipment of goods to a factor in payment of a debt and the receipt by him of the bill of lading does not give him any right of property as against creditors of the consignor, in Saunders v. Bartlett, 12 Helsk. 316.

So it has been held that the fact that goods are shipped and the bill of lading delivered to the carrier for the consignee, to whom the consignor owes a debt, is not sufficient to pass the title to the consignee, if he is merely a factor for the sale of the goods, although out of the proceeds he is to pay his own claim, so as to prevent an attaching creditor of the consignor acquiring the title to them. Bonner v. Marsh, 10 Smedes & M. 376, 48 Am. Dec. 764.

But other courts seem to hold that a plain intention to pass the title will have that effect.

If property is shipped to factors expressly to pay them for previous advances, and the bill of lading is transmitted to them, the property will pass. Desha v. Pope, 6 Ala. 690, 41 Am. Dec. 78.

If, in pursuance of a contract to ship goods to be sold to pay advances, the promisor delivers the goods to a carrier consigned to the promisee and notifies the latter of the shipment, the intent to pass the title is sufficiently shown, and if the carrier delivers the goods under a subsequent order of the shipper to a third person, it will be liable for conversion. Bailey v. Hudson River R. Co. 49 N. Y. 70.

If the factor has made advances on the faith of the shipment he occupies a much better position.

If the consignment is to commission merchants who have made advances on goods, the delivery to the carrier passes the title to the consignees, so as to give them a title which will support an action of replevin. Grosvenor v. Phillips, 2 Hill, 147.

Where one consigns property to a factor, specifically to meet a bill drawn upon him, and transmits a vessel's receipt, sufficient title vests in the factor to enable him to maintain trover against one unlawfully taking the property. Evans v. Nichol, 4 Scott, N. R. 43, 6 Mann. & G. 614, 5 Jur. 1110.

The delivery by a consignor to a carrier of goods to be transported to consignees, in pursuance of a special agreement that they shall sell the goods to pay a draft made against them and apply any surplus to pay previous advances made by them to the consignor, and the sending of the bill of lading attached to the draft to the consignee, passes title to the consignee so as to render the goods no longer subject to attachment by the creditors of the consignor. Halliday v. Hamilton, 73 U. S. 11 Wall. 560, 20 L. ed. 214.

But some of the courts have required much more to vest title in the factor than the mere consignment and advances on the faith of it.

Thus a factor has no lien unless he has possession of the goods either by himself or his agent, although he has made advances on them, paid the freight and has possession of the bill of lading. Oliver v. Moore, 12 Helsk. 432.

Merely shipment of goods to a factor who has accepted drafts on the faith of it does not give him any title to the goods, unless a bill of lading or shipping receipt is forwarded to him. Elliott v. Bradley, 23 Vt. 217.

Shipment to one whose money paid for the goods.

When the consignment is to the one who has advanced money for the purchase of the goods, the delivery to the carrier severs the authority of the consignor over them. Nelson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 3 Ill. App. 180; Chaffe v. Heyner, 31 La. Ann. 594.

Shipment by agent to principal.

If an agent indebted to his principal ships property to him on board a ship under a bill of lading making the property deliverable to the principal, the title vests in the principal and the agent cannot countermand the direction. Sumner v. Elder, 1 Binn. 108.

If goods are purchased in a foreign country by an agent upon the order of the purchaser, a delivery on board the ship for transportation is a delivery to the purchaser and the property will vest in him by that act, and he will have no election to accept or reject it, and hence his title will not be affected by a subsequent order by the shipper to pay the proceeds to a third person. The Mary and Susan, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 26, 4 L. ed. 27.

Property shipped by a factor is to be regarded as that of the consignee, so far as the question whether or not it is subject to seizure as enemy property is concerned, although it may be shown in defense that the factor exceeded his authority and that in consequence the consignee repudiated his action so that the property never passed out of the consignor. Fry v. United States, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 451, 18 L. ed. 197.

If an agent in one country ships goods to his principal in another and places in the mail the bill of lading making the goods deliverable to the principal, they have passed absolutely beyond his control, and the mere fact that he draws a bill of exchange against the bill of lading, which is dishonored, will not operate to re-vest in him any control over the property. Ex parte Banner, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 278, 45 L. J. Bankr. 73, 84 L. T. N. S. 199, 24 Week. Rep. 479.

Consignment without condition.

If the goods are left with a common carrier to be delivered to the consignee, without any qualification or restriction, the consignor parts with all control over the goods. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Wireman, 86 Pa. 264.

And the passage of title is not prevented by failure of the vendor to send the vendee a bill of lading. Ober v. Smith, 73 N. C. 313.

c. Conduct indicating an intention to retain title. Consigning to shipper's agent.

If the consignment is to the shipper's agent with secret instructions to deliver to the buyer on certain conditions, the delivery to the carrier will not pass the title to the buyer. The Merrimack, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 317, 3 L. ed. 375.

Where the shipper consigns the property to his own agent to be subsequently delivered to the purchaser, no property passes by the simple fact of delivery to the carrier. The St. Jose Indiano, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 208, 4 L. ed. 73.

Boswell v. Green, 25 N. J. L. 390; Thompson v. Conover, 32 N. J. L. 466; West Jersey R. Co. v. Trenton Car Works Co. Id. 517.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears in the case that the defendants, who live in Paterson, N. J., made a valid contract in March, 1890, with the plaintiff, who is a bobbin manufacturer in New Hampshire, under which the latter was to manufacture

6,000 bobbins and send them to the defendants at Paterson. The following are the controlling facts in the case: The contract was made in March, 1890, and the plaintiff at once commenced to make the bobbins. On the 28th of March, 1890, the defendants wrote to one Wilkins, who had introduced them to the plaintiff, requesting him to tell the plaintiff to stop the order for the time being. It does not appear that the contents of this letter were communicated to the plaintiff. On the 29th

If the goods are consigned to the agent of the consignor, no title will pass to the one for whose use they are intended until there has been some further act of delivery to him. Redd v. Burrus, 58 Ga. 574.

But the fact that the goods are consigned to the shipper's agent will not prevent a passing of title, if they are on account and risk of the buyer. The Merrimack, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 317, 3 L. ed. 575.

So the fact that the goods are consigned to an agent of the shipper for the purpose of facilitating the exercise of a right of stoppage in transitu, will not prevent the passing of title. Ibid.

Conversely the fact that goods are consigned to one person for the use of another will not vest the property in the former so as to make it subject to attachment for his debts. Grove v. Brien, 49 U. S. 8 How. 426, 12 L. ed. 1142.

Agreement to deliver at designated place.

If the contract is to deliver at the buyer's place of business the title will not pass until such delivery is made. Sneathen v. Grubbs, 88 Pa. 147.

If the vendor undertakes to deliver at a certain place, the property is at his risk until it is so delivered. McNeal v. Braun, 53 N. J. L. 617; Allis v. Voigt, 90 Mich. 126; Taylor v. Cole, 111 Mass. 363.

If the goods are to be delivered at the buyer's place of residence, freight to be paid by the seller, they are at his risk during the transit. Murray v. Nichols Mfg. Co. 34 N. Y. S. R. 62.

If the contract of sale requires the seller to ship the property to a certain place and requires that the payment should be made when they arrive, their re-shipment does not change the title so as to place the goods at the buyer's risk while in transit. They do not become at his risk until they have been delivered at the designated place. Thompson v. Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. 1 Bond, C. C. 152.

If the consignor expressly undertakes to deliver in a foreign country, the property remains in him and the character of the goods, in reference to their being subject to seizure as prize or not, is determined by his rights. Ludlow v. Bowne, 1 Johns. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 377; DeWolf v. New York Firemen's Ins. Co. 20 Johns. 214.

Where flour was sold by a shipper "to arrive at Boston," the title remains in him until such arrival. Hooper v. Chicago & N. R. Co. 27 Wis. 81, 9 Am. Rep. 420.

If the contract obliges the seller to deliver at a certain place, the default of the carrier cannot excuse him, since the carrier is his agent. Braddock Glass Co. v. Irwin, 158 Pa. 440.

If the contract obligates the vendor to deliver the goods at a certain place, mere proof that he delivered them to the carrier at his place of business is not sufficient to entitle him to recover for their price. See v. Bernheimer, 6 Jones & S. 40.

If it is the express contract that the property is to be shipped by the seller to the place of business of the purchaser at the expense of the seller, the place of delivery is the purchaser's place of business, and any loss on the way must fall on the seller. Devine v. Edwards, 101 Ill. 183.

Under an order for flour to be manufactured and delivered by the vendor at the vendee's place of business, no title passes until there has been an acceptance by the buyer of the flour tendered by the seller. Hanauer v. Bartels, 2 Colo. 514.

But the contract may vest the title in the buyer at the time of shipment, notwithstanding the seller is to deliver the goods at their destination. Such a contract was held to exist where, immediately on the shipment of the goods, the insurance policy and bill of lading were handed over to the buyer, so that from all the circumstances in the case the intention was manifest to place the title in him. Caloutta & B. S. N. Co. v. De Mattos, 33 L. J. Q. B. 322.

In Sparkes v. Marshall, 2 Bing. N. C. 761, 3 Scott, 172, 3 Hodges, 44, it was held that, although the goods were to be delivered at the residence of the buyer, yet he had an insurable interest in them from the time he was notified of their being placed in the carrier's possession.

And it has been held that although the manufacturer undertakes to deliver the goods at the buyer's place of business, the buyer must accept them if they are only deteriorated to the extent that is a necessary incident of the transportation. Bull v. Robinson, 10 Exch. 342, 2 C. L. Rep. 1274, 24 L. J. Exch. 165.

Bill of lading.

Without going into the question of how far a bill of lading represents the goods so that the title to them may be passed by an assignment of the bill of lading, it may be said that as between consignor and consignee the form of, and method of dealing with, the bill of lading is a potent factor in determining the intention as to the location of the title.

The ordinary effect of passing title by delivery to the carrier may be controlled by taking a bill of lading. Bruce v. Wait, 3 Mees. & W. 15; Wait v. Baker, 2 Exch. 1, 17 L. J. Exch. 307; Turner v. Liverpool Docks Trustees, 6 Exch. 543, 20 L. J. Exch. 368; Ellershaw v. Magniac, 6 Exch. 570; The Aurora, 4 C. Rob. 218; Jones v. Brewer, 79 Ala. 545; Berger v. State, 50 Ark. 20; Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass. 272; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 568.

Agents for the purchase of goods may retain title in themselves until they are paid for, by taking a bill of sale in their own names and taking a bill of lading in such terms as to show their intention to retain the control and disposition of the property. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Logan, supra.

The fact that an invoice is sent to the alleged owner is not sufficient to pass the title to him, if the bill of lading is taken in the name of a third person, although it is at the request of such owner, if the accompanying draft is sent to the third person and paid by him. Dows v. National Exch. Bank of Milwaukee, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214.

Making goods deliverable to consignee's order.

If the goods are sent by the consignor on his own account, subject to his own order, they remain his until some further act is done to transfer the title to the consignee. Baker v. Fuller, 21 Pick. 818.

of March, 1890, Wilkins replied to the letter of the defendants, asking them to explain why they wished to have the order canceled. The case shows no reply to this letter. On the 6th of June, 1890, the plaintiff shipped to defendants by railroad 1,400 bobbins, and on July 25, 1890, the balance of the 6,000 were shipped in same way. Both lots arrived safely in Paterson, and on the 14th of August, 1890, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff that they would not accept or pay for them. This suit was instituted to recover the price agreed upon when the order was given.

The first ground of defense is that the con-

If the property is delivered to the carrier as that of the vendor and subject to his order, no title will pass to one claiming as vendee. Lester v. McDowell, 18 Pa. 91.

If the goods are consigned to the shipper in the care of the purchaser, the title will not pass so as to place them at the purchaser's risk. Ward v. Taylor, 56 Ill. 494.

The title does not pass if the property is shipped consigned to the seller. Sohn v. Jervis, 101 Ind. 878.

If the shipping receipts direct the carrier to deliver the goods to the shipper's order, the title will not pass so as to authorize a delivery to the buyer until such order has been given. Libby v. Ingalls, 124 Mass. 503.

Taking the bill of lading in the name of the consignee prevents the title from passing until the bill of lading is assigned. McCormick v. Joseph, 77 Ala. 238.

A seller's taking a bill of lading in his own name is strong evidence against an intention to pass title. Reynolds v. Scott (Cal.) July 18, 1884.

If, by the bill of lading, the goods are to be delivered to the order of the vendor, it clearly operates, in the absence of rebutting evidence, to retain the title in the vendor, and indicates an intention that the property shall not pass. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Mount Vernon Co. 84 Ala. 178.

The fact that the buyer has paid for the property before it is placed on board will not give him a title to it if, prior to its shipment, he receives a telegram from the seller that it would not be shipped to him, and the seller takes bills of lading subject to his own order, or that of a fictitious person, which he indorses to a third person. Gabaron v. Kreeft, L. R. 10 Exch. 274, 44 L. J. Exch. 238, 33 L. T. N. S. 365, 24 Week. Rep. 146.

In case of a contract to deliver fifty barrels of potash for cash on delivery, where the buyer procured a vessel for the shipment and directed the potash to be delivered on the vessel and the sellers so delivered it but took receipts in their own names, which were stolen by the buyer and a bill of lading issued to him on the faith of them, it was held that the title had not passed. Brower v. Peabody, 13 N. Y. 121.

But although the goods are made deliverable to the consignee's order, the title will pass if he sends the consignee a letter containing an order on the carrier for their possession, which is accepted by the carrier. Hatch v. Lincoln, 13 Cush. 34; Hatch v. Bayley, 12 Cush. 27.

So the mere fact of the consignee's taking the bill of lading in his own name is not in all cases to be taken as conclusive. Other circumstances may be such as to control its effect.

If the contract is to deliver the goods on the rail of the vessel, the fact that after they are so delivered the seller takes a bill of lading in his own name is merely evidence for the consideration of the jury as to whether he intended to deliver or not. Gibbons v. Robinson, 63 Mich. 146.

If, after receiving an advance from a commission merchant, a consignor ships a carload of goods consigned to the commission merchant, accompanied by an invoice of the shipment with a letter of advice stating, "We deliver this load on account of our indebtedness,"—the fact that the bill of lading is taken by the consignor in his own name and not 33 L. R. A.

forwarded, will not prevent the title from passing. Straus v. Wessel, 80 Ohio St. 211.

If, after acceptance of the draft drawn for the purchase money, the goods are delivered to the carrier, the passage of the title will not be prevented by the taking of the receipts by the seller in his own name. Hall v. Richardson, 16 Md. 397, 77 Am. Dec. 303.

A more conclusive fact is the one as to the location of the risk during transit.

If the goods are sent upon the account and risk of the shipper, the delivery to the master is a delivery to him as agent of the shipper, not of the consignee. The Frances, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 418, 3 L. ed. 609.

Conversely in Mirabita v. Imperial Ottoman Bank, L. R. 3 Exch. 164, 47 L. J. Exch. 418, 38 L. T. N. S. 597, it is said that if the property is shipped at the buyer's risk, the fact that the seller takes the bills of lading in his own name and retains control of them will show nothing further than that he intended to secure the price, and that upon tender thereof the buyer would have an absolute right of property in the goods, notwithstanding the bills of lading had been indorsed to a third person.

If the goods are shipped on account and at the risk of the consignee, the mere fact that the bills of lading are taken making the goods deliverable to the consignee's own order, does not prevent the passing of title so that, if the consignee obtain possession, the consignor cannot recover, although there may be a liability on the part of the carrier for delivering contrary to his orders. Coxe v. Harden, 4 East, 211, 1 Smith, 20.

In Nichols v. Client, 3 Price, 547, it is said that wherever a delivery of goods to a carrier consigned to a person at a distance has been considered as a delivery to the consignee it has been invariably at his proper risk and under a formal consignment by indorsement of bills of lading.

If a merchant sends goods to another on the latter's account and draws bills on him for such goods the title will pass, although the money is not paid. Godfrey v. Furzo, 3 P. Wms. 185.

The words "free on board" in a contract of sale indicate that after the goods are shipped they will be on account and at the risk of the buyer. Stook v. Ingila, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 578.

If the consignor advises the consignee by letter that he has chartered a ship on his account and encloses him an invoice of the goods laden on board, which were therein expressed to be for account and risk of the consignee, the title vests in the consignee; and if the consignor's agent obtains possession of them and refuses to deliver them without immediate payment, the consignee may maintain trover for them. Walley v. Montgomery, 3 East, 585.

And if, in addition to placing the goods at the risk of the consignee, the bill of lading is indorsed and transmitted to him, the intention to vest the title in him is usually regarded as conclusively shown.

The property will vest upon the delivery of the goods on board, on account and risk of the consignee, and transmission of the bill of lading. Key v. Cotesworth, 7 Exch. 565, 23 L. J. Exch. 4.

Where, in response to an order to ship goods, they are placed on board a ship in regular course tract was made by Ramsey & Gore, and not by the Ramsey & Gore Manufacturing Company, and that, therefore, the motion to nonsuit on the trial should have prevailed. There is no merit in this contention. The letter of August 14, 1890, acknowledges that it is the contract of the company.

The second objection is that all the bobbins were not sent at once, and that the defendants were not bound, under the contract, to accept less than the whole number ordered. Conceding this to be so, the sufficient answer is that this objection was not taken on the trial below, and, when the letter notifying the plaintiff of of trade and a bill of lading taken making them deliverable to the shipper's order, which is immediately indorsed to the buyer and transmitted to an agent for him, the title passes so as to place the goods at the risk of the buyer. Browne v. Hare, 8 Hurlst. & N. 484, 27 L. J. Exch. 373, affirmed in 4 Hurlst. & N. 822, 20 L. J. Exch. 6, 5 Jur. N. S. 711, 7 Week. Rep. 619.

If the goods are delivered to the carrier for the account and at the risk of the consignee, and the invoice and bill of lading transmitted to him, the title is passed so that the subsequent failure of the consignee to perform his contract by sending a banker's draft in payment, will not revert the title in the consignor so as to enable him to regain possession of the property. Wilmshurst v. Bowker, 8 Scott, N. R. 571, 7 Mann. & G. 383, reversing 3 Scott, N. R. 273, 2 Mann. & G. 792. And also apparently overruling the same case on a former hearing, 5 Bing. N. C. 541.

A debtor who accepts an order from his creditor to purchase goods, and after complying with it puts them on creditor's vessel sent for them, as the creditor's, advises him of the shipment on his account and risk and remits him the invoice, thereby passes the title and he cannot regain it by subsequently sending the bill of lading payable to the order of — to his agent, accompanied by a draft, with instruction to deliver the bill of lading to the creditor only in case he accepts the draft. Ogle v. Atkinson, 5 Taunt. 759, 1 Marsh. 828.

Shipping receipts forwarded to the consignee will give him the same rights that he would acquire by a bill of lading. Davis v. Bradley, 28 Vt. 113, 65 Am. Dec. 235.

Bill of lading in name of consignee.

The presumption is that the consignees named in the bill of lading to whom the property is to be delivered on the sole condition that they pay the freight, have the title thereto. Webb v. Winter, 1 Cal. 417.

A delivery of goods in the usual course of business to be transported to the buyer and the taking of a bill of lading in the buyer's name transfers the title to the goods and places them at the buyer's risk. Putnam v. Tillotson, 13 Met. 517.

The actual shipment of goods pursuant to the order of the buyer on board a vessel designated by him for that purpose, under a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to the buyer, passes the title to him, and the seller cannot defeat his right by retaining the bill and sending it to his own agent with directions not to deliver it until the goods are paid for. Stanton v. Bager, 16 Pick. 497.

The delivery by a shipper to a carrier of goods consigned to a third person and a bill of lading taken in the name of such third person, for the purpose of securing an existing indebtedness from the shipper to the third person, operates as a transfer of the legal title, although the third person has not signified his assent to the transaction. Grove v. Brien, 49 U. S. 8 How. 499, 18 L. ed. 1143.

Where goods were shipped under a bill of lading stating that they were "shipped by order" and were to be delivered "to order or assignee," the court held that the only proof of ownership was the possession of the bill of lading, and that, although the shipment was to factors, for sale and accounting of profits, yet persons to whom the factors had assigned the bill of lading were entitled to the property. Glidden v. Lucas, 7 Cal. 28.

If lumber is delivered on board cars consigned to the buyer, the fact that the bills of lading are retained by the laborers to secure payment of their wages is not sufficient to defeat the passing of the title. Hope Lumber Co. v. Foster & L. Hardware Co. 58 Ark. 193.

If the goods are consigned by the bill of lading to the consignee, the fact that the bill is retained by the consignor and sent to his agent with directions not to deliver it until the price is paid, will not prevent the title from passing. Robinson v. Pogue, 35 Ala. 267.

But in one case it was held that a bill of lading by which goods are made deliverable to the consignee is revocable until the goods or bill of lading are delivered to him. Mitcheil v. Ede, 11 Ad. & El. 388, 3 Perry & D. 513.

So that delivery of goods on board a ship belonging to the consignee and taking a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to the consignee, he paying the freight, will not transfer the title; but the consignor may change the destination of the goods by subsequent indorsement on the bill of lading. Ibid.

Draft against bill of lading.

If property is consigned to a correspondent, subject to a bill of exchange, the title will not pass until the acceptance of the bill. Brandt v. Bowlby, 2 Barn. & Ad. 923.

If the bill of lading is attached to a bill of exchange and forwarded to a bank for collection the title will not pass. Seelingson v. Philbrick, 6 Fed. Rep. 601.

If goods are delivered to a carrier to be forwarded to a consignee for sale, the fact that the bill of lading is made out in favor of the consignee and that the consignor is indebted to the consignee for previous advances, will not operate to transfer the title to the consignee, if a draft is drawn against the shipment and attached to the bill of lading and placed in the hands of a bank to be held until the draft is accepted. Bank of Rochester v. Jones, 4 N. Y. 497, 55 Am. Dec. 390.

If goods are ordered to be shipped with a draft at sight attached to the bill of lading, the direction is evidence that the title to the goods is not to pass until the draft is paid. Indiana Nat. Bank v. Colgate, 4 Daly, 41.

Persons to whom property is consigned for sale have no right to receive and retain the property and dishonor the draft drawn against it, although there was due them from the consignor a balance on an old account. Commercial Bank of Keokuk v. Pfeiffer, 108 N. Y. 942.

If a draft accompanies the bill of lading, the consignee cannot claim title to the property and refuse to accept the draft. First Nat. Bank v. Crocker, 111 Mass. 168.

Shipping the goods according to the orders and intentions of the purchaser and handing over bills of lading to his agents to be forwarded to his consignees will pass the title, although he subsequently refuses to sign the draft upon the consignees, which was to be the seller's security for payment of the purchase price. Harrison v. Williamson, 3 Edw. Ch. 430, 6 L. ed. 455.

If the goods are deliverable to the order of the the defendants' refusal to accept was written, the whole number of bobbins were in Paterson, of which fact the defendants had notice.

The third ground of defense is that the order to stop for a time terminated the plaintiff's right to fill the order, but to this I cannot agree. His right, under the contract, was to proceed at once with the manufacture of the goods, and to make delivery within a reasonable time. The defendants had no right to require him to stop temporarily, and could not, by such notice, change the plaintiff's rights under the contract.

The fourth ground relied upon by the deconsignor, and the bill of lading with draft attached is forwarded for collection, no title passes. Alderman v. Eastern R. Co. 115 Mass. 238.

The fact that the contract provides that the goods shall be shipped free on board does not make a delivery to the carrier a delivery to the purchaser, if the bill of lading is taken to the vendor's order and attached to a draft transmitted to the vendor's agent for collection. Erwin v. Harris, 37 Ga. 363.

Retention of the bill of lading and forwarding it to agents to deliver to the vendee on payment of the draft, of themselves, sufficiently indicate an intention to retain possession and control of the property shipped. Bergeman v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 104 Mo. 77.

Where the consignor sends the bill of lading to his agent at the port of delivery, accompanied by a bill of exchange to be accepted by the consignee, with directions to hand over the bill of lading when the bill of exchange is accepted, the presumption is that the title should not pass until acceptance. Shepherd v. Harrison, L. R. 5 H. L. 116, 40 L. J. Q. B. 144, 24 L. T. N. S. 857, 20 Week. Rep. 1, affirming L. R. 4 Q. B. 196, 493, 38 L. J. Q. B. 105, 177.

But it has been held that if the goods are delivered under a bill of lading stating that they are on account of the consignee as his own goods and to be delivered to him, the fact that bills are drawn for the unpaid purchase money is not sufficient to prevent the passing of the title. Ogle v. Atkinson, 1 Marsh. 323, 5 Taunt. 759.

So if the goods were delivered to the carrier consigned to the buyer, and the bill of lading taken in his name, the jury may be authorized to find an intention to deliver to him, although the bill of lading was attached to a draft and sent to a bank with direction not to deliver the bill of lading until the draft was accepted. Wigton v. Bowley, 120 Mass. 353.

And the mere fact that the master of the vessel attempts to withhold the goods until the consignee accepts the draft drawn against the bill of lading, will not prevent the delivery upon the boat passing the title. Groning v. Mendham, 5 Maule & S. 180.

It has been held that if the bill of lading is taken in the name of the consignor and attached to a draft, the title will not pass to the consignee until the draft is paid. Jenkyns v. Brown, 14 Q. B. 493, 19 L. J. Q. B. 293, 14 Jur. 505.

So the fact that the bill of lading is taken in the name of the shipper and attached to a draft and forwarded through a bank for collection does not import an intention to give credit, so that the buyer is entitled to the bill of lading upon acceptance of the draft. Minnesota Secur. Bank v. Luttgen, 20 Minn. 383.

Conversely it has been held that when a bill of lading is transferred to the consignee, and at the same time he accepts the bill of exchange for the value of the goods, he acquires an absolute interest. Dows v. Cobb, 10 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 161.

There seems to be no doubt but that the payment of the draft and receipt of the bill of lading will vest the title in the consignee. Forchheimer v. Stewart, 66 Iowa, 504.

Special contracts or courses of dealing.

under a contract by a mining company to ship to a bank the product of its mine in consideration of advances made by the bank, and that the carrier should be regarded as an agent of the bank, the title passes. First Nat. Bank v. McAndrews, 7 Mont. 180.

After a boat is completely laden and a receipt for the contents taken from the master and the receipt is sent to a consignee accompanied by an agreement that the consignee may have the property if he will accept a draft against it, the acceptance of the draft passes the title so that the property cannot be subsequently appropriated to another person. Bryans v. Nix, 4 Mees. & W. 778, 1 Hurlst. & N. 480.

Shipment, accompanied by notice thereof in accordance with the order, passes title to the buyer. Schmertz v. Dwyer, 68 Pa. 353.

If in accordance with a course of dealing, goods are consigned, a letter of advice is forwarded, and a bill of exchange drawn against the consignment and accepted by the consignee, the title passes, although there is no express agreement that it should do so. Holbrook v. Wight, 24 Wend. 199, 25 Am. Dec. 607.

In Tooke v. Hollingworth, 5 T. R. 215, 3 H. Bl. 501, where, by agreement the consignor, was to send the consignee all of a certain kind of property which he could at a certain price and who from time to time drew upon the consignee for the value, and having made drafts sent some property to enable the consignee to meet them, after the consignee had become bankrupt, it was held that the consignor was entitled to get the property back, on the ground that it was sent for a particular purpose, and that that purpose not having been answered the property remained in him.

Imposition of conditions.

The imposition of conditions on the consignee will prevent the passing of title until the conditions are complied with. The Frances, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 133, 3 L. ed. 606.

The title will not pass if the property is shipped subject to the performance by the vendee of a condition precedent. Millhiser v. Erdman, 98 N. C. 282.

If the sale is so conditional that delivery to the buyer himself would not pass title until the condition is complied with, a delivery to the carrier will not have that effect. Stone v. Perry, 60 Me. 43.

Where coal was sold and shipped on board a vessel chartered by the buyer to be paid for in cash against bill of lading in the hands of the seller's agent at the port of delivery, it was held that no property passed until the condition was fulfilled. Moakes v. Nicolson, 19 C. B. N. S. 290, 34 L. J. C. P. 273.

If the sale is on condition that notes shall be sent in payment, the title will not pass until the notes are sent, although the goods are delivered to a carrier for transportation. Hirschhorn v. Canney, 96 Mass. 149.

If the goods are delivered to a carrier under a contract for payment of cash on arrival, the payment of the cash is a condition precedent to the passing of title. Daugherty v. Fowler, 10 L. R. A. 314, 44 Kan. 623.

But a stipulation for payment on arrival will not of itself prevent the title from passing, or make either payment or arrival a condition precedent.

fendants is the debatable one, and that is that there was no acceptance by the defendants, and therefore that the title did not pass to defendants, and the price consequently cannot be sued for; that the only remedy of the plaintiff is an action of damages for nonacceptance. If the question in this case was whether there was delivery and acceptance to take the case out of the statute of frauds, it would be clear that the plaintiff could not recover, for there was a refusal to accept. In this case the contract is conceded to be a valid contract in writing, and the question presented is the narrower one, whether there was such a delivery as thereto, if the seller has appropriated the goods to the contract by delivering them to a carrier designated by the buyer, or, in the absence of such designation, to a carrier in due course of trade. Farmers Phosphate Co. v. Gill, 1 L. R. A. 467, 69 Md. 537.

In Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Barnes, 104 N. C. 25, it was held that if goods are sold and shipped to be delivered upon payment of the purchase money, the right of property passes to the buyer, but the right of possession remains in the seller until the price has been paid; and that if the buyer obtains possession without paying the price and sells to a bona fide purchaser, the seller cannot retake the goods.

The fact that the payment was to be made upon the arrival of the goods does not impose the risk of transit on the seller, if his contract was to deliver on a certain boat at Boston bound for the buyer's place of residence. Barry v. Palmer, 19 Me. 303.

The mere fact that the obligation to pay is dependent upon the acceptance of the materials by a building committee will not prevent the passing of title, if the materials shipped were of the quality which the contract called for, so that the committee was bound to accept. Rechtin v. McGary, 117 Ind. 182.

d. Sufficiency of change of possession as regards creditors.

The delivery to the carrier is a sufficient change of possession to make the sale valid as against attaching creditors. Hall v. Gaylor, 37 Conn. 550.

Under a completed sale of hay to be delivered at a river landing, there is a sufficient change of possession when it is delivered at that place and there taken possession of by an agent of the buyer and by him placed on board a vessel for transportation to market, to prevent its being attached as the property of the vendor. Schmidt v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 371.

e. Place where sale is consummated.

Intimately connected with the question how far delivery to a carrier is a delivery to a buyer is the further one as to what is to be considered as the place where a sale is consummated.

In Tegler v. Shipman, 38 Iowa, 194, 11 Am. Rep. 118, the question of the place of sale seems to be made to depend upon the fact as to where the contract was completed rather than where the property was delivered, the court stating that if an agent for the sale of liquors forwarded an order to his principals in another state, to be by them accepted or rejected at their pleasure, the sale would be in the latter state, but if he made the sale and forwarded the statement of it to them to be filled then the sale must be held to have been made where the agent transacted the business.

But the place of delivery is usually regarded as the important fact.

A written order sent from one state to another and the shipment of the goods in the latter state according to the order makes the sale complete there, so as not to be within inspection laws of the state where the buyer resides. Atlantic Phosphate Co. v. Ely, 32 Ga. 433.

In the absence of any agreement between the parties to the contract, a delivery of goods ordered to a carrier is in law a delivery to the purchaser, so 22 L. R. A.

as to make the place of sale where the goods were so delivered. Kline v. Baker, 99 Mass. 253.

The place of sale of intoxicating liquors is where the sale is completed by a delivery of liquors in fulfillment of the general order to the carrier. Abberger v. Marrin, 102 Mass. 70; Brookway v. Maloney, Id. 308; Dolan v. Green, 110 Mass. 322; Frank v. Hoey, 128 Mass. 293; Dunn v. State, 3 L. R. A. 190, 32 Ga. 27; Herron v. State, 51 Ark. 133; Sarbecker v. State, 66 Wis. 171, 55 Am. Rep. 324; Territt v. Bartlett, 21 Vt. 134; Whitlock v. Workman, 15 Iowa, 354; Williams v. Feinman, 14 Kan. 238; Torrey v. Corlies, 38 Me. 333; Banohor v. Cilley, 38 Me. 553; Kling v. Fries, 33 Mich. 275; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 70 Mich. 533; Pearson v. State, 4 L. R. A. 335, 66 Miss. 510; Woolsey v. Bailey, 27 N. H. 217; Smith v. Smith, 37 N. H. 24; Garland v. Lane, 46 N. H. 245; Boothby v. Plaisted, 51 N. H. 430, 12 Am. Rep. 140; Garbracht v. Com. 96 Pa. 449, 42 Am. Rep. 550; Mack v. Lee, 13 R. I. 293; Dame v. Flint, 64 Vt. 533; Banohor v. Warren, 33 N. H. 133.

The delivery of liquors to a carrier to be transported to a buyer in another state in pursuance to an order received by mail completes the sale and passes the title. Oroutt v. Nelson, 1 Gray, 536.

That the seller undertakes that the liquors shall remain good for a reasonable time after reaching its destination, and, if destroyed in transit through any fault of the seller, he would bear the loss, does not fix the place of the buyer's residence rather than that of the seller's residence as the place of sale. Arnold v. Prout, 51 N. H. 537.

The place of shipment of the goods is the place of sale within the law providing for a tax on business. Shriver v. Pittsburgh, 66 Pa. 444.

The fact that the dealer himself takes the order will not complete the contract so as to make the buyer's residence the place of sale, if the order is transmitted and filled by delivery to a common carrier at the seller's place of residence in another state. State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 755.

The fact that the order is taken by the seller himself does not prevent his place of business, where he sets apart the liquor and delivers it to a carrier, from being the place of sale. Sortwell v. Hughes, 1 Curt. C. C. 244.

Receipt by merchants in one state of an order from their agent in another state, who has authority only to solicit orders, followed by the filling of the order and delivery to a carrier for transportation, will make the place of sale the seller's residence, and it is immaterial that he undertook to pay the freight. Finch v. Mansfield, 97 Mass. 39.

But if the seller of liquor undertakes to deliver it at the buyer's residence in another town, the sale may be found to have been completed there. Com. v. Burgett, 136 Mass. 450; Well v. Golden, 141 Mass. 384.

So if a seller of liquor resident in one state sends his agent to take orders in another state, agreeing to deliver the goods in the latter state, the sale will not be complete upon delivery of the liquors to the carrier in the former. Suit v. Woodhall, 113 Mass. 391.

If one receiving an order for intoxicating liquors transmits it to his agent where the buyer resides, to be by him delivered to the buyer, the sale will not be completed by delivery to the carrier. Berger v. State, 50 Ark. 20.

And if the liquors are to be sent subject to the passed the title to the vendees, so that they may be held for the purchase price. The vendor claims that the delivery of the goods to the common carrier constituted a delivery to the purchasers, and passed the title to them, subject only to the right of stoppage in transitu. It is not asserted that the receipt by the carrier constitutes acceptance by the vendees; it is only a delivery, not an acceptance. That the carrier, in the absence of authority to accept, represents the purchasers only to receive and forward. Although the cases upon this subject are not entirely in accord, the authorities generally hold that a delivery to a com-approval of the buyer, the place of sale will be held to be that of the buyer's residence. Rindskopf v. D'Ruyter, 39 Mich. 1, 38 Am. Rep. 340.

If the contract is that the liquors need not be paid for unless they suit the buyer, the sale is not complete until after the purchaser has received the liquors and had an opportunity to make an election. Wilson v. Stratton, 47 Me. 120.

The fact that liquors are sold under a contract that they may be returned if not as represented does not, however, prevent the title from passing when they are delivered to the carrier. Schlesinger v. Stratton, 9 R. I. 373.

Under a statute making void all contracts or agreements relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, if the seller takes the order himself the transaction will be void, although the liquors are put up and shipped at his place of business in another state. Webber v. Howe, 38 Mich. 150, 24 Am. Rep. 590.

Goods sent C. O. D.

The courts are at variance as to the effect of sending the goods C. O. D. On one side it is held that—

If the buyer directs the goods to be sent to him by express C. O. D., a delivery to the express company passes the title to the buyer. Crook v. Cowan, 84 N. C. 743.

When goods are forwarded through a carrier designated by the buyer marked C. O. D., the carrier is the agent of the purchaser to receive the goods from the seller and the agent of the seller to collect the price from the purchaser, and the sale is complete when the goods are delivered to the carrier. Pilgreen v. State, 71 Ala. 368; State v. Carll, 43 Ark. 353, 51 Am. Rep. 566; Brechwald v. People, 21 Ill. App. 212; Com. v. Fleming, 5 L. R. A. 470, 120 Pa. 138.

In case intoxicating liquors are sent into the state C. O. D., they may, if seized by the state, be reclaimed by the buyer, if not liable to confiscation, since the title passed when the bargain was struck, subject to the vendor's lien, so as to give the buyer a right of property in the liquors. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 73 Me. 273.

Conversely it is held that—

The title to liquor sold in retail quantities and shipped C. O. D. remains in the seller until it is delivered and the price paid, so as to make the seller liable for a violation of the liquor laws, if he is not licensed to sell in the place at which the delivery is made. United States v. Shriver, 23 Fed. Rep. 124; S. C. sub nom. People v. Shriver, 31 Alb. L. J. 153, Chicago Legal News, Feb. 21, 1895.

Goods sent C. O. D. are at the risk of the vendor, although sent by the carrier named by the vendee. Baker v. Bourcault, 1 Daly, 23.

When liquors are sent C. O. D., the carrier is the agent of the consignor, and the title does not pass until they are delivered and paid for. State v. Four Jugs of Intoxicating Liquor, 58 Vt. 140.

The fact that goods are shipped C. O. D. indicates an intention by the seller to retain possession, and delivery to the carrier is not a delivery to the buyer. Wagner v. Hallack, 3 Colo. 173.

The decisions may be partly reconciled by determining who directed the shipment.

The judge, in delivering the opinion in United States v. Cline, 26 Fed. Rep. 537, recognizes the rule that when liquors are delivered to a carrier marked

C. O. D., the carrier is the agent of the seller, and the sale is not completed until they are delivered and the price paid.

If the articles shipped are manufactured at the order of the purchaser, the mere fact that they are shipped C. O. D. will not prevent the manufacturer from collecting for his services. Higgins v. Murray, 73 N. Y. 252.

1. Effect of receipt by carrier to satisfy statute of frauds.

There is no sufficient acceptance to take the case out of the statute of frauds, where the goods are delivered to a common carrier, who is designated by the buyer but not expressly authorized to accept them, if they never come into the buyer's actual possession and he never sees, examines, or exercises any control over them or receives the bill of lading. Johnson v. Cuttle, 105 Mass. 447, 7 Am. Rep. 543.

A delivery of goods in accordance with a parol contract to a general carrier not designated or selected by the buyer, does not constitute such a delivery and acceptance as to satisfy the statute of frauds. Rodgers v. Phillips, 40 N. Y. 519.

If the statute of frauds requires acceptance of the goods, receipt by a carrier designated by the buyer is not sufficient to show acceptance. Fontaine v. Bush, 40 Minn. 141.

Delivery of goods to a general ship, although corresponding closely to the description given by the buyer, if accompanied by a bill of lading in the name of the seller's agent, does not constitute such an acceptance by the buyer as will take the case out of the statute of frauds. Frostburg Min. Co. v. New England Glass Co., 9 Oush. 115.

If the goods are to be sent subject to the buyer's approval, a delivery to the carrier will not be sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Rindskopf v. D'Ruyter, 39 Mich. 1, 38 Am. Rep. 340.

The fact that the buyer designates a particular carrier for the transportation of the goods, does not empower him to accept them so as to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Jones v. Mechanics' Bank, 29 Md. 287, 96 Am. Dec. 533.

The shipment on board a vessel selected by the vendor, and the signature of a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to the vendee's agent, though a sufficient delivery to support an action for goods sold and delivered, is not sufficient to make a binding contract within the statute of frauds. Meredith v. Meigh, 3 Bl. & Bl. 364, 23 L. J. Q. B. 401, 17 Jur. 649.

Where goods were verbally ordered, with no order given as to the manner of sending, the delivery to the carrier directed to the purchaser was not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds so as to pass the title to the purchaser and prevent the seller from maintaining an action against the carrier for their loss. Coats v. Chaplin, 2 Gale & D. 552, 3 Q. B. 453, 6 Jur. 1123.

A delivery of goods on board a ship chartered by the buyer is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Acebal v. Levy, 10 Bing. 876, 4 Moore & S. 217.

The receipt by the carrier of goods under a parol contract for sale, to be transported to the buyer, does not constitute such an acceptance as to take the case out of the statute of frauds, if the carrier was not specially authorized to accept it so as to bind the buyer. Atherton v. Newhall, 123 Mass. 141, 25 Am. Rep. 47.

mon carrier of the goods, properly addressed to the vendee, is a delivery to the vendee, subject to the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, and to the vendee's right to reject for nonconformity to the contract. *Brown v. Mere authority to receive goods for transportation carries no implied authority to accept them so as to satisfy the statute of frauds. Allard v. Gressert, 61 N. Y. 1.

And the great weight of authority is that delivery to a carrier is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Caulkins v. Hellman, 47 N. Y. 449, 7 Am. Rep. 461; Langeman v. Stevens 5 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 19; Sherman v. Williams, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 415; Billin v. Henkel, 9 Colo. 394; Simmons Hardware Co. v. Mullen, 33 Minn. 196; *Norman v. But in Hart v. Sattley, 3 Campb. 538, it was decided that if the delivery is to a carrier who has been in the habit of receiving and transporting goods from the buyer to the seller, the carrier must be considered as having been constituted by the buyer his agent to accept the goods within the statute of frauds.

Hart v. Sattley was recognized as authority in Sortwell v. Hughes, 1 Curt. C. C. 244.

And it has been held in Vermont that delivery to a carrier selected and named by the purchaser and their acceptance by him constitutes a sufficient receipt and acceptance to take a parol sale out of the statute of frauds. Spencer v. Hale, 30 Vt. 314, 73 Am. Dec. 309; Strong v. Dodds, 47 Vt. 348.

The buyer will not be permitted to set up the statute of frauds to defeat the action if the goods are placed on the vessel according to his directions and are afterwards taken possession of by him and treated as his own. Goddard v. Demeritt, 48 Me. 211.

In Morton v. Tibbitt, 15 Q. B. 423, 19 L. J. Q. B. 382, 14 Jur. 609, the buyer had purchased wheat by sample and directed it to be sent to him by carrier. It was so sent and he took the sample and after its arrival attempted to sell it by the sample, and the court held that whether or not the delivery to the carrier was sufficient, his acts of ownership subsequently were evidence from which a jury might find acceptance sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds.

A letter to the seller, "I have spoken to Warner and hired him to freight" the goods down the river. "You will please deliver them to him,"—is a sufficient appointment of Warner as agent to receive delivery within the statute of frauds. Thompson v. Menck, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 400.

Where there was a parol contract for the sale of hay, to be delivered on a barge, of which the buyer was half owner, and he directed his partner to go with the barge to receive the hay, the trial court held that there was a sufficient acceptance when the hay was placed upon the barge to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and the appellate court held that the correctness of this holding was not questioned in such a way that it could be passed upon on appeal. Silver v. Bowne, 55 N. Y. 559, 22 L. R. A.

But a mere request of the person in whose hands the property is to see that it is delivered and measured up properly, accompanied by a request to send it by a certain boat, does not make a delivery to the boat a sufficient acceptance to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Astey v. Emery, 4 Maule & S. 232.

The acceptance and dealing with the bill of lading may also constitute an acceptance within the statute of frauds. Currie v. Anderson, 2 El. & El. 522, 20 L. J. Q. B. 37, 6 Jur. N. S. 442, 3 Week. Rep. 274.

Although delivery of a bill of lading at the buyer's office from which he is absent on account of sickness, and which he returns as soon as he is notified of its presence, is not a sufficient acceptance of the goods to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Quintard v. Bacon, 99 Mass. 185.

If the buyer selects the particular goods and specifies the carrier to whom they are to be delivered, a delivery to and receipt by the carrier will constitute such an acceptance as to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Glen v. Whitaker, 51 Barb. 451.

And after the buyer has accepted the goods delivery to a carrier designated by the buyer will constitute such a delivery and acceptance as will take the case out of the statute of frauds. Cross v. O'Donnell, 44 N. Y. 661, 4 Am. Rep. 721.

And a delivery of goods to a carrier is a delivery to a buyer, though the carrier was not designated by him, so as to take the case out of the provisions of a statute of frauds, providing that the sale shall be void inter alia when no part of the property is delivered. Bullock v. Stehger, 4 McCrary, 184, 13 Fed. Rep. 244; Liggett & M. Tobacco Co. v. Collier (Iowa) Oct. 9, 1898.

g. Right to maintain action.

There is no definite rule on which all the courts agree as to who is the proper one to maintain an action for nondelivery of the goods or their loss while in transit. Actions have been brought by consignor, by consignee, and by owner, and in most instances something in the facts of the case has made the action proper so that many of the decisions are simply to the effect that the one who brought the action could maintain it without attempting to settle definitely that it could have been maintained by no one else.

Owner may sue.

The owner should bring the action, and the consignee is presumed to be the owner in the absence of proof to the contrary. Congar v. Galena & C. U. R. Co. 17 Wis. 477.

If the bill is general to A., and the invoice only shows that they are upon account of B., the property is in A. and he must bring the action. Evans v. Marlett, 1 Ld. Raym. 271, 12 Mod. 158, 8 Salk. 280.

If, by the bill of lading, the goods are, to be delivered to A. to the use of B., B. is the owner and must bring the action. Ibid.

In an action by the owner of goods lost in transit, a prior recovery by the consignor is no defense. Coombs v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & N. 1, 27 L. J. Exch. 202.

Right of consignor.

If the consignor is the owner of the goods he may maintain the suit.

Md. 896, 77 Am. Dec. 803; Magruder v. Gage, 83 Md. 844, 8 Am. Rep. 177; 1 Benjamin, Sales, §§ 161, 181; Story, Sales, § 806; 2 Kent, Com. 499.

The distinction is made in some of these cases that, in order to give to the delivery to the carrier the effect of a delivery to the buyer, the carrier must be selected or named by the buyer. When the contract of the manufacturer is simply to make the goods at an agreed price, he has fully executed the agreement on his part when the goods are produced at his factory, ready to be delivered on demand. In that case, however, he is not authorized by the

If, by the contract, the title did not pass to the consignee, the consignor is the proper person to sue for the loss of the goods. Madison, L. & P. R. Co. v. Whitesel, 11 Ind. 55.

The consignor may show that the goods belonged to himself and not to the consignee, for the purpose of maintaining an action against the carrier for their loss. Harrison v. Hixson, 4 Blackf. 226.

If goods are forwarded for sale on approval, the action for their loss must be brought by the consignor. Swain v. Shepherd, 1 Mood. & R. 223.

If there is such fraud in the case that there has been no sale, the delivery to the carrier will not pass the title out of the shipper so as to prevent his bringing action for a wrong delivery. Duff v. Budd, 3 Brod. & B. 177, 6 Moore, 496.

If the shipment is made at the risk and for the account of the consignor he must bring an action for the loss. Sargent v. Morris, 3 Barn. & Ald. 277.

If the consignor is the owner of property and the consignee merely his agent, the suit for its destruction is properly brought in the name of the consignor. Price v. Powell, 8 N. Y. 322.

If the consignor brings suit, he must show by his complaint that he was the owner of the property rather than the consignee. [Pennsylvania Co. v. Holderman, 69 Ind. 18.

Conversely it has been held that if the goods are shipped under a bill of lading stating that it is by order and on account of the consignee, the consignor cannot maintain an action for their loss. Brown v. Hodgson, 2 Campb. 37.

So delivery of goods to a boatman in response to an order to ship them via canal passes the title to the buyer so as to prevent the seller from maintaining an action in his own name for their loss. Krudler v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 36.

So a mere agent who, in pursuance of his duty, consigns property to his principal, the true owner, has no sufficient title after the property has been delivered to the carrier to maintain an action for its loss. Thompson v. Fargo, 49 N. Y. 188, 10 Am. Rep. 342.

It is generally held that the consignor may maintain suit on the carriage contract although he is not the owner of the property.

In Davis v. James, 5 Burr. 2680, in which the shipper delivered the goods to the carrier to be transported to the consignee and himself paid the freight, the court held that he might bring an action on the agreement between himself and the carrier, in case the goods were lost.

In Moore v. Wilson, 1 T. R. 659, an action was brought against the carrier by the consignor with an allegation that the hire was to be paid by the plaintiff, and the court held that proof that it was to be paid by the consignee was no variance because the consignor was in law liable.

Where a laundress sent linen which she had washed to the owner by a carrier whom she paid, she was held entitled to maintain an action for its loss. Freeman v. Birch, 1 Nev. & M. 420, 8 Q. B. 483, note.

In case goods are lost in transit, the consignor may bring action, if he has made a special contract for their carriage with the carrier. Dunlop v. Lambert, 6 Clark & F. 600.

The suit may be brought by the one with whom the carriage contract was made. Mead v. South Eastern R. Co. 18 Week. Rep. 735.

If the contract is made by the shipper and freight paid by him, he may maintain an action in his own name for failure to deliver according to the bill of lading. Joseph v. Knox, 8 Campb. 380.

If the shipper guarantees payment of freight and makes special agreement for the carriage, action may be brought for their nondelivery by the consignor with whom the contract was made, or by the consignee, who is the owner of the goods. Stafford v. Walter, 67 Ill. 83.

In Goodwyn v. Douglas, Cheves, L. 174, it is said that if the vendor pays the freight and voluntarily takes on himself the selection of the carrier and mode of conveyance, he must stand the risk of loss and may maintain an action against the carrier therefor.

A shipper of goods who has contracted for their safe conveyance may sue for injuries thereto in transportation, although the title has vested in the consignee. Hooper v. Chicago & N. R. Co. 27 Wis. 81, 9 Am. Rep. 439.

It seems, however, that the existence of a carriage contract is not in all cases conclusive. For it has been held that an action founded on a bill of lading should be brought by the shipper with whom the contract was made, or, if the consignee was the actual owner of the goods, it may be brought by him. Dows v. Cobb, 12 Barb. 310, 10 N. Y. Legal Obs. 161.

But some of the cases are strong in favor of the shipper. Thus the shipper named in a bill of lading may sue the carrier for injury to the goods while in transit, although all the interest, general or special, has passed to the consignee. Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281.

When carrying goods from seller to purchaser, if there is nothing in the relation of the several parties except what arises from the fact that the seller commits the goods to the carrier as the ordinary and convenient mode of transmission and delivery in execution of the order of sale, the employment is by the seller and actions based upon the contract may be in the name of the consignor. If, however, the purchaser designates the carrier, making him his agent to receive and transmit the goods, or if the sale is complete before delivery to the carrier and the seller is made the agent of the purchaser in respect to the forwarding of them, the contract of service may be held to be with the purchaser, and he alone would be entitled to maintain an action for breach of the carriage contract. Finn v. Western R. Co. 112 Mass. 524, 17 Am. Rep. 128.

Suit by consignee.

If goods by bill of lading are consigned to A. A. is the owner and must bring the action against the master of the ship, if they are lost. Evans v. Marlett, 1 Ld. Raym. 271, 12 Mod. 156, 8 Salk. 290.

A consignee to whom property has been shipped in satisfaction of prior advances, or who accepts a draft for the value of the goods, acquires the absolute title so as to enable him to sue upon the bill of lading. Dows v. Cobb, 12 Barb. 310.

Consignees of goods and holders of the bill of lading who have made advances upon it have an interest or property in the goods which will entitle them to maintain an action against the carrier for breach of the contract. Adams v. Bissell, 28 Barb. 382.

If goods are delivered to a carrier to be delivered by him to a third person and the goods are lost, the vendee to deliver them for transportation. But when the purchaser instructs the vendor to send the goods to him it does not appear how it makes any difference in the rule applicable to the case whether he names the carrier or not. If the carrier is not specified, the vendor, acting in this respect under the order of the purchaser to forward the goods, is his agent in the selection of the carrier, and in either case the carrier is, in contemplation of law, chosen by the purchaser. In this case the purchasers expressly instructed the plaintiff to send the goods from New Hampshire to Paterson. When the goods passed out of the possession of the plaintiff into the hands of the carrier, who must be regarded as the consignee only can bring the action. Snee v. Prescott, 1 Aik. 245.

The buyer may maintain an action for the loss of goods shipped under an order, "to dispatch the goods on insurance being effected." Terms three months' credit from time of arrival." Fragano v. Long, 4 Barn. & C. 219, 6 Dowl. & R. 288.

The consignee has such an interest as to enable him to maintain an action for the nondelivery of the goods if there is no evidence of ownership in the consignor. Arbuckle v. Thompson, 37 Pa. 170.

In Anderson v. Clark, 2 Bing. 20, in which according to a custom of dealing between the parties, goods were shipped consigned to plaintiff against which a draft was drawn which plaintiff refused to pay and thereupon the carrier by direction of the shipper redelivered the goods to the shipper, the plaintiff was held entitled to maintain an action for the nondelivery.

The consignees are to be held, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to have such an interest in the consignment as to enable them to maintain an action for its nondelivery. Tromson v. Dent, 38 Eng. L. & Eq. 41.

If the goods are consigned without reservation on the part of the consignor, the consignee is the proper party to bring an action for their loss. Merchant's Despatch Transp. Co. v. Smith, 76 Ill. 342.

The consignees are entitled to maintain an action for the loss of the goods. D'Anjou v. Deagle, 3 Harr. & J. 208; Armentrout v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. E. Co., 1 Mo. App. 158.

The party to whom, by the terms of the bill of lading, the property is to be delivered, may maintain replevin therefor. Powell v. Bradlee, 9 Gill & J. 276.

If the goods are bought and paid for and the bill of lading executed to the vendor acknowledging the receipt of the goods to be conveyed to the vendee, the contract of transportation is in legal effect with the vendee, and he may sue for the nondelivery of the goods. Gwyn v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 35 N. C. 429, 39 Am. Rep. 708.

The consignee named in the bill of lading is presumed to be the owner of the property, and in the absence of evidence to control the effect of that document, he is entitled to maintain an action in his own name against the carrier for the loss of the goods. Lawrence v. Minturn, 58 U. S. 17 How. 100, 15 L. ed. 58.

If the goods are shipped for the account and risk of the consignee, he paying freight, and it is so expressed in the invoice and bill of lading, the delivery to the carrier passes the title to him and he alone can sue if they are not delivered. Potter v. Lansing, 1 Johns. 215, 3 Am. Dec. 810.

In Daves v. Peck, 8 T. R. 380, 3 Esp. 12, the court held that if the seller delivers the goods to the carrier according to the direction of the buyer, the buyer is the one to maintain the action, in case the goods are lost. Cases in which actions had been maintained by the shipper were distinguished, and it was not disputed that the consignor might sue, and under those circumstances the carrier would not be permitted to plead as a bar a former recovery by a stranger in the person of a consignee, and that the result might be a double recovery against the carrier.

Goods delivered to a carrier under an arrangement that the consignee should receive them, pay the freight and apply the proceeds of the sale in payment of prior advances in the ordinary course of trade, are so far in the possession of the consignee that he alone can maintain an action for their wrongful conversion. Wetzel v. Power, 5 Mont. 214.

A factor del credere who has made advances upon goods consigned to him for sale has a lien upon the goods and may maintain an action against the carrier for nondelivery. Holbrook v. Wight, 24 Wend. 189, 35 Am. Dec. 607.

So the purchaser to whom the goods have been shipped in accordance with his order is the proper one to name as owner in an indictment for their theft. Walker v. State, 9 Tex. App. 39.

But some cases have held that if the title was not in the consignee he could not sue.

A mere consignee having no interest in the goods consigned cannot maintain an action against the carrier for an injury to the goods during the voyage. Ogden v. Coddington, 3 E. D. Smith, 817.

The presumption arising from the bill that title has vested in the consignee and that he should properly bring an action for loss of the property may be subject to explanation and removable by proof. Jones v. Sims, 6 Port. (A.) 138.

If the contract is within the statute of frauds, a mere delivery to the carrier will not vest title in the consignee, so as to enable him to sue for loss of the goods. Ooombs v. Bristol & E. R. Co., 3 Hurlst. & N. 610, 37 L. J. Exch. 401.

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Mount Vernon Co., 84 Ala. 173, it is said that if the bill of lading is taken in the name of a seller and attached to a draft, the title is presumptively retained in the seller, and payment of the draft by the purchaser after the loss of the goods does not vest title in him so as to enable him to sue the carrier for their loss.

Other cases have recognized a right in the consignee to sue although the title was shown to be in another person.

The consignee may bring an action for the loss of the goods, although the shipment was upon account of the consignor who also paid the freight. Griffith v. Ingledew, 6 Serg. & R. 429, 9 Am. Dec. 444.

The consignee of goods may sue the common carrier for their loss, although another person was the owner of them. Southern Exp. Co. v. Armistead, 50 Ala. 350.

In my opinion, therefore, the vendor was entitled to recover the contract price, and the judgment below should be affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE of West Virginia, Plff. in Err.,

v.
W. H. FLANAGAN.

(.....W. Va.....)

A party residing in Doddridge county sends a postal card through the mail to a licensed wholesale liquor dealer doing business as such in Wood county, directing a package of whiskey to be sent him by express C. O. D. The order thus sent having been received in Wood county, and having been complied with by delivering the package, marked "C. O. D.," addressed to the purchaser in Doddridge county,—Held, that under the circumstances the sale was made in Wood county, and said wholesale merchant was not liable, under indictment in Doddridge county, for retailing liquors without license in Doddridge county.

(June 21, 1893.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Doddridge County to review a judgment of not guilty after trial of an indictment against defendant for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. S. Riley, Atty-Gen., for the State.
Mr. John Bassel for defendant in error.

English, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the November term in the year 1890, W. H. Flanagan was indicted in the circuit court of Doddridge county for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors in said county without having obtained a license therefor as required by law. A motion was made to quash the indictment, which was overruled. The plea of not guilty was interposed. Issue was joined thereon, and the matters arising thereon were submitted to a jury, which resulted in a verdict of "not guilty," whereupon the attorney for the state moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury, and grant the state a new trial, because said verdict was contrary to the law and evidence, which motion was overruled, and the state excepted, and tendered three bills of exception, which were signed, sealed, and saved to it, and made a part of the record in the cause.

The facts upon which said indictment was predicated, and about which there appears to be no controversy, are set out in said first bill of exceptions as follows: On the 17th day of September, 1890, H. McCally, a resident of West Union, Doddridge county, W. Va., mailed to the defendant, W. H. Flanagan, a duly licensed wholesale and retail dealer in spirituous liquors at Parkersburg, Wood county, W. Va., not licensed in said Doddridge county, a written order or postal card to send him (McCally) one-half gallon of whiskey, collect on delivery; that said defendant received said order, and caused said spirituous liquors so ordered to be packed and delivered to the express agent at Parkersburg, with instructions to express same to the said McCally at West Union, C. O. D., or collect on delivery, to West Union; that the same was so expressed and received by said McCally at West Union from the express agent, B. H. Maulsby, and that said agent returned the price of said liquor,—$1.50,—paid by the said McCally to the said agent at West Union, Doddridge county, to the said defendant at Parkersburg; and that he received the same,—which were all the facts shown in evidence to the jury on said trial, and thereupon the prosecuting attorney of Doddridge county moved the court to instruct the jury that under the state of facts above detailed, reciting them, if they believed them beyond all reasonable doubt, they must find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment; but the court refused to give said instruction, and the state excepted, and thereupon the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that, if they found from the evidence the facts above detailed, they should find for the defendant, to the giving of which instruction the state by her attorney objected, but the court overruled said objection, and gave said instruction, and the state excepted; and, the jury having found a verdict for the defendant, the attorney for the state moved to set aside the verdict, because the same was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion was overruled, judgment was rendered upon the verdict, and the state applied for and obtained this writ of error.

The action of the court with reference to said instructions and upon said motion to set aside the verdict of the jury is assigned and relied upon as error. In order to reach a correct conclusion in this case, it is necessary to determine where this sale was made. The defendant is charged with selling spirituous liquors in the county of Doddridge, without a license, and, if the proof shows the sale to have been made in the county of Wood, he is not guilty of the offense charged, and should have been acquitted. This indictment does not charge the defendant with soliciting orders for whiskey in Doddridge county, and, if it did, the charge would not be sustained by the proof. It merely charges an unlawful selling without a license in the county of Doddridge. The order for the whiskey was sent by postal card through the mail. The knowledge that the whiskey was desired was communicated to the defendant, Flanagan, by the postal card after it was taken from the postoffice of Wood county. He then received the order in Wood county, and complied with it in Wood county, by packing the whiskey and delivering the same to the express agent in said county. It is true the package was sent C. O. D., but that only authorized the express agent to receive the purchase money on delivering the package. The postal card directed the package to be sent by express, C. O. D., and the defendant, Flanagan, in pursuance of this request, delivered the same to the express agent, who acted in a dual capacity, to wit, as the agent of McCally, the consignee, in receiving and carrying the package to its destination, and as the agent of Flanagan, the consignor, in collecting the purchase money. In the case of Garbracht v. Com., 96 Pa. 449, 42 Am. Rep. 550, which is cited by Judge Green in the case of State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 755, the facts were very similar to those in the case we are considering. A party was indicted for selling liquor without a license. The defendant was the agent of a wholesale dealer in liquors, who was doing business in the city of Erie, and as such took orders for liquors from parties residing in Mercer county; and it was held in that case that "the place of sale is the point at which goods ordered are set apart and delivered to the purchaser, or to a common carrier, who, for the purposes of delivery, represents him;" and that, under the circumstances, the sale was made in the city of Erie, and not in Mercer county. Again, in the case of Pilgreen v. State, 71 Ala. 368, where whiskey was shipped from Calera to Columbiana, C. O. D., the court held the place of sale to be Calera, the beginning of the route. The court said: "All the dealings between the buyer and the seller were at Calera. There the offer of the buyer was received, accepted, and acted upon, and there every act was done which it was intended the seller should do. The general property in this thing sold there passed to the buyers by the delivery to the carrier of his own appointment, though he could not entitle himself to possession until he paid the price to the carrier. The carrier was his agent to receive the thing sold at Calera, and was the agent of the seller to receive the price. . . . The general property, however, passed to the buyer by the delivery to the express company at Calera. The risk of the loss then passed to him, though there may have remained in the seller a special property, and though the buyer could not, without payment of the price, entitle himself to the absolute property and to the actual possession." The same doctrine is laid down in the case of Kruidler v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 36, 7 Am. Rep. 402, where "plaintiff, a merchant in New York, received from N. & T., of Rochester, an order in writing for certain goods to be sent by canal. The goods were delivered to defendant's common carriers upon the canal, consigned to N. & T., pursuant to the order. The goods were lost en route. It was held that upon the delivery to the carrier the title passed absolutely to the consignees, subject only to the right of stoppage in transitu; and the plaintiff, the consignor, could not maintain an action for their loss." In Benjamin on Sales, (sec. 362,) the author says: "In 1803, in the case of Dutton v. Solomonson, 8 Bos. & P. 582, it was treated as already settled law that, where a vendor delivered goods to a carrier by order of the purchaser, the appropriation is determined, the delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the vendee, and the property vests immediately." This question was before this court in the case of State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 744, above referred to, and it was held in that case that, where orders for whiskey were solicited by defendant, who resided in Wood county, in the county of Taylor, and the whiskey to fill these orders was delivered in jugs to an express agent in Wood county for transportation to the purchaser in Taylor county, who received the whiskey in Taylor county, and paid the express charges, and subsequently paid the purchase money to one of the firm in Taylor county, the seller could not be indicted in Taylor county for selling spirituous liquors without license, as the sales were made in Wood county, when the jugs were delivered to the express agent. Until then there was only an executory contract for the sale of the whiskey, and the sale became complete and the property in the whiskey was transferred to the purchaser when it was delivered to the express agent for transportation, and not when it was received of the express agent by the purchaser. Other cases might be cited to show that this sale was made in Wood county, but these are regarded as sufficient. In Wood county the proposition was made to purchase the whiskey; it was there accepted; and the goods were packed and delivered to the expressman, the appointed agent of McCally, in Wood county; so that every element necessary to constitute a valid and complete sale was present in the county of Wood, and all of the elements were wanting in the county of Doddridge, so far as the defendant, Flanagan, was concerned. To hold otherwise would prevent a wholesale merchant in Wheeling, Parkersburg, or Charleston from shipping liquors in response to a letter or telegram from a neighboring county, although he had fully complied with the law licensing him as a wholesale dealer, and would confine his wholesale business almost exclusively to the limits of his own county. Such a construction does not, in our opinion, accord with either the letter or spirit of the law, and, entertaining these views upon the statement of facts presented, our conclusion is that the circuit court committed no error in refusing to give the instruction asked for by the state, or in giving the instruction asked for on behalf of the defendant, or in refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

For these reasons the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Mary L. TRIPPE, Admr. etc., of Frederic W. Trippe, Deceased, Resp.,
v.

PROVIDENT FUND SOCIETY, Appt.

(140 N. Y. 23.)

1. The "ten days from the date of either injury or death" within which notice of the death of a person insured by an accident policy must be given does not begin to run from the date of his death occasioned by the fall of a building which he occupied, if the fact of his death is not known until the discovery of his body, but begins to run when the fact of death is known,—especially where the notice of death is required to contain full particulars of the accident and injury.
2. Receiving and retaining notice of death without objection and call for further information, besides furnishing blanks for proofs of loss, waives the objection that the notice was not served in time.
3. The sufficiency of the notice of death is a question of law, where it depends upon the construction of an accident policy to determine whether the time runs from the date of death, or of the discovery of the fact of death.

(November 23, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of a General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York affirming a judgment of a trial term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John L. Hill, with Mr. Arthur M. Sanders, for appellant:

Where the policy provides a definite time for the presentation of notice of accident or injury or death, and that such presentation shall be a condition precedent to liability, the failure to perform the condition defeats all recourse on the policy, no matter whether death was instantaneous or not.

The fact of death having been ascertained on August 25, it must be that the rights and privileges of both parties relate back and become fixed as of the day of the actual death,

NOTE.—As to forfeiture of insurance by failure to furnish proofs of loss within time stipulated, see Steele v. German Ins. Co. (Mich.) 18 L. R. A. 85, and note.

On the question when the stipulated time for furnishing proofs of loss begins to run the above case is novel and important.

and the time of both parties under his contract begin to run from that date.

Allemania Ins. Co. v. Little, 20 Ill. App. 481.

Mr. Trippe accepted the policy with all its provisions and conditions. His estate was his beneficiary. Neither Mr. Trippe nor his beneficiary could accept a part of the contract favorable to them and reject the balance. The contract was entire.

Palmer v. Commercial Travelers Mut. Acc. Asso. 68 Hun, 601.

It would not be unjust or unconscionable to sustain a defense predicated on a delay of but one day in giving notice, when the time for action was fixed by the policy.

Roehner v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 161; Allemania Ins. Co. v. Little, supra; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 849, 850.

The time of death was a material question of fact, and should have been submitted to the jury.

There was no waiver of the breach of the condition respecting notice. No such question can be predicated on this case.

Waiver, except in cases which depend on some theory of estoppel, is matter of intent. If there is no intent to waive, there can be no waiver.

Robertson v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 88 N. Y. 541; Weed v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. 116 N. Y. 118; Armstrong v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 180 N. Y. 560; Ronald v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. 132 N. Y. 168.

There can be no waiver, except in cases of estoppel, without knowledge of the facts.

Robertson v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. Weed v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. and Armstrong v. Agricultural Ins. Co. supra.

The defendant was sued before it had taken any position with reference to the case; hence, every defense under its policy was open to it. The retention of the proofs, of itself, does not create any presumption of waiver. Neither does mere silence.

Titus v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 410; Brink v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 109.

Mr. William H. Arnoux, for respondent:

The notice was duly given. The courts construe the provisions of insurance policies with reference to the meaning and intent, and they extend or annul the same as justice may require. Thus, if Mr. Trippe had been rendered insane and so had been rendered legally incapable of giving notice, the court would read the policy, "Notice shall be given in ten days providing the insured is in a mental condition so to do."

Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Boykin, 79 U. S. 13 Wall. 438, 20 L. ed. 442.

If, however, there had been any failure to give the notice required by the ten-day provision of the policy, such failure was waived by the defendant and it is now estopped from claiming the benefit of any forfeiture based thereon.

Retaining the notice when delivered, even if it were after the time, was a waiver of default.

Wright v. Forbes, 1 How. Pr. 240; Knickerbocker v. Loucks, 8 How. Pr. 64; Georgia Lumber Co. v. Strong, 8 How. Pr. 246; Brink v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 108.

By furnishing blank proofs of loss the company waived the default if any had been made. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Edwards, 122 U. S. 457, 80 L. ed. 1178.

The acceptance of the proofs of loss was a waiver of any and all previous defaults, if there had been any.

Unthank v. Travelers Ins. Co. 4 Biss. 857; Goodwin v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 480; Brink v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. supra; Jones v. Howard Ins. Co. 117 N. Y. 108.

By requiring further proofs and information the company waived the forfeiture.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is an accident insurance company, upon the co-operative or assessment plan, and on the 18th day of March, 1891, issued its policy or certificate to Frederick W. Trippe, the plaintiff's intestate, whereby it agreed, upon the considerations referred to in the instrument, to pay to him certain sums specified as a weekly indemnity on account of disability from accidents within the terms of the contract, and also the sum of $5,000 in case of death "through external, violent and accidental means." The place of business of the insured was in a building near Park place, in the city of New York, which, on the 22d of August, 1891, fell, crushing to death in the ruins several of the occupants, and among them the insured. The destruction of this building, and the consequent loss of life, is known in the events of that year as the "Park Place Disaster." The claim is resisted by the defendant upon the ground that certain conditions expressed in the certificate, which were warranties or conditions precedent to liability, have not been complied with. The most important question, and that most strenuously insisted upon by the defendant, arises upon the following condition: "Notice of any accidental injury, for which claim is to be made under this certificate, shall be given in writing, addressed to the president of the society at New York, stating the full name, occupation, and address of the injured member, with full particulars of the accident and injury, and failure to give such written notice within ten days from the date of either injury or death shall invalidate any and all claims under this certificate."

There is nothing in the case to create any doubt as to the fact that the insured was killed on the day of the accident, but the fact was not known until the 25th, when the body was found among the ruins, and identified. Notice of the death was given to the defendant on the 2d day of September, which was within the ten days from the discovery of the body, but not within ten days from the day of the accident, when, as the defendant insists, the death must have occurred. The condition upon which the defense is based was to operate upon the contract of insurance only subsequent to the fact of a loss. It must therefore receive a liberal and reasonable construction in favor of the beneficiaries under the contract. McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 187 N. Y. 839. The provision requires not only notice of the death, but "full particulars of the accident and injury." It is quite conceivable that in many cases of death by accident the fact cannot be, and is not, known until days, or even weeks, after it has occurred. Such conditions in a policy of insurance must be considered as inserted for some reasonable and practical purpose, and not with a view of defeating a recovery in case of loss by requiring the parties interested to do something manifestly impossible. The object of the notice was to enable the defendant, within a reasonable time after the death or injury, to inquire into all the facts and circumstances while they were fresh in the memory of witnesses, in order to determine whether it was liable, or not, upon its contract. The full particulars of the death, which the condition requires, cannot, ordinarily, be furnished until the fact of death, and the manner in which it occurred, are ascertained. In this case, all that was known prior to the 25th of August, when the body was found, was the fact that the deceased had his place of business in the building, and that it had been destroyed. But it did not follow from these facts that the insured was dead, as he might have been absent from the building at the time, or in some way escaped from the result of the accident; that a notice served upon the defendant prior to the time when the body was found, and the fact of death ascertained, would not be within the object or terms of the condition. The parties having contracted that the notice of death should be accompanied by full particulars of the manner in which it occurred, and the attendant circumstances, they evidently intended that it should be given only when the fact and manner of death became known to the parties who were required to act. The fair and reasonable construction of this condition, therefore, is that the ten days within which the notice is to be given did not begin to run from the date of the accident, or the disappearance of the insured, but from the time when the body was found, and the important fact of death, with the circumstances and particulars under which it occurred, ascertained. This construction secures to the defendant every benefit and advantage that was intended by this provision of the policy, and it cannot, therefore, complain if the very harsh and technical meaning which it now seeks to put upon a condition subsequent is rejected. The plaintiff was the widow of the deceased, and the beneficiary named in the certificate. She was the only party interested in the enforcement of the contract, and who could give the notice; and she could not give it, within the meaning of the condition, until she had knowledge of the facts which she was bound to communicate. To hold that the plaintiff was bound to give notice of the death of her husband, with full particulars, before she had any knowledge of the facts, would be to require her, by a technical and literal construction, to do an impossible thing, which was not within the intention of the parties when the contract was made. Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Boykin, 79 U. S. 13 Wall. 433, 20 L. ed. 442.

But, even if the defendant's construction of this condition was correct, we think, by its acts, the objection has been waived, and cannot now be urged as a defense. The notice served on the 2d of September was retained, without objection, and another served on the 15th of October, after the plaintiff had been appointed administratrix. On the 12th day of October, upon written application to the defendant, it furnished the necessary blanks for proofs of loss. These proofs were made and forwarded to the defendant, in compliance with the terms of the contract, and were retained without objection. On the 19th of March following, the defendant called for further information, which was given. It is well settled that such defenses are waived when the company, with knowledge of all the facts, requires the assured, by virtue of the contract, to do some act, or incur some expense or trouble, inconsistent with the claim that the contract had become inoperative in consequence of a breach of some of the conditions. McNally v. Phenix Ins. Co. supra; Roby v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 120 N. Y. 510; Titus v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 410, 419; Benninghoff v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 93 N. Y. 495; Goodwin v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 480; Brink v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 108; Jones v. Howard Ins. Co. 117 N. Y. 103; Armstrong v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 560; Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Edwards, 123 U. S. 457, 30 L. ed. 1170. The acts of the defendant in receiving and retaining these papers, without objection, and calling for others, are consistent only with the theory that the contract was still considered in force; and as the plaintiff acted accordingly in performance of its conditions, subsequent to the loss, the defendant ought not to be permitted now to change its position, and assert that after ten days from the accident the obligations of the policy virtually ceased, by reason of failure within that time to serve notice of death.

The deceased stated in his application, which is part of the policy, and a warranty, that his business was that of a "wholesale drug merchant." It is now urged that the contract is avoided for the reason that this statement or representation was untrue. This point is based upon evidence tending to show that some of the articles that the deceased kept in his store, and dealt in, were of such a character as to deprive him of the right to be classified for accidental insurance as a wholesale druggist. Without further reference to the merits of this objection, it is sufficient to say that it is not available to the defendant in this court, for the reason that the testimony introduced did not conclusively establish any breach of warranty in this respect. At best, the question was one of fact, and the disposition made of it by the learned trial judge was sufficiently favorable to the defendant, when he submitted it to the jury. No exception was taken by the defendant to this course, or to the instructions given by the court to the jury upon the submission of the question, and, obviously, none could have been. In fact, the only question submitted to the jury was whether this statement was true. The only objection that the defendant made to this disposition of the case was to request a submission, also, of the question as to the date of the death of the insured, which request was properly refused, as the sufficiency of the notice of death served presented a question of law.

The other exceptions in the record have been examined, and, as they disclose no error prejudicial to the defendant, the judgment should be affirmed.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,

Appt.,
v.

Charles M. WILSON.

The following rule formulated in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341: "Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be either such as may fairly and substantially be considered as arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it."—Held, to be applicable to the contracts of telegraph companies for the transmission and delivery of telegraphic messages; and, consequently, that for its breach of a contract to transmit or deliver an unexplained cipher, or otherwise unintelligible message, such company is liable only for nominal damages, or, at most, for the sum paid it for the transmission and delivery thereof.

(Mabry, J., dissents.)

NOTE.—The above decision as to the measure of damages for breach of contract to transmit a cipher or unintelligible telegram is noteworthy as 22 L. R. A.

an express overruling of a former decision of the court. The opinions of the court very fully present the state of the authorities on the question.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Escambia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent failure of defendant to promptly transmit and deliver a message in compliance with its contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mallory & Maxwell, for appellant.

The damages allowed by the jury, in their verdict, were not such as were properly allowable, in that they were remote and not within the contemplation of the parties to this action, at the time of alleged making of contract for transmission.

The rule that the measure of a contracting party's liability, in event of breach by him of contract, will be those damages only, which "may reasonable be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it," while now known as the rule in the case of Hadley v. Barendale, 9 Exch. 341, a decision of comparatively recent date, is one of the oldest and most firmly rooted principles known to the law.

Pothier, Obligation, 1, 159; Code Napoleon, § 1150; La. Civ. Code, art. 1928, § 1824; Horne v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 C. P. 131; 8 Sutherland, Damages, 298, 299; Camp v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 1 Met. (Ky.) 164, 71 Am. Dec. 472; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros. 22 Fla. 687.

A few of the state courts refuse to recognize this like application of the rule to telegraph companies.

Daughtery v. American U. Teleg. Co. 75 Ala. 168, 51 Am. Rep. 435; affirmed by a divided court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Way, 83 Ala. 542; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Reynolds, 77 Va. 173, 40 Am. Rep. 715; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros. supra; both by divided courts.

That the damages in this case be held properly allowed against the telegraph company, it must be shown that they were or should properly have been within the contemplation of the company at the time of receiving the message for transmission.

Horne v. Midland R. Co. supra.

Many courts, recognizing the difficulty under which they labor, hold that a stricter rule should apply to carriers than to telegraph companies, and that mere error in a telegram is not prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the company.

Mr. John C. Avery, for appellee:

The rule of stare decisis will deter this court from changing its position. Appellant is presumed to have made its charge and appellee to have paid it and refrained from communicating the importance of his message with reference to the decision of this court, on the point involved. In such cases, changes of construction should be only prospective.

Douglass v. Pike County of Missouri, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968; Gee v. Williamson, 1 Port. (Ala.) 313, 27 Am. Dec. 631, note 677; 1 Kent, Com. 475.

This is a case that the appellant admits that it never sent or attempted to send the message which the jury by its verdict has said was delivered to and received by the company. It is a case of downright and gross negligence, in which the company stands before the court in the worst possible attitude in which to invoke the protection of a technical and often fanciful rule for the measure of damages resulting from negligence or willful breach of contract.

The supreme court of Alabama in Daughtery v. American U. Teleg. Co., 75 Ala. 168, 51 Am. Rep. 435, says with reference to the supposed distinction between cipher messages and those so briefly and obscurely expressed that no one can understand them but the sender and receiver; we can perceive no reason for a different rule as applicable to the two classes.

Recently an effort was made to induce the Alabama court to review its decisions in above case, (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Way, 83 Ala. 542,) but the court adhered to its former decision.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee sued the appellant in the circuit court of Escambia county, in case, for damages for its failure to transmit and deliver a telegraphic message in cipher. The suit resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $688.88, and therefrom the defendant telegraph company appeals.

The declaration alleges as follows: "That the Western Union Telegraph Company, a corporation, the defendant, on the 12th day of December, 1887, was engaged in the business of transmitting telegraphic messages between Pensacola, Florida, and New York, in the state of New York, and in the delivery thereof to other cable and telegraph companies for transmission to Liverpool, England, where the said plaintiff had a regular merchant-broker or agent, to wit: one A. Dobell, through whom the plaintiff negotiated, by means of such messages, the sale in Europe of cargoes of lumber and timber, the plaintiff being then and there a timber and lumber merchant at the city of Pensacola. That on said day the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, and the defendant received from him at its office in the city of Pensacola, and undertook to transmit, and cause to be transmitted, and it was its duty to transmit, and cause to be transmitted, to the said A. Dobell the following cipher message: 'Do-bell, Liverpool: Gladfulness—shipment—ross—bonheur—luciform—hanewort—margin,' which the said Dobell would have understood, and the plaintiff intended to be an offer of a cargo of lumber and timber from said port of Pensacola for sale through the said Dobell in Europe, and the said Dobell would have sold the same for the plaintiff on the terms of said offer at a profit to the plaintiff of $1,200, but the defendant failed and neglected to send the said message in violation of its duty to the plaintiff, and to the plaintiff's loss of $1,200," and therefore he sues, etc.

At the trial the plaintiff, over the defendant's objection, was permitted to testify, in establishment of the damages claimed, that he had to sell his cargo of lumber in Europe upon the market for the best price he could get, which was fifty-two shillings a load, and which amounted to $630.84 less than the price at which he offered same for sale in the message failed to be sent. The overruled objection of the defendant to this testimony was, that the damage sought to be shown thereby was too remote, and was not in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the alleged making of the contract for the transmission of said message. To this ruling the defendant excepted, and it is assigned as error. The question presented is, What is the proper measure of damages to be recovered of a telegraph company holding itself out to the service of the public for hire as the transmitter of messages by electricity, upon its failure to transmit or deliver a message written in cipher, or in language unintelligible except to those having a key to its hidden meaning. As this question has heretofore been passed upon by this court contrary to the views we find it impossible to become divested of, and, as we think, contrary to the great weight of the well-reasoned adjudications, both in this country and in England, we take it up with diffidence that finds no palliative in the fact that the decision heretofore was by a divided court. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros. 23 Fla. 637. In that case the majority of the court, while approving the following well-established rule first formulated in reference to carriers of goods in the cause celebre of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341; "Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damage which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be either such as may fairly and substantially be considered as arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it," hold that it has no applicability to the contracts of telegraph companies for the transmission of messages, and that such companies may be justly considered and treated as standing alone a system unto itself. The reasoning leading to this conclusion is as follows: "The common carrier charges different rates of freight for different articles according to their bulk and value and their respective risks of transportation, and provides different methods for the transportation of each. It is not shown here that the defendant company had any scale of prices which were higher or lower as the importance of the dispatch was great or small. It cannot be said, then, that for this reason the operator should be informed of its importance, when it made no difference in the charge of transmission. It is not shown that if its importance had been disclosed to the operator that he was required by the rules of the company to send the message out of the order in which it came to the office, with reference to other messages awaiting transmission, that he was to use any extra degree of skill, any different method or agency for sending it, from the time, the skill used, the agencies employed, or the compensation demanded, for sending an unimportant dispatch, or that it would aid the operator in its transmission. For what reason, then, could he demand information that was in no way whatever to affect his manner of action or impose on him any additional obligation? It could only operate on him persuasively to perform a duty for which he had been paid the price he demanded, which in consideration thereof he had agreed to perform, and which the law in consideration of his promise and the reception of the consideration therefor had already enjoined on him." The answer to all this is, that the same argument is equally applicable as a reason why the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale should not apply to carriers of goods for hire. The carrier of goods in contracting to carry and deliver deals with the tangible; when he contracts he has in his mind's eye from the visible, tangible subject of his contract what will be the probable damage resulting directly from a breach of it on his part, and so has the other party to the contract with the carrier, therefore, the damage likely to flow from a breach by the carrier can properly be said to enter mutually into the contemplation of both parties to the contract, and it is this mutuality in the contemplation of both parties to the contract of the results that will be likely to flow directly from its breach that really furnishes that equitable feature of the rule that the damages thus mutually contemplated are in fact the damages that the law will impose for the breach. Why? Because, in the eye of the law, the parties having mutually contemplated such damages in going into such contract, those damages can alone be inferred as having entered into their contract as a silent element thereof. The rule in Hadley v. Baxendale is applicable alone to breaches of contract, and formulates concisely the measure of damages for the breach of those contracts that do not within themselves in express terms fix the penalty to follow their breach. In other words, this rule does nothing more than to give expression to that part of the contract which in the eye of the law has been mutually agreed upon between the parties, but concerning which their contract itself is silent. This essential leading feature of the rule, we think, was wholly lost sight of in the discussion of the question in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros. supra, i. e., that the damages provided for under the rule arise ex contractu, and that unless there is mutuality in all the essential elements that enter into or grow out of the contract the whole fabric becomes unilateral and abhorrent in the eyes of the law. The assertion, as a rule of law, that one party to a contract shall alone have knowledge that a breach of that contract will directly result in the loss of thousands of dollars, and that upon such breach he can recover of the other party to the contract all of such, to him, unforeseen, unexpected, unanticipated, non-consented-to damages, seems to us to be a complete upheaval of all the old land-marks in reference to damages upon broken contracts, and the establishment of a new rule that is neither fair, just, nor equitable; and which, if it is to be applied to the broken contracts of telegraph companies, must also, according to every principle of consistency, be applied, under like conditions, to every violated contract where individuals are the contracting parties. The argument in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros., supra, that it was not shown that the telegraph company would have charged more, or used more dispatch, or taken more care, or been aided in any way in the performance of its duty if it had been informed of the contents or purport of the message contracted to be sent in that case, is entirely foreign to the question. In arriving at the rule of law as to the damage that parties to contracts are entitled to, as matter of legal right, upon breach thereof, a consideration of anything that might or might not in fact have prevented the wrongful breach, has nothing to do with the subject whatever. But we are to look to and consider the mutual rights of the parties from the inception of the contractual relations between them down through the contract itself to the breach complained of. One of the primary rights that each party has who is about to enter into a contract with another, a breach of which may result in damage, is to be so situated that he may foresee what direct probable results will reasonably and in the usual course of events follow bad faith, neglect, or other breach upon his part. Why? Not that it will or will not in fact deter him from being delinquent, but that he may, if he will, so act as to guard against and avoid, for his own benefit, the foreseen calamitous consequence, or, that he may, if he does not, be held to have knowingly and willingly subjected himself to the contemplated consequences of his wrong, that, from being foreseen and contemplated, the law will impute his consent thereto.

That the rule in Hadley v. Bazendale, supra, is the one properly applicable to the contracts of telegraph companies for the transmission of messages, has the support of the overwhelming weight of the decided cases, not only as to the numerical strength of the decisions concurring therein, but in the logical soundness of the reasoning upon which their conclusions rest, as will be seen from the following authorities: Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hall, 124 U. S. 444, 81 L. ed. 479; Sanders v. Stuart, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 826; Behm v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 Biss. 181; 23 L. R. A.

Opposed to this array of authorities are the following decisions by divided courts, with the exception of the Georgia and Mississippi cases: Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros., supra; Daughtery v. American U. Teleg. Co. 75 Ala. 163, 51 Am. Rep. 435; American U. Teleg. Co. v. Daughtery, 89 Ala. 191; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Way, 88 Ala. 542; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fatman, 78 Ga. 285, 54 Am. Rep. 877; Alexander v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 66 Miss. 161, 8 L. R. A. 71.

The case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Reynolds, 77 Va. 173, 46 Am. Rep. 715, is also cited as sustaining a contrary rule, but a careful reading of that case will disclose the fact that the conclusions reached are predicated upon a statutory provision in their code. In the case at bar the message that it is alleged the defendant company failed to send was in cipher and contained nothing that would indicate to the defendant's operator whether it contained a criticism upon the "Horse Fair" painting by the great artist Rosa Bonheur named in the message, or whether it related to a matter of dollars and cents. There was no explanation made to the operator as to its meaning or importance, except that the plaintiff said that the word "gladfulness" in the message had a special meaning. What that special meaning was he did not disclose. Under these circumstances all that the plaintiff could rightfully recover for the defendant's failure to send or deliver the message would be nominal damages, or, at most, the sum paid by him as the price of its transmission. It was error, therefore, for the court to admit testimony as to the damage sustained by the plaintiff by the loss of sale of a cargo of timber consequent upon the failure to forward the message.

There is another feature presented in the proofs, aside from all that has been said upon the rule of damages in such cases, that would prevent the recovery had in this case. The plaintiff himself testifies that he received from his agent Dobell in Europe an offer for the cargo of timber. What that offer was is nowhere stated or shown. Then he says: "I decided to make a final proposition, which I did by taking the message to the telegraph office that was not sent, which message when translated was an offer by me of said cargo of timber for sale at fifty-four shillings per load." Then he says that he missed the sale of the cargo at the terms offered by him in his message in consequence of the defendant's failure to send it, and, consequently, had to sell on the market for the best price he could get, which was fifty-two shillings per load. There is not a word of proof in the record to show that his offer contained in the unsent message would ever have been accepted, or that he could ever at any time have sold the timber at the price at which he so offered it, or that it could ever have been sold at any greater price than the one he actually received for same, whether his message had been sent or not. Yet in the face of this state of the proofs damages have been allowed to the plaintiff equal to the difference between a price at which he simply offered his timber for sale, and the price actually received by him for it, without a word of proof to show whether the higher price at which he offered it for sale could ever have been obtained for it or not.

The appellee contends that because of the decision in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros., supra, the question of damages cannot be considered, that, as to this case, it is stare decisis. This doctrine, as we understand it, is properly applicable to decisions furnishing rules of property, and those construing statutes, and to those passing upon the validity of contracts in which investments have or may have been made upon the faith of the adjudication as to their validity, in which cases former decisions upon the same questions will be adhered to, but we do not think this case falls within the rule.

In reversing the former ruling of the court in Hyer Bros. we do not interfere with any vested right, acquired upon the faith of that adjudication, but pass upon the rule of damages, as upon an abstract proposition, to follow the breach of such contracts. Of the erroneousness of the rule as laid down in that case, we are perfectly and clearly satisfied; and, in such case, in determining the propriety of overruling it as a solemn adjudication, we are to be governed largely by a consideration of the results that will likely flow from the enunciation and establishment of the one or the other of the two rules. If, in such case, we conclude that the affirmation of what we deem to be the erroneous rule in that case, will be productive of more far-reaching and harmful results than would follow the disaffirmance thereof, then it becomes our duty to overturn it. And such we think would be the result here. Besides being unilateral and wholly unfair, as we have before stated, we cannot see why, if the protection of the rule in Hadley v. Bazendale, 22 L. R. A.

is to be withheld from contracts with telegraph companies, it should not also be denied in the daily recurring contractual controversies between individuals. To overturn the rule in controversies as between man and man would be such an uprooting of the old land-marks as to make it impracticable to surmise the harmful results that would follow. Entertaining these views, we do not think that the doctrine of stare decisis constrains us to adhere to the rule in Hyer Bros., but think that less harm will follow our return to the well-beaten and familiar track, that furnishes a plain and easily comprehended rule for all contracting parties, be they corporate or individual.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Raney, Ch. J., concurring:

A reconsideration of the question of the measure of damages involved here confirms the correctness of the view expressed in my dissenting opinion in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros., 22 Fla. 649 et seq., and I concur in the opinion of Judge Taylor, that the rule followed in the case mentioned is unfair and ought not to be perpetuated; and, without committing myself further upon the question of stare decisis, my conclusion is that more injury will result in the future from adhering to the rule of the Hyer Case than will accrue to parties to past transactions from changing it, and that the judgment should be reversed. Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 65, and note 1; Wells, Stare Decisis, § 624 et seq.; Chamberlain, Stare Decisis, 19.

Mabry, J., dissenting:

The question of liability to damage for a failure on the part of a telegraph company to send a cipher message is not a new one in this court. Over six years ago this question was deliberately settled here by the decision in the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros., 22 Fla. 682. It is proposed now to reverse this case and my view is that it should not be done. Every question in reference to cipher messages entering into the case now before us was fully discussed and maturely considered in the Hyer Case, and this case has the support of decisions in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia and Virginia. Under the decision in the Hyer Case, there was a remedy for damages for a failure on the part of a telegraph company to send a cipher message when it had for compensation agreed to do so. There is much merit in the rule that where the company holds itself out to the public as a transmitter of cipher messages for pay, it should not be allowed, after receiving the money and agreeing to send the message, to deny its liability for damages resulting from its own violation of duty, on the ground that the message was in cipher and its contents not known to the company when it agreed to send it. This court having planted itself in favor of this rule over six years ago I do not think we should disturb it. I do not see how greater harm will result from adhering to the decision than overruling it.

Rehearing denied.

COMMONWEALTH of Massachusetts
v.

Walter L. GILBERT.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The penalty for selling or offering for sale, or having in possession, any trout which is not alive during the close season, which is imposed by Stat. 1884, chap. 171, § 53, extends to trout artificially propagated on one's own premises, in view of § 26, which declares that such trout may be sold at all times for purposes of culture and maintenance, but not for food during close seasons.
2. The legislature may forbid the sale, offering for sale, or possession during the close season of trout which are not alive, although they were artificially propagated on one's own premises, if such close season is not unreasonable.

R EPORT by the Superior Court for Plymouth County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an indictment charging defendant with the unlawful sale of trout. Judgment for the Commonwealth.

This was an indictment found by the grand jury, charging that the defendant, on the 29th day of March, in the year 1893, did have in his possession, and did offer and expose for sale and did sell one trout, said trout having been taken in this commonwealth, and not then and there being alive.

To this indictment the defendant pleaded not guilty. It was admitted, however, that the defendant did, on the day charged in the complaint, sell one dead trout as therein alleged. The defendant claimed that said trout was one which had been artificially raised, propagated, and maintained by him, and offered to prove facts as to the method of hatching, raising, and maintaining said trout, which also applied to all other trout owned by him, claiming that if he did prove these facts to the satisfaction of the jury, he was entitled to an acquittal on the ground that the statute against selling trout between certain dates applied only to wild trout, or trout that are hatched and grow in a state of nature, without artificial aid in propagating and maintaining them.

The facts which he offered to prove are as follows:

That he is now and for a long time past has been, the owner in fee simple of a tract of land in Plymouth in said county; that a brook runs through this land, and that by means of this brook, he has raised artificial ponds; that he is engaged in the business of artificially cultivating and propagating brook trout for sale; that these trout are his property, and that for several years past he has been taxed for them by the town of Plymouth, upon an assessed value from $2,000 to $5,000 and that the trout sold by him was one artificially cultivated and propagated by him for the purpose of sale.

He further offers to prove that he has been engaged in said business since September, 1869, and was the first person in this commonwealth to engage in artificially cultivating and propagating brook trout for sale as a business.

The defendant further offers to prove that trout cultivated and propagated by him are cultivated, propagated, and maintained by taking the spawn or egg, called ova, artificially from the trout, and placing the egg so obtained in shallow boxes, which have a fine wire netting in the bottom, upon which the ova are laid. These boxes containing the ova are placed in a trough in a hatching house, through which a shallow stream of water, kept at a uniform temperature, is allowed to run; that trout begin spawning by October 15 of each year, and are through spawning by the middle of December; that the eggs hatch in about sixty days from the time of setting the spawn, during which they require daily care to remove all unimpregnated eggs, to prevent the destruction of the fertile spawn; that a further time of about sixty days is required for the yolk sack, upon which the young fish called fry at first subsist to become absorbed, before they need other food, during which time they need constant care and attention; that they are then put in the rearing ponds, where for the first two months they have to be fed four times daily, for the next two months three times, for the next two months twice daily, and from that time once daily, as long as they are kept. When a year old they require to be removed into deeper and larger ponds, where they are grown until they are large enough for the market, which is about January 15 of the following year.

The trout for which the defendant is indicted for selling was one raised and maintained in the way above described.

In the month of January of this year, and for several years past, the defendant has had from five to six tons of trout artificially cultivated and maintained.

During all the time these trout are kept, and until they are disposed of, they are fed upon sheep haslets, minnows, and herring chopped up and prepared for them.

By the process of artificial cultivation and propagation, 95 per cent of the eggs are hatched, while in a state of nature not over 3 per cent hatch; and that trout raised artificially are equal or superior as an article of food to wild trout, and are after the middle of January to the time of spawning a good and wholesome article of food.

The defendant offers to prove that trout will not inhabit water of a higher temperature than sixty-five degrees Fahrenheit; that there are no trout waters open to the public except by consent of riparian owners, and that there is no great pond in this commonwealth in which the public have any fishery rights, which brook trout can inhabit, and that all waters which brook trout inhabit are owned by private persons, or corporations.

The commonwealth did not contest the truth of the facts offered to be proved by the defendant, but claimed that such evidence would furnish no defense against the indictment, and was inadmissible for that purpose. The presiding judge so ruled and excluded the evidence.

The defendant also asked the court to rule, the statutes of this commonwealth provide no penalty against a person for having in his possession and offering and exposing for sale and selling dead brook trout artificially cultivated, propagated and maintained by him in this commonwealth.

If the statutes of this commonwealth impose any penalty upon the defendant for having in his possession and offering and exposing for sale and selling dead brook trout which were kept and confined in artificial ponds upon his premises, and which were artificially cultivated, propagated, and maintained in the manner the defendant offered to prove that his were confined, cultivated, propagated, and maintained, then the statute, so far as it applies or relates to such trout, is unconstitutional.

The court refused to give the rulings as requested. The defendant submitted to having a verdict of guilty returned against him, and the presiding judge reported the case for the determination of the supreme judicial court. If there was error in the ruling of the court, the verdict is to be set aside, otherwise the verdict is to stand.

The statute, under which the defendant claims to make a defense, will not be declared unconstitutional, even if the government is in error on all preceding points and though this statute bears more heavily on him than may seem needful.

Com. v. Clapp, 5 Gray, 97.

Mr. T. E. Grover, for defendant:

A legislative act is to be construed according to the intent of the legislature. The intent is the essential, the vital part of a statute, and to reach the intent, its meaning may be extended beyond the precise words used, to the reason or motive upon which the legislature proceeded.

Cleveland v. Norton, 6 Cush. 384; Stanield v. Raymond, 4 Cush. 816; United States v. Fisher, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 358, 2 L. ed. 304.

The statute is a penal one, and in derogation of a common-law right, and should, therefore, for both reasons, be construed strictly, and so, if possible, as not to interfere with that right.

The statute was passed, not to impair or destroy the right of property, but to protect it, by "encouraging the cultivation of useful fishes."

Title to Stat. 1869, chap. 384.

It sought to increase the fish supply so that the public might obtain a cheap and healthful article of food.

Burnham v. Webster, 5 Mass. 268; Turner v. Nye, 14 L. R. A. 487, 164 Mass. 579; Com. v. McCurdy, 5 Mass. 324; Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 249; Turner v. Nye, 14 L. R. A. 487, 164 Mass. 585.

Preventing the defendant from selling his trout for a portion of the year does not increase the supply, or benefit the public, although that may be the result with those of natural cultivation and growth.

When the Statute of 1869, chap. 384, went into effect, which was July 12 of that year, there was no one engaged in artificially raising trout as a business, for the defendant, who was the first to engage therein, did not begin until the September following, and consequently such a case as is here presented could not have been in the mind of the legislature, for the facts which distinguish it from any case which could then have arisen did not exist. To hold that even section 53 above cited was intended to apply to such case as this would reverse its intent, and instead of encouraging the cultivation of useful fishes, its effect would be to restrain it.

Hall v. State, 20 Ohio, 14; Platt v. Union Pac. R. Co. 99 U. S. 48, 25 L. ed. 424; Sewall v. Jones, 9 Pick. 414.

Defendant's property in his trout exists independent of the statute. He holds them by a common-law right as he holds other property. They are kept confined upon his own premises and within his immediate power. They are his property as the fowls kept in his yard are his property. The distinction as to ownership between his trout and the unconfined trout, although such trout may have a legal owner under the statute, is the same as that between the duck he raises and the wild duck that is found in the waters upon his land.

Fleet v. Hegeman, 14 Wend. 46; Decker v. Fisher, 4 Barb. 592; Post v. Kreisler, 108 N. Y. 112.

A statute of New York provides that "no person shall catch or take any oysters," etc. The court of appeals held that that act did not apply to persons taking their own oysters out of their private lots or beds.

People v. Hazen, 121 N. Y. 813. See also People v. Fishbough, 184 N. Y. 598; United States v. Sheldon, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 119, 4 L. ed. 199; Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 146, 3 Am. Dec. 89; State v. Lovell, 23 Iowa, 804; People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 390, 8 Am. Dec. 243; Jackson v. Collins, 3 Cow. 89; Cheapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 152; Keith v. Quinney, 1 Or. 364.

If it should be held that the defendant, under the facts he offered to prove, committed a criminal offense within the intent of the statute, then the question is presented,—Is the statute creating that offense, so far as it applies to this case, constitutional?

Declaration of Rights, arts. 1, 10, 12.

As applied to this case, the statute under which the defendant is indicted may be declared constitutional when applied to the protection of fishes in which the public have a common right or interest, as distinguished from private ownership, and unconstitutional when applied to the private property of a citizen in which the public have no such right or interest.

Wellington, Petitioner, 16 Pick. 95, 26 Am. Dec. 631; Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381; Com. v. Clapp, 5 Gray, 100; Com. v. Hitchings, Id. 482; Warren v. Charlestown, 2 Gray, 84; Cargill v. Power, 1 Mich. 359.

Within what limits does the constitution permit the legislature to interfere with, restrict, or regulate the use of private property? This power may be divided into three general classes: (1) The power of taxation; (2) the right of eminent domain; (3) the police power.

The legislature might require the defendant to put upon the trout he sells, or offers for sale, during the prohibited time, some mark or device, so they could be distinguished from wild trout, while, it would be an excess of power to prevent their sale during that time altogether. If the legislature has the power to prevent the defendant from selling his trout during a part of the year, it may, upon the same principle, prevent their sale for the entire year, and thus its power would extend to total prohibition.

Com. v. Huntley, 15 L. R. A. 839, 156 Mass. 236; Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679; Miller v. Horton, 10 L. R. A. 116, 152 Mass. 547; Com. v. Perry, 14 L. R. A. 325, 155 Mass. 117; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53.

The constitutional limit of interference with private property is this: private property, when employed in business, only comes within the control of the police power, if the question of public protection is not involved, when that property is affected with a public interest. Judge Cooley divides these cases into four classes:

1. Where the business is one the following of which is not of right, but is permitted by the state as a privilege or franchise.

2. Where the state on public grounds renders to the business special assistance by taxation or otherwise.

3. Where for the accommodation of the business some special use is allowed to be made of public property, or of a public easement.

4. Where exclusive privileges are granted in consideration of some special return to be made to the public.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. chap. 16, §§ 6, 746; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 125, 24 L. ed. 77, 84; Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 394.

Defendant's business of raising trout does not come within these enumerated cases.

Neither does it come within the police power found in the maxim of the common law, sic utere tuo, ut alienum non ledas.

Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84; Com. v. Teuksbury, 11 Met. 57.

Fishery rights, like the right to use navigable streams for boating, etc., are subject to legislative regulation because they are public rights, but such regulations cannot be carried to the extent of taking away a riparian owner's right, or depriving him of the use of his own property. He has the exclusive right of fishing along the banks, the exclusive control of the land, and whatever is affixed to the soil growing in the water to the middle of the stream, if his land is bounded by the stream, is absolutely his.

Com. v. Tiffany, 119 Mass. 304; Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 446; Vinton v. Welsh, 9 Pick. 91; Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 199, 16 Am. Dec. 386.

Section 26 declares that the owner of fishes artificially cultivated or maintained shall not sell them, i. e. fishes artificially cultivated or maintained, for food at seasons when their capture is prohibited by law; but there is no time when the capture of such fishes is prohibited by law, on the contrary, the statute expressly provides that he may take such fishes in his own waters at pleasure. There being, then, no limit as to the time of capture, there can be no limit as to the time of sale.

Denbow v. State, 18 Ohio, 11.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are two questions in this case, namely, whether the defendant's act was within the true meaning of the statute forbidding the sale of trout; and, if so, whether the statute is constitutional.

1. The defendant contends that the penalty imposed by Pub. Stat., chap. 91, § 53, for selling trout, does not extend to the sale of trout which have been artificially propagated and maintained. Whatever force this contention might have if section 53 stood alone, a reference to other sections of the same chapter, and to the history of this legislation, makes it clear that such trout are not exempted. The chapter contains many provisions for the protection of trout and other useful fishes, and among them are those for the encouragement of their artificial propagation and maintenance. No question is made that section 53 is applicable to all other protected trout except such as have been artificially propagated or maintained; as, for example, to trout found in such small or great ponds and such streams as are specially protected by the provisions of sections 10, 12, 14, 23, 24, 27. By section 26 it is provided that "fishes artificially propagated or maintained shall be the property of the person propagating or maintaining them; and a person legally engaged in their culture and maintenance may take them in his own waters at pleasure, and may have them in his possession for purposes properly connected with said culture and maintenance, and may at all times sell them for these purposes, but shall not sell them for food at seasons when their capture is prohibited by law." A close season for trout was fixed by section 51, which has since been changed by Stat. 1884, chap. 171. Section 53, by its terms, imposes a penalty upon every person who "sells or offers or exposes for sale or has in his possession a trout," except alive, during the close season. Statutes have long existed restricting the modes of taking trout, but the first provision making their sale punishable is found in Stat. 1869, chap. 384, § 23. This, after modifications in Stat. 1874, chap. 186, and Stat. 1876, chap. 221, § 1, was re-enacted in Pub. Stat., chap. 91, § 53. The object of all these statutes was to protect and preserve the trout. The same statute which first forbade their sale also contained the provisions upon which the present statute is founded, to encourage their artificial propagation and maintenance. In order to make the protection of the trout more effectual, it was deemed necessary by the legislature to punish the sale, during the close season, of all trout except those which are alive. This was probably on account of the difficulty in distinguishing between trout which had been artificially propagated or maintained and other trout. On the construction contended for by the defendant, the law could not be so well enforced. In view of the provisions of section 26, it seems to us plain that the penalty imposed by section 53 extends to artificially propagated trout.

2. Nor have we any doubt that the statute is constitutional. The importance of preserving from extinction or undue depletion the trout and other useful fishes in the waters of the commonwealth has been recognized and illustrated in many familiar statutes and decisions from an early time. Such protection has always been deemed to be for "the good and welfare of this commonwealth," and the legislature may pass reasonable laws to promote it. Such laws are not to be held unreasonable because owners of property may thereby to some extent be restricted in its use. It has often been declared that all property is acquired and held under the tacit condition that it shall not be so used as to destroy or greatly impair the public rights and interests of the community. Many illustrations might be cited where such restrictions on the use of property have been held valid. But the cases are familiar. The limitation is that the restrictions must not be unreasonable. The legislature may "make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant to this constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this commonwealth." Const. chap. 1, § 1, art. 4. The legislature may forbid the catching or selling of useful fishes during reasonable close seasons established for them; and to extend the prohibition so as to include such as have been artificially propagated or maintained is not different in principle from legislation forbidding persons from catching fish in streams running through their own lands. The statute under consideration falls within this power. Com. v. Look, 108 Mass. 452; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 84, 85; Com. v. Tewkesbury, 11 Met. 55, 57; Cole v. Eastham, 133 Mass. 65; Ridout v. Knor, 143 Mass. 368, 2 L. R. A. 81; Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 1 Am. Rep. 94, 97 Am. Dec. 82; Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10, 19 Am. Rep. 140.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Allen CAMERON

v.

PITTSBURGH & LAKE ERIE R. CO.,
Appt.

(157 Pa. 617.)

Condemnation of a strip of land across a farm for canal purposes does not divide the farm into two parcels for the purpose of estimating damages for the construction of a railroad across one of them although such strip is taken in fee and the canal is abandoned and the fee to such strip acquired by third persons.

(October 28, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lawrence County, in favor of plaintiff upon an appeal from an assessment by viewers of damages for a strip of land appropriated by defendant for a right of way. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. D. B. & L. T. Kurts, for appellant:

In the compensation of damages for land taken by a railroad company, the law has regard only to the tract of land through which the railroad is located, considered as a whole, and not to the person of the owner.

Advantages accruing to an adjoining but separate tract, owned by the same person, but not cut by the railroad, cannot be taken into consideration in assessing damages for the property actually taken.

Harrisburg & P. R. Co. v. Moore, 4 W. N. C. 532.

Whenever the commonwealth took land for permanent use under the Internal Improvement Acts of April 11, 1825, February 26, 1826, April 9, 1827, and similar acts, and constructed and operated a canal on it, she acquired an estate in such land in perpetuity and may dispose of the same in fee.

Western Pennsylvania R. Co.'s App. 99 Pa. 155; Wyoming Coal & Transp. Co. v. Price, 81 Pa. 156, citing Com. v. McAllister, 2 Watts, 190; Haldeman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 50 Pa. 425; Craig v. Allegheny, 58 Pa. 477; Robinson v. West Pennsylvania R. Co. 72 Pa. 816; Potts v. Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. 119 Pa. 278.

We find nothing in the statutes securing or reserving to such owners, whose lands were divided by the canal, a right of way over it; and even if there was, such right would at most be an easement in the land held in fee by the commonwealth or its grantee and in this case would not avail the plaintiff in his claim, for the reason that the defendant's appropriation invades neither the parcel of land west of the canal, nor such right of way or easement in the land formerly occupied by the canal, and therefore the injury, if any, suffered by the plaintiff is but indirect and consequential—and for which there could be no recovery in this case.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lippincott, 116 Pa. 472; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541.

Two distinct tracts of land connected only by means of a way, whether private or public, cannot be treated as one in the assessment of damages.

Pennsylvania Co. for Ins. v. Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. 151 Pa. 384.

Messrs. Dana & Long for appellee.

Sterrett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1891 the defendant company appropriated a strip of land for railroad purposes, extending northerly across the easterly end of plaintiff's farm. On appeal from award of viewers, this issue was formed for the purpose of determining the amount of his damages; and on the trial thereof the railroad company contended that he was not entitled to recover for the injury or depreciation of the westerly end of the farm, containing eighty-five acres, because it is a separate and distinct tract from that through which its road passes. The facts upon which this contention is based are as follows: Over sixty years ago the farm in question was bisected by the Beaver Division of the Pennsylvania canal, in the construction of which the commonwealth acquired title in fee to the strip of land taken for canal purposes. Afterwards that title passed to persons other than the plaintiff or those through whom he acquired title to his farm, so that he has never owned the strip formerly occupied by the canal bed and its banks. That improvement crossed the farm in a northerly direction, leaving about thirty-four acres on the easterly, and eighty-five acres on the westerly, side thereof. For the purpose of furnishing convenient communication between the two parts of the farm, a bridge was built over the canal, and thereafter maintained by the commonwealth and her successors in title while the canal was in operation. On the trial of the issue, testimony tending to show the extent to which the farm as a whole, including the portions east and west of the old canal, was depreciated by defendant company's appropriation of said strip for railroad purposes, was offered and received by the court under exception. The learned judge also instructed the jury, in substance, as recited in the eighth and ninth specifications, that, notwithstanding the fact that the farm was cut into two pieces by taking the strip in fee for canal purposes, its identity was not destroyed, but the two pieces of land, one on either side of the canal, continued to constitute the farm, just as they did before the commonwealth entered and appropriated the NOTE.—The above case is an excellent illustration of the rule for determining what constitutes a single tract in estimating damages caused by condemnation.

The essential character of the property and its uses is clearly made the test although it consists of two parts entirely separated by property of third persons. See on this point some similar cases in note to Leroy & W. R. Co. v. Ross (Kan.) 2 L. R. A. 217.

strip for canal purposes; that, for the purpose of assessing the damages sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the taking by defendant company, the two pieces are to be considered as one farm, the same as though the commonwealth had not taken the strip in fee. In brief, the single question involved in all the assignments of error is whether the learned judge was correct in taking that view of the law. There is no controversy as to the facts upon which that question depends. An outline of the principal facts has already been given. The others are in entire harmony with those already stated. They all point to the conclusion that the lands in question constitute, as they did before the construction of the canal, one single farm, the entirety of which was not affected by that improvement or anything else, except as to the quantity of land taken therefrom by the commonwealth. So far as the testimony shows, the farm has always been held, occupied, and cultivated as one tract of land. There is little, if any, significance in the fact that, in the deed by which plaintiff acquired title, the parts lying on either side of the canal are separately described by metes and bounds, one bounded on the west by the easterly line of the canal, and the other on the east by the westerly line of the canal. It was a convenient way of excluding the commonwealth's property. It was never contemplated by the legislation under which the canals were constructed that the appropriation of a strip through or across any farm should have the effect of converting one single farm into two separate and distinct farms or tracts. To hold that it had that effect would be a very narrow, as well as unwarranted, construction. Without further comment, we are clearly of opinion that the learned judge was right in holding that plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for the injury or depreciation of the entire farm, embracing the part west, as well as that east, of the old canal. The authorities relied on by the defendant stand upon their own peculiar facts. They are not applicable to the undisputed facts of this case.

Judgment affirmed.

Re Estate of Richard B. BAILY, Deceased.

Elizabeth JACKSON, Appt.,

v.

J. Mitchell BAKER.

(156 Pa. 634.)

1. The relation of co-sureties jointly and severally liable for the default of their principal as to each other is such that each is a principal for one half the amount recoverable for such default and a surety for the other half.
2. A legacy from a surety to his co-surety jointly and severally liable with him for the principal's default, is subject to deduction

NOTE.—The relation to each other of sureties jointly and severally liable is illustrated in an unusual way by the above case of a legacy from one to the other which has been assigned to a third for the proportionate share of the legatee of the amount the estate of the testator is compelled to pay upon such liability although the legacy is assigned to a third person before any payment is made by the surety.

APPEAL by exceptant; one of the residuary legatees of Richard B. Baily, deceased, from a decree of the Orphan's Court for Chester County overruling exceptions to the master's report, approving the action of Baily's executors and directing as to the proper distribution of the estate. Reversed.

The testator, Baily, and Francis Worth were sureties on the bond of Ebenezer Worth, a guardian for certain minors. The guardian became insolvent and left the state, a new guardian was appointed and a balance found to be due the estate from the old guardian, which was directed to be paid to him either by the guardian or his sureties. Meanwhile Baily had died leaving a will by which he gave a legacy to his co-surety, Francis Worth. Baily's executors paid the whole amount of the deficiency in the account of the principal in the guardian's bond, and Francis Worth assigned his legacy to defendant in this action. The exceptant to the executor's account sought to raise the question of the validity of the payment made by the executors of the amount due on the guardian's bond, and also sought to compel a contribution toward such amount from the legatee to the co-surety.

The facts and contentions of the parties fully appear from the following portion of the auditor's report:

The third exception is as follows:

"The payment of $3,681.96 to Cloud Pyle, guardian, is erroneous and should be reduced one half."

The facts upon which the payment is based are as follows: In the year 1878 Ebenezer Worth was appointed by the orphans' court of Chester county guardian of Jesse Anna Phipps, a minor, and upon March 14, 1878, he filed his bond as guardian in the sum of $12,000 with Francis Worth and Richard B. Baily as sureties. He subsequently became financially embarrassed; his property was sold by the sheriff; and he left the state, and now resides in Barton county, Missouri. At or about the same time, Francis Worth, his brother, and co-surety upon the bond with Mr. Baily, executed and delivered to David M. McFarland and Paschall Worth a deed of trust of all his real and personal estate and has been since that time insolvent and without property of any kind. After the insolvency of both Ebenezer and Francis Worth, Richard Baily assumed charge of the estate of the minor, became the custodian of such investments as the guardian had made, collected the money thereon and made payments to the ward. After the death of Richard B. Baily, Ebenezer Worth, on October 23, 1890, filed his final account as guardian, showing a balance due his ward of $3,592.16 and pe-person. See, as to set-off against legatee, Koons v. Mellett (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 231, and note; also Fiscus v. Moore (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 236.

tioned the court to be relieved from the trust as guardian aforesaid. On October 28, 1890, the court ordered and directed that he be discharged from the duties of his appointment "upon the money due as shown by his account being paid to his successor by him or his sureties" and on the same day, upon the petition of the minor, appointed Cloud Pyle successor of the said Ebenezer Worth as guardian of the said Jesse Anna Phipps. The balance due as shown by his account together with interest thereon, amounting to $3,681.96 was paid by the executors of Richard B. Baily deceased, to Cloud Pyle, the new guardian, on March 25, 1891, for which payment Mr. Pyle executed a release. Before payment was made the executor required Mr. Pyle to make demand upon Francis Worth for his one half of the indebtedness on the bond, and made a similar demand themselves, which demands were refused by Worth for reasons given. Upon suit being threatened by Pyle, the executors, under the advice of their counsel, paid the full amount under protest. By a statement furnished by the executors to Francis Worth, on January 17, 1891, it appears that of the amount paid $945.32 is the proceeds of investments left in Mr. Baily's hands by Ebenezer Worth, and that the balance or $2,736.64 is the true amount which the sureties were called upon to make good, of which amount the one half or $1,368.32 belongs to Francis Worth to pay. In reply to the demand of the executors Mr. Worth replied that Richard Baily had in his lifetime assumed to pay the full amount due on the bond, and had "a number of times" said to him, "Thee will never have any of it to pay." He further informed the executors that he had sold the legacy bequeathed to him by Richard B. Baily, deceased to J. Mitchell Baker. Francis Worth is entitled under the will of Mr. Baily to receive a legacy of $4,000, bequeathed to him in the following terms: "I, Richard B. Baily, authorize the persons hereinafter named . . . paid to each in person. Francis Worth four thousand dollars." This legacy he sold and assigned on October 3, 1890, to J. Mitchell Baker, the consideration money having been paid on October 6, 1890, and on the first-named date the executors signed a written acceptance of notice of said assignment attached thereto. The consideration named in the assignment is the sum of one dollar, and other good and valuable considerations. Mr. Worth, the legatee, testifies that at the time of the execution of the assignment, Mr. Baker, the assignee, knew that he (Worth) was a co-surety with Richard B. Baily upon the bond of Ebenezer Worth. Mr. Baker, on the other hand, is equally positive that he did not. At least one of the executors knew of the existence of this bond when they signed the acceptance of notice for Mr. Baker, and those who did not, discovered the fact very soon after. The executor, who was in a position to have the earliest and best information on the subject, was called upon by Mr. Baker before he paid the money, but after the execution of the assignment, and was encouraged by that gentleman to purchase the legacy. "Said it was all right, if he had the money would buy it himself." On the 13th of October, 1890, Mr. Baker secured from Francis Worth and Samuel P. Webb a bond of indemnity in which "they covenant and agree that the said J. Mitchell Baker shall receive, by virtue of his assignment of the legacy aforesaid, the sum of thirty-eight hundred dollars, and if the said sum shall be subject to set-off, deduction, or diminution in the hands of the executors of the said Richard B. Baily, deceased . . . they will pay and make up said deficiency to the said J. Mitchell Baker." The above constitutes a history of the facts surrounding this credit, and the auditor has been compelled to give them somewhat in detail in order that the controversy over the payment may be fully understood. That controversy raised three questions for the consideration of the auditor, viz.:

1. Was the payment by the executors a proper one?
2. Can the executors set off the one half due on the said bond by Francis Worth against his legacy of $4,000 dollars, or
3. Is J. Mitchell Baker entitled to receive, by virtue of his assignment, the full amount of the legacy, less the collateral inheritance tax?

The last two questions will be passed upon by the auditor in his report on distribution; the first is properly raised to the exception filed, and must be determined here. Two widely different reasons were urged before the auditor in support of this payment. Counsel for the executors say that the bond being joint and several, Ebenezer Worth, the principal, and Francis Worth, the co-surety, being insolvent, demand having been made upon them, after demand upon Francis Worth for payment, and suit having been threatened against the estate of Richard B. Baily, the executors were justified and it was their duty in order to save costs to the estate to make payment. Counsel for J. Mitchell Baker, the assignee of the legacy, to guard against a conflict of interests between his client and the executors in the distribution of the legacy, urges as a reason for allowing the payment that the legacy to Francis Worth was given in lieu of all debts due from Worth to the estate, and relying upon the statements of the testator to Dr. Warren and others, argues that Mr. Baily intended to release Francis Worth from all liability on the bond, and to assume the entire indebtedness himself. Counsel for the executor views the situation with his wonted equanimity, and is satisfied that the item should be reduced one half, and so long as his clients and the other legatees under the will are not called upon to pay it, is indifferent whether the executors or J. Mitchell Baker shall lose it. The auditor adopts the first reason given, and sustains the payment on the ground presented by the counsel for the executors. There can be no doubt about the liability of this estate for the entire suretyship. The bond is joint and several; the principal and co-surety are both insolvent; the amount of the indebtedness upon the bond had become fixed by the filing of the guardian's account, and its confirmation by the court and demand having been made by the newly appointed guardian and suit threatened, there was no possible way for the executors to avoid payment of this debt. The payment was compulsory, in that it was of a claim which they could not legally resist. "A payment is deemed to be compulsory when the party making it cannot legally resist it." 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 5, notes; Aldrich v. Aldrich, 56 Vt. 324, 48 Am. Rep. 791.

"A surety who has paid money for a guardian, which the latter owed upon his bond, and which the surety is bound to make good, is not obliged to wait for judgment or execution, but by paying without them, undertakes the burden of showing that he was actually bound to pay. Fishback v. Weaver, 84 Ark. 569." 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 5, notes.

This claim having been paid by the executors, a surcharge of one half the amount so paid would result either in throwing the responsibility of the payment upon the executors personally and making them liable for the amount of such surcharge, or in making them volunteers to the extent of the payment of Worth's one half, and thereby establishing the relation of debtor and creditor between the executors and Francis Worth in the distribution of his legacy, compelling them to become the claimants for reimbursements from the legacy, and to successfully contest their rights as against other claimants or lose the payment. The auditor is not prepared, nor do the facts require that he should go to either length in passing upon this exception. While it is true the executors should have consulted counsel before accepting notice of the assignment of the Worth legacy to Baker, and while one of the executors at least had some knowledge as to Francis Worth's liability on the bond, nothing was done or left undone by them which in any manner increased the liability of the estate upon this bond or relieved Francis Worth from the payment of his one half thereof. The signing of the acceptance of notice did not in the slightest degree change the relations of all the parties, to wit, Worth, Baker or the executors. If the assignment takes precedence of the claim for contribution, it does so not by reason of any act of the executors, but because it was executed and delivered prior to the payment by the executors to Pyle of the amount claimed to be due from Worth. The assignment was complete without the acceptance of notice, and at the time of their signing, it was not in the power of the executors to defeat it. To the auditor it seems clear that the evidence discloses no act either of omission or commission on the part of the executors which would warrant him in placing upon them personally the burden of one half of the payment of $3,681.96, excepted to, nor does it seem right or equitable that they should be compelled to contest their right to reimbursement in the distribution. The auditor prefers rather to treat the credit as a proper payment by the executors in behalf of the estate, a payment made in the discharge of their duty, and from which there was no escape. If, therefore, the auditor is right in his conclusions the contest over the legacy of Francis Worth must be between the estate of Richard B. Bailly for contribution, and J. Mitchell Baker as assignee of that legacy; and if the estate is not entitled to contribution as against Mr. Baker, then the estate and not the executors must lose the amount. One other question only raised by this exception should be answered. It is as to the right of Francis Worth to receive this legacy over and above his indebtedness to the estate. In allowing this credit the auditor finds no facts which would justify him in saying that the testator intended to give to Francis Worth the legacy over and above his liability and indebtedness on the guardian's bond, nor in finding that a release of that indebtedness was proven.

Francis Worth is entitled to a legacy of $4,000 under the will of Mr. Bailly. This legacy he sold and assigned to J. Mitchell Baker, on October 3, 1890, and upon the same day the executors accepted notice of the assignment. On the 18th of October, 1890, Mr. Baker secured a bond of indemnity from Francis Worth, with Samuel P. Webb as surety, on which they covenant to pay and make up any deficiency, to Mr. Baker, which may exist or arise with said legacy by reason of any deduction or diminution in the hands of the executors.

On March 25, 1891, the executors paid to Cloud Pyle, guardian of Jesse Anna Phipps, the sum of $3,681.96, being the amount due upon a bond given by Ebenezer Worth, a former guardian, and upon which Richard B. Bailly and Francis Worth were co-sureties, and jointly and severally both. The executors claim the right to set off the one half due on said bond by Francis Worth against his legacy of $4,000 in their hands, and J. Mitchell Baker claims the legacy by virtue of his assignment.

The right of the executors to set-off claimed must depend upon the proper application of the principles relating to contribution, and the time when that contribution can be enforced.

"The right of contribution arises between sureties when one has been called upon to make good the principal's default, and has paid more than his share of the entire liability, and the right does not arise until that surety has paid more than his share of the debt." Adams, Eq. *269; Wood v. Leland, 1 Met. 387; Bispham, Eq. §§ 328-330; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 1, (text-book series) *120.

Payment must have been compulsory; that is one which the surety could not resist. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 5, note.

Payment in the case was made by the executors to Cloud Pyle on March 25, 1891, and in that payment was included the one half due by Francis Worth upon the bond. The right of contribution, therefore, arose at that time, and the set-off was complete against Francis Worth's claim for his legacy. If this were a claim by Worth himself, or by his creditors, this set-off would be effectual, for the creditors of Worth would be in no better situation than Worth himself. But can the interest of a prior bona fide purchaser for value, without knowledge or notice of this set-off, be affected by it? It seems clear to the auditor that it cannot.

It is a fact not seriously controverted, and the auditor so finds, that Baker was a bona fide purchaser for value of this legacy prior to March 25, 1891, and without notice of any claim for defalcation or set-off, everything in the testimony points to an honest and fair assignment of the legacy to an innocent party for value. Whatever Francis Worth may have known, or feared, or suspected in regard to his right to claim this legacy as against his contingent liability on the guardian's bond, there is no evidence that he communicated these fears or suspicions to Mr. Baker, or gave the latter cause to doubt the merit of his claim. It is true Mr. Worth testifies that at the time of the execution of the assignment, Mr. Baker knew that he (Worth) was a co-surety with Richard Baily upon the bond of Ebenezer Worth. This is denied by Mr. Baker, but whether true or false, such knowledge was not sufficient to put Mr. Baker upon guard or inquiry, particularly in the light of the subsequent acts and silence of the executors themselves. The mere fact that Baker knew of the existence of the bond, if true, could not raise a presumption against the bona fides of the assignment to him, because it was not the bond, but its payment of more than their share by the executors, that created the right of set-off against Worth.

Worth's title in the legacy was complete and perfect at the time of the assignment. He had an absolute, indefeasible interest, capable of assignment, and liable for seizure for his debts. Whatever rights Worth and the executors had in this legacy were fixed and determined by the assignment of the legacy to Baker and notice thereof to the executors. Baker's interest in the legacy is exactly that of the legatee himself, as it stood affected by countervailing equities at the time of the assignment. He took it subject to every defense that would be valid between the original parties, but to no defense that was not valid and subsisting at the time the executors received notice of the assignment. It would be most inequitable and unjust to permit the executors to make any defense against the assignee, which, at the time of the assignment of the legacy or notice of it, they could not have made against Worth himself.

Another fact not to be lost sight of in adjusting the rights of these parties is that no negligence nor default appears in the conduct of Baker. He took every precaution to inform himself of the real situation by the original parties, and their relations to each other. His course was that of a prudent, cautious man, desirous of ascertaining all the facts relating to the legacy, and of protecting himself from all loss. Before he paid the money on the assignment he called upon Mr. McFarland, the executor, who was in a position to have the best information upon matters pertaining to the estate, and was told by that gentleman "it (the legacy) was all right," if he had the money "would buy it himself." All three of the executors signed an acceptance of notice of the assignment before Baker paid the money, and no intimation was given by any of them that the full amount of the legacy was not due from the estate of Worth; in fact, those of the executors who knew of the guardians' bond did not believe that Worth's liability thereon could be set off against his legacy, and acted upon that presumption. Advice of counsel, if asked, might or might not have changed their views, but as the advice was not asked these views remain firmly fixed. No warning reached Mr. Baker from them that Worth was co-surety upon a bond with Richard B. Baily, that that bond would eventually have to be paid by the estate, and that when paid the executors would claim to set off the one half thereof against Francis Worth's legacy. This silence on the subject, whether proceeding from ignorance of the fact, or mistake as to their legal rights, would effectually bar them from setting up that defense after the assignee had parted with his money on the faith of that silence.

The silence of two of the executors and the language of one was in effect a declaration to Baker of no set-off and they are estopped from setting up any defense which existed at the date of such declaration. Baker had a right to rely upon the statement of one of the executors that "the legacy was all right," and upon the silence of all of them as to any defalcation or defense. If he was misled thereby in purchasing this legacy; if he took it upon the faith of these representations and loss occurs,—it must fall upon those whose acts occasioned the loss, for it is a well-established principle that where a loss must fall upon one of two innocent persons it shall be borne by him whose act occasioned it.

Mr. Baker, therefore, being a bona fide purchaser for value, prior to the right of contribution, and without notice of any defalcation or defense upon the part of the executors is entitled to take this legacy by virtue of his assignment and it will be awarded to him in the distribution.

Exceptions were taken to this report which were overruled by the court, and the exceptant appealed with the following assignments of error:

1. In dismissing the exception that the auditor erred in allowing the payment to Cloud Pyle, guardian, as a proper credit.

2. In dismissing the exception that the auditor erred in awarding to J. Mitchell Baker, assignee of Francis Worth, the full amount of the legacy bequeathed to Francis Worth.

3. In dismissing the exception that the auditor erred in awarding any sum whatever to Baker.

4. In dismissing the exception that the auditor having awarded Baker $3,914, should have surcharged the executor with that amount.

5. In not reducing the sum awarded to Baker to the extent of Francis Worth's share of the amount due on the guardian's bond.

6. In not treating the claim made by Baker as the claim of Francis Worth.

Messrs. Charles H. Pennypacker, Warren W. Hole and Butler & Windle, for appellant:

This estate should have been protected against any liability whether contingent or absolute.

Mr. Thomas W. Pierce, for appellee:

The legacy and the claim for contribution are not due in the same right. While Mr. Baker, as assignee of the legacy, would be liable to such abatements as the legacy was subject to at the time of assignment, he could not be made liable for debts of the assignor, created or accruing after the assignment was made and notice given.

The failure of Mr. Worth to pay such claims as might arise between him and the executors, after he had parted with his right to the legacy, cannot affect the assignee, whose rights are determined as of the time of the assignment.

Keim v. Muhlenberg, 7 Watts, 79.

McCollum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Richard B. Bailly and Francis Worth were cosureties, jointly and severally liable for the default of their principal, and in their relation to each other each was a principal for one half the amount recoverable for such default, and a surety for one half of it. If either was compelled to pay the whole amount, his rights and remedies against his cosurety for the half were the same as against their principal for the whole. Croft v. Moore, 9 Watts, 451; Mosier's App. 56 Pa. 76, 93 Am. Dec. 783; Hess's Estate, 69 Pa. 272; and Wright v. Grover & Baker Sewing Mach. Co. 32 Pa. 80. If a surety gives a legacy to his principal, the latter cannot recover it from the estate of the former until he has satisfied, or furnished indemnity against, the demand for which the testator was his surety. Ross v. McKinny, 2 Rawle, 226. If the debt of the principal has been paid by the surety or his estate, such payment may be relied on to satisfy or reduce the amount of the legacy, and this is so although the payment was made by the estate after proceedings for the recovery of the legacy were instituted. Beaver v. Beaver, 23 Pa. 167. It is clear, therefore, that in a proceeding by Worth for the collection of the legacy to which he was entitled under and by virtue of the will of Richard B. Bailly the estate could deduct therefrom the amount it was compelled to pay by reason of his default as the testator's cosurety. It was thought, however, by the learned court below that, as Baker purchased the legacy before the payment was made by the estate, such payment was not available as a partial defense to his claim for the whole of it, and in accordance with this view it, less the collateral inheritance tax, was awarded to him. In support of this decree it is urged that when Worth transferred the legacy the estate had no demand against him which was applicable to it, nor equity for the protection of which the executors could withhold from him the whole or a part of it, until indemnity was furnished, or his liability as cosurety was discharged. We think this contention, to the extent that it denies the existence of such an equity in the estate at the time of the transfer, is unsound. It fails to give proper effect to the relation between co-sureties, and to duly consider the rights and liabilities which spring from it. Prima facie this relation is established between two persons when they unite with a third in an obligation for the payment of his debt, and by this act they become, as we have already seen, his sureties for the whole debt, and sureties of each other for half of it. If their principal fails to pay his debt, and the co-sureties pay it in equal proportions, he becomes their debtor, and their liabilities to each other as such are discharged; but if one of them is compelled to pay the whole debt he is entitled to contribution from his co-surety, and may enforce it by an action of assumpsit, or by subrogation to the rights of the creditor. While the action for it cannot be maintained until default and payment, as above stated, it is nevertheless true that the right to have and the liability to make contribution inhere in the transaction by which the sureties were jointly and severally bound for the debt of their principal. In Agnew v. Bell, 4 Watts, 31, Kennedy, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is certainly too well established now to be questioned that where any one or more of those who are cosureties have had to pay, as such, the debt of their principal, or any part thereof, and he is unable to reimburse it, the loss arising therefrom must be borne equally by all of them. Hence has arisen the right to contribution. This right has been considered as depending rather upon a principle of equity than upon contract; but it may well be considered as resting alike on both for its foundation, for although generally there is no express agreement entered into between joint sureties, yet from the uniform and almost universal understanding which seems to pervade the whole community that from the circumstance alone of their agreeing to be and becoming accordingly cosureties of the principal they mutually become bound to each other to divide and equalize any loss that may arise therefrom to either or any of them, it may with great propriety be said that there is at least an implied contract. Deering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 2 Bos. & P. 270; Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. Jr. 160. This liability between sureties to contribution in case of loss through the inability of their principal to pay being known to them at the time of their becoming sureties, may well be considered a great, if not the main, inducement in many instances to their becoming such." It is therefore incorrect to say that the estate, before payment of the principal's debt, had no equity against the testator's cosurety and legatees which would enable it to withhold payment of the legacy until it was indemnified, or the inability of such co-surety to pay one half of that debt in case of the principal's inability to pay it was discharged. It clearly had such an equity which in a suit by Worth for the legacy would have been to the extent mentioned available as a defense. This equity was not destroyed, nor the defense founded upon it affected, by the assignment of the legacy to Baker. He acquired by his purchase such right to the legacy as his assignor had, and this right, as we have seen, was qualified by the estate's equity against the latter as co-surety of the testator. The learned counsel for the appellee concedes in his printed argument that "if the decedent was surety for Worth, and that relation existed at the time of the transfer, the legacy would be abatable by the amount subsequently paid by the estate, or the legacy might be held to await the determination of the liability of the estate." It seems to us that this concession is fatal to the appellee's claim, because in the relation of cosureties established between Baily and Worth there was an implied promise by each to the other to pay one half of their principal's debt in case of his inability to pay it, and, as they were jointly and severally bound for such debt, their relation to each other for half of it was that of principal and surety. In the acceptance by the executors of notice of the assignment there is nothing prejudicial to the interests of the estate, and we fail to discover anything in the evidence which prevents the residuary legatees from successfully asserting on distribution its rights to the deduction claimed. We therefore sustain the second, fifth, and sixth specifications of error, and overrule the first, third, and fourth.

Decree reversed, and record remitted to the court below, with instructions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

John WILSON et al., Appts.,
v.

PEOPLE of the State of Colorado, to the Use of PUEBLO & ARKANSAS VAL-LEY R. CO.

(.....Colo.....)

1. A bond given by an officer does not extend the obligation imposed upon

NOTE—Liability on official bond for loss of money by theft or bank failure.

The main case holds that in the absence of statute, the clerk of a court is not liable on his bond for loss of money through failure of the bank, where it was deposited, if he used due care.

him by law, unless by force of constitutional or legislative provisions; but his duty and liability as to moneys coming into his hands is measured by the law of bailment.

2. The loss of money deposited by a clerk of court in a bank of reputed solvency, acting as a prudent man would, will not make him liable on his bond to pay over moneys that come into his hands.

(November 22, 1893.)

There appears to be some conflict of authority as to the liability on an official bond for loss of money, some cases holding that there is no liability for money lost through failure of the bank in which the money was deposited by the officer where there was no negligence on his part; as where a surr-

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Fremont County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability on the official bond of the clerk of the district court for the loss of money which had been placed in his possession pending condemnation proceedings, and by him deposited in a bank which became insolvent. Reversed.

Statement by Goddard, J.:

This case was submitted without suit upon the following agreed statement of facts: "(1) The defendant John Wilson was, during the time hereinafter stated, and is now, the duly appointed and acting clerk of the district court of Fremont county, Colorado, and the defendants S. W. Humphrey, C. S. Topping, and J. H. Harrison are the sureties on his official bond as such clerk, a true copy of which, with the indorsements thereon, is herewith attached. (2) At various times during the year 1887 the plaintiff, the Pueblo & Arkansas Valley Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Colorado, and then constructing a line of railroad through Fremont county, paid over to the defendant Wilson, as such clerk, various sums of money fixed and determined by the judge of the said court by rules entered in certain condemnation proceedings for right of way then pending in the said district court, as deposits pending the ascertainment of damages, and to authorize the company to take possession of the right of way pending the proceedings, as provided by section 6 of the Eminent Domain Law (Code Civ. Proc. p. 77). These moneys were deposited by the defendant Wilson, as received, to his credit as clerk of said court, in the Exchange Bank of Canon City, a private, unincorporated banking institution then doing business at said Canon City, in said county, and reputed to be solvent. (3) The said Exchange Bank has failed in business, and its depositors have not been paid. The condemnation proceedings referred to have all been concluded by final decree vesting title in the railroad company, and, of the moneys so paid by the railroad company to the said clerk as deposits, the company is entitled to receive back as an excess of the amount so deposited, over and above the amounts finally awarded as damages, the sum of $2,997.20, which has not gate lost private money paid into court and deposited by him in a bank that failed, where his bond only required faithful performance of his duties. People v. Faulkner, 107 N. Y. 477, reversing 88 Hun, 607.

And in York County v. Watson, 15 S. C. 1, 40 Am. Rep. 575, which was an action against a county treasurer for accounting, he was not liable for loss of money through failure of the bank where he had deposited the same. The common-law doctrine of liability only applies as his bond is, "that the duties shall be well and truly performed." See State v. Moore, infra, and cases following holding the bond to strict liability in bank cases.

So where money was stolen from a county treasurer's office, and the bond was, "shall faithfully execute the duties of the said office," and, "shall pay," the latter clause was held to be only one of the enumerated duties. Albany County Supra v. Dorr, 25 Wend. 440, affirmed in 7 Hill, 588, by a divided court.

But a collector's bond "for the faithful execution of his duties" where the statute made it his duty "to pay," and also made the bond a lien on all the property of the obligors, and the statutory provisions seemed clearly to regard him as a debtor for the amount to be collected, is not released because money is stolen from his dwelling without fault. In this case the plea failed to allege the identity of the money lost and this was regarded as another ground of the decision. Muzzy v. Shattuck, 1 Denio, 238.

And in a similar case a bond "to pay over promptly" and "exercise all reasonable diligence and care in the presentation and lawful disposal of all money" was held not to make the treasurer liable. Ross v. Hatch, 5 Iowa, 149. See Taylor Dist. Twp. v. Morton, infra, for other cases of failure of bank.

And the same was held, where a county treasurer was assaulted and robbed in his office, the bond being, "shall well and faithfully attend to the duties of said office and perform all things required." Cumberland v. Pennell, 69 Me. 357, 81 Am. Rep. 284.

And where a tax collector was robbed while on the road to pay over money that he had collected, and the bond was "well and truly and faithfully keep safely," he was held to be more than a mere bailee for hire but that it was a question for the jury whether he was negligent or not in going unarmed; and if he used the highest care, vigilance, and diligence and was robbed by irresistible force, it would be a valid defense. State v. Houston, 79 Ala. 576, 56 Am. Rep. 59, 83 Ala. 361.

So where a receiver of public money was robbed by confederate forces without fault on his part, the liability on his bond was only that of bailee, and he was only required to use due diligence, as against a public enemy. United States v. Thomas, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 337, 21 L. ed. 89.

Now under Act 1868, 14 Stat. at L. 44, Rev. Stat. §§ 1059, 1062, the court of claims may determine the claim of any disbursing officer for loss of funds while in the line of his duty.

Cases holding liability to be absolute in loss by robbery and theft.

The prior decisions of the United States courts, however, held the law of bailment does not apply, and that a bond to "keep safely" is not discharged by theft from the officer without his fault. United States v. Prescott, 44 U. S. 3 How. 578, 11 L. ed. 784.

So where the bond was "to pay over and account," United States v. Dashiell, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 182, 18 L. ed. 319.

So where the bond was to "discharge all the duties" and an act of congress made it his duty to pay it over. Boyden v. United States, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 17, 20 L. ed. 527.

So on a similar bond where notes received for duties were canceled but were stolen before being put in the postoffice for return, the liability still existed for whatever loss might be sustained by the government through danger of their being put in circulation again, and damages for inconvenience as lost vouchers. United States v. Morgan, 52 U. S. 11 How. 154, 13 L. ed. 643.

And the liability on an official bond is not released by reason of confederate agents taking the money from the officer where his delay in transmitting occasioned the loss. Bevans v. United States, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 58, 20 L. ed. 531.

So a postmaster's bond is not discharged where he turned over the money in his hands to the confederate government, and no force was used. United States v. Keebler, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 83, 19 L. ed. 574.

been paid. (4) Query, are the clerk and the sureties on his bond liable to the railroad company for the payment of this money? If yes, let judgment be entered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants for the amount aforesaid, with interest from date of suit; if no, let judgment be entered for the defendants for costs."

The bond above referred to and indorsed upon this statement is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that we, John Wilson, as principal, and S. W. Humphrey, C. S. Topping, and J. H. Harrison, are held and firmly bound unto the people of the state of Colorado in the penal sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars, for the payment of which sum of money we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents. Sealed and dated this twenty-fourth day of May, 1886. The condition of the above obligation is such that, whereas, the above-bounden John Wilson has been appointed clerk of the district court of the third (3d) judicial district of the state of Colorado, within and for the county of Fremont, now, therefore, if the said John Wilson shall faithfully perform all the duties of said office as prescribed by law, that he will punctually pay over to the person legally authorized to receive the same all moneys that may come into his hands by virtue of the said office, and shall deliver to his successor in office all records, books, papers, and other things belonging to his said office, then the above obligation to be null and void; otherwise, to remain in full force and effect. John Wilson. [Seal.] S. W. Humphrey. [Seal.] C. S. Topping. [Seal.] J. H. Harrison. [Seal.]"

The court below rendered judgment upon this agreed statement of facts in favor of appellees, and against the appellants, for the sum of $3,180.36 and costs. To reverse this judgment the defendants bring the case here on appeal.

Messrs. Macon & Macon and D. P. Wilson for appellants.

Mr. Charles E. Gast, for appellee:

And where a receiver of public money was murdered and robbed, his bond was held bound for the loss, as he is not a bailee, but an insurer. United States v. Watts, 1 N. M. 563.

It should be noticed that United States v. Thomas, 35 U. S. 15 Wall. 327, 21 L. ed. 89, makes an important exception to these federal cases and seems to weaken their authority, while the Act of Congress of 1866 above cited changes the law as to federal officers.

The liability on an official bond is also held in many of the states to be not that of bailee, but that it is fixed by the bond or by the bond taken in connection with the statutes imposing liability and is not released by robbery of the officer. State v. Nevin, 19 Nev. 162; State v. Lanier, 31 La. Ann. 423.

So where the money was stolen from a safe furnished by the county. Jefferson County Comrs. v. Lineberger, 3 Mont. 231, 35 Am. Rep. 462; Halbert v. State, 22 Ind. 125; Hennepin County Comrs. v. Jones, 18 Minn. 199; Redwood County Comrs. v. Tower, 23 Minn. 45.

So when the money was stolen from a safe in which it had been placed by the officer. State v. Clarke, 73 N. C. 255; State v. Blair, 76 N. C. 78; Thompson v. Trustees of Township 16, 30 Ill. 90; Morbeck v. State, 23 Ind. 88; Pine Island Board of Education v. Jewell, 44 Minn. 427.

Or stolen from his house or office. New Providence v. McEachron, 38 N. J. L. 339; McEachron v. New Providence, 35 N. J. L. 522; Hancock v. Hazard, 12 Cush. 112, 59 Am. Dec. 171; State v. Harper, 6 Ohio St. 607, 67 Am. Dec. 363; Com. v. Comly, 3 Pa. 372.

And the same was held in Taylor Dist. Twp. v. Morton, 37 Iowa, 550, in which the bond was to "discharge the duties of said office" and the statute made it his duty "to hold all moneys" "and pay out the same," differing in the form of the bond from Ross v. Hatch, 5 Iowa, 149.

And the same was held in Linville v. Leininger Twp. Trustees, 72 Ind. 494, and Rock v. Stinger, 38 Ind. 346, but was not the point involved in these cases.

And in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 120 Ill. 606, it was held that a bond of a township treasurer is not released on account of theft of the money without his fault, but that case was one on a bond of an officer of a corporation.

And the same rule of liability has been applied 22 L. R. A.

where an officer deposited money as treasurer in a bank that failed, and the bond was "to perform all the duties," and the statute made it his duty to "deliver to successor all money." State v. Moore, 74 Mo. 418, 41 Am. Rep. 322.

And the same degree of liability was imposed, but the bond is not disclosed in the case. State v. Powell, 67 Mo. 395, 29 Am. Rep. 612; Nason v. Directors of the Poor, 123 Pa. 445.

So where the bond was for "lawful disposal" a deposit was held unlawful as contrary to statute forbidding a loan, and the record does not disclose whether the deposit was in his name or as treasurer. Lowry v. Polk County, 51 Iowa, 50, 38 Am. Rep. 118.

So an officer who deposits as treasurer money in a bank that fails is liable on a bond "to faithfully discharge the duties" and "properly and legally disburse or pay all moneys." Omro Supra. v. Kaime, 39 Wis. 466.

And the same was held on a similar bond where the statute required the officer "to account" and the deposit was made in the name of the commonwealth. Bally v. Com., 20 W. N. C. 221.

And the liability is fixed by a bond providing "to account for and pay over" where a clerk of a court deposited money received by him on sale of land. Havens v. Lathene, 75 N. C. 505.

So when the bond is in ordinary form. Inglis v. State, 61 Ind. 212.

And State v. Croft, 34 Ark. 550, holds that the "failure to keep the money" is a breach of the bond, where the money is lost through failure of the bank.

And the liability on the bond is absolute where a receiver deposited in a bank that failed, and the deposit was made through an arrangement to obtain surety on his bond, divesting him of the sole power of drawing the funds. White v. Baugh, 3 Clark & F. 44, 2 Bligh, N. S. 181.

So in Rowley v. Fair, 104 Ind. 189, it is held that a township trustee is required to account to the township, irrespective of any casualty by which the money may be lost, but that question was not involved in the case. L. L.

A bond with an unqualified condition to account for and pay over moneys enlarges the implied obligation of the receiving officer, and deprives him of offenses which are available to an ordinary bailee.

The performance of an express contract is not excused by reason of anything occurring after the contract was made, though unforeseen by the contracting party, and though beyond his control.

Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn, 26; Ford v. Coleworth, L. R. 4 Q. B. 134.

The bond in this case has the effect of such a special contract.

Muskegon County*, 32 Mich. 132, 20 Am. Rep. 637.

Goddard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the agreed facts it appears that the money was lost through no fault of the clerk. He deposited the money in a bank of reputed solvency, as clerk of the court, and in doing so acted as prudent men ordinarily do with their own funds. The judgment of the court below must therefore be upheld, if at all, upon the principle that the conditions of his official bond imposed upon him an absolute obligation to pay the money when required, and that no exercise of diligence on his part will exonerate him from such obligation. Such is the contention of counsel for appellee, and for its support he relies on the case of United States v. Prescott, 44 U. S. 3 How. 578, 11 L. ed. 734, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1844, as the leading case, and several other cases in that court, as well as some decisions by state courts, which approve and follow the doctrine therein announced. In these cases in which the rule contended for was sustained, the court had under consideration the liability imposed by the official bond of receivers of public money, and the conclusions arrived at were influenced largely by considerations of public policy. Whether the case at bar is sufficiently analogous to these cases to bring it within the rule therein announced it is unnecessary to decide, since the Supreme Court of the United States, in a later case, has very much modified, if it has not in effect overruled, the extreme doctrine laid down in its earlier decisions. In the case of United States v. Thomas, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 387, 21 L. ed. 89, Justice Bradley, in speaking of the leading case of United States v. Prescott, supra, said: "After reciting the condition of the bond, the court adds, with a greater degree of generality, we think, than the case before it required: 'The obligation to keep safely the public money is absolute, without any condition, express or implied; and nothing but the payment of it, when required, can discharge the bond.' This broad language would seem to indicate an opinion that the bond made the receiver and his sureties liable at all events. . . . And as the money in the hands of a receiver is not his, as he is only custodian of it, it would seem to be going very far to say that his engagement to have it forthcoming was so absolute as to be qualified by no condition whatever, not even a condition implied in law." And after reviewing the principal cases relied on by appellee he further said: "So much stress has, in almost every case, been laid upon the bond as forming, either directly or indirectly, the basis of a new rule of responsibility, that it seems especially important to ascertain what are the legal obligations that spring from such an instrument. The learned judges in the great generality of the remarks made in some of the cases referred to, with regard to the liability of a receiving officer, and especially of his sureties, by virtue of his bond, have evidently overlooked what we conceive to be a very important and vital distinction between an absolute agreement to do a thing and a condition to do the same thing, inserted in a bond. In the latter case the obligor, in order to avoid the forfeiture of his obligation, is not bound at all events to perform the condition, but is excused from its performance when prevented by the law or by an overruling necessity. And this distinction, we think, affords a solution to the question involved in this case. . . . The condition of his [an official] bond is collateral to the obligation or penalty; it is not based on a prior debt, nor is it evidence of a debt; and the duty secured thereby does not become a debt until default be made on the part of the principal. Until then, as we have seen, he is a bailee, though a bailee resting under special obligations. The condition of his bond is, not to pay a debt, but to perform a duty about and respecting certain specific property which is not his, and which he cannot use for his own purposes."

While the majority opinion distinguished the case under consideration from those preceding it, we think the reasoning of the learned justice who wrote the opinion logically and necessarily overrules the doctrine laid down in the former cases. If, as therein announced, the obligation imposed by the bond is absolute, and the officer was an insurer of the money received by him, how could the manner or cause of its loss affect his liability? Wherein is he more at fault when overpowered by one or two robbers than he is when intimidated by an army? Justice Miller refused to concur in the majority opinion because it did not frankly overrule those cases and abandon the doctrine on which they rested, and in his dissenting opinion stated his personal views upon the question as follows: "When the case of United States v. Dashiell [71 U. S. 4 Wall. 182, 18 L. ed. 319], came before the court I was not satisfied with the doctrine of the former cases. I do not believe now that on sound principle the bond should be construed to extend the obligation of the depositary beyond what the law imposes upon him, though it may contain words of express promise to pay over the money. I think the true construction of such a promise is to pay when the law would require it of the receiver, if no bond had been given; the object of taking the bond being to obtain sureties for the performance of that obligation. Nor do I believe that, prior to these decisions there was any principle of public policy recognized by the courts, or imposed by the law, which made a depository of the public money liable for it, when it had been lost or destroyed without any fault of negligence or fraud on his part, and when he had faithfully discharged his duty in regard to its custody and safe-keeping."

We believe the true rule is that a public officer who receives money by virtue of his office is a bailee, and that the extent of his obligation is that imposed by law. That, when unaffected by constitutional or legislative provisions, his duty and liability is measured by the law of bailment. If a more stringent obligation is desired, it must be prescribed by statute. That his official bond does not extend such obligation, but its office is to secure the faithful and prompt performance of his legal duties. Instances where the constitution and statutes of this state have increased the common law liability of certain officers were recognized by this court in two cases, at least. In the case of State v. Walen, 17 Colo. 170, it was held that by constitutional provisions the state treasurer was made absolutely liable for state moneys received by him; and in the case of McClure v. La Plata County Comrs. (Colo.) 84 Pac. Rep. 768 (recently decided), it was held that a county treasurer, by virtue of the statute regulating the duties of his office, was a bailee with express and extraordinary liability. No constitutional or statutory provision in this state imposes a more stringent obligation upon a clerk of the district court than that imposed by the common law. This rule of common law, as laid down by Justice Story, is as follows: "In respect to property in the custody of the officers of a court, pending process and proceedings, such officers are undoubtedly responsible for good faith and reasonable diligence. If the property is lost or injured by any negligent or dishonest execution of the trust, they are liable in damages. . . . The degree of diligence which officers of the court are bound to exert in the custody of the property seems to be such ordinary diligence as belongs to a prudent and honest discharge of their duties, and such as is required of all persons who receive compensation for their services." Story, Bailm. § 620. It is insisted in argument that its doctrine refers only to specific property, and does not apply to money deposited with the clerk, because it is assumed that he holds the relation of debtor to the fund, and therefore may use it as his own. To this we cannot agree. The money received by him is a trust fund, and a conversion of it to his own use would constitute embezzlement, and subject him to a criminal prosecution. The defendant Willson, as appears from the agreed facts, did not mix the money in question with his own funds, or in any manner treat it as his own. He deposited it in the bank as clerk, and the bank had notice thereby that the money so deposited was held by him in his official capacity. At the time of the deposit the bank was in good standing. We think, under the circumstances, he is not chargeable with any fault that should render him or his sureties liable for the loss.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, with directions to enter judgment for defendants.

L. W. SPRATT et al., Appts.,

v.

O. O. LIVINGSTON.

(32 Fla. 507.)

*1. By the Act of Congress passed in 1891, chapter 64, United States Statutes at Large, amending the original and Amendatory Act creating the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, the secretary of the treasury was authorized and directed to appoint the comptroller of the currency a commissioner of said company

*Headnotes by MARRY, J.

NOTE.—The powers and the relation to the corporation of a statutory liquidator substituted for the corporation in order to wind it up are presented above in a somewhat unusual illustration of the sale of the property on execution against the liquidator.

For note on execution or judicial sale of corporate franchise or property necessary to its enjoyment, see Brady v. Johnson (Md.) 20 L. R. A. 737. 22 L. R. A.

for the purpose of disposing of its property and winding up its business. Upon his qualifying by taking the oath and giving the bond prescribed in the Act, the comptroller of the currency, as such commissioner, became invested with the legal title and possession of all the property of said company, and clothed with all the rights and privileges, and required to perform all the duties of the three commissioners appointed under the Amendatory Act of 1874, chapter 349, whose functions ceased upon the appointment and qualification of the comptroller as such commissioner.

2. The purpose, as well as the effect, of the Amendatory Act of Congress making the comptroller of the currency a commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, was to invest him, as such commissioner, with the property, management, and disposition of the affairs of said company for the purposes of liquidation, and he thereby became the statutory substitute and successor of the corporation itself, and not a mere trustee of the bare legal title of its property.

3. G. Instituted a suit of attachment in the state circuit court against the comptroller of the currency, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, to recover for services rendered and money expended by him as agent of said commissioner in winding up a branch business of said company in the state; the commissioner appeared and interposed pleas to the merits of the suit, and after trial, judgment was rendered in favor of G., and real estate in possession of the commissioner was sold under execution emanating from the judgment, and L. became the purchaser at said sale; no objection was made by any depositor or beneficiary of the company to the legal proceedings against the commissioner, and after paying the judgment in favor of G., a balance of the purchase money arising from the execution sale was paid to the commissioner. Held, that L. acquired the legal title to said real estate at said sale, and could recover the same in an action of ejectment against S., who had gone into possession of the property under a contract of purchase from the commissioner, but had refused to comply with the terms of his purchase, and was not entitled to a specific performance of his contract.

4. The possession of real estate by one who enters under an agreement to purchase from the owner, but without paying the consideration price, cannot be adverse until he repudiates the seller's title and asserts his own title to the property.

(November 8, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Duval County in favor of plaintiff, in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate in the city of Jacksonville. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Young, for appellants:

The only title that the defendant in execution had was as trustee, and the trust property could not be seized and sold under an execution against the trustee so as to vest the purchaser with the fee-simple title.

The record shows that the judgment upon which the execution issued was for services rendered by Greeley to the trustee, and it was the personal debt of the trustee.

L'Engle v. L'Engle, 19 Fla. 714; Hackman v. Maguire, 20 Mo. App. 286.

Trust property cannot be seized and sold for the personal debt of the trustee.

He cannot even delegate his power of sale.

Gillespie v. Smith, 28 Ill. 478, 81 Am. Dec. 328; Fuller v. O'Neil, 69 Tex. 349.

Where the vendor himself repudiates the contract, tries to get the tenant of part of the premises sold to attorn to him, and forcibly ejects the purchaser from another portion and commences divers proceedings and suits to oust the vendee and his tenant, it amounts to the same thing in its legal effect as if the purchaser had repudiated the holding under his vendor and brought home to him knowledge that he was claiming adversely to him.

Tyler, Ejectment, 877; Hart v. Bostwick, 14 Fla. 178.

Mr. L. W. Spratt, in propria persona, also for appellants.

Mr. H. Bisbee, for appellee:

The defendant, as commissioner, in this case, stands in the same relation to the depositors of the bank that the board of directors of a corporation do to the stockholders.

He is specially empowered to sell and convey at his discretion, and to make conveyances to purchasers. He is specially empowered to employ agents and to pay them for their services and to pay himself, out of the funds arising from the sale of property, before any distribution is made to depositors.

See Acts of Congress 1873-74, p. 132, and later act now before the court.

The commissioner himself could sell this property voluntarily and pay this judgment out of the proceeds of sale. This being so, it must logically follow that if he don't do it, it could be sold under judgment at law.

Every judgment rendered in this state "shall create a lien and be binding upon the real estate of the defendant or defendants."

McClellan's Dig. pp. 618, 619.

The purchaser under an execution sale takes all the legal title and right of possession and all the interest of the judgment debtor, and he takes it subject to the equities of third parties.

Bird v. Earle, 15 Fla. 453.

An execution sale may transfer a legal title which the defendant held as trustee.

Freem. Executions, § 335, bottom page 554, note 7 citing authorities. See also Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Branch, 59 Ala. 139.

In Giles v. Palmer, 49 N. C. 386, 69 Am. Dec. 756, it was held that on a judgment against the husband, real estate held by him as trustee for his wife could be sold on execution, and that the purchaser on such title could maintain ejectment.

When the judgment debtor can sell and convey a title, then it may be sold on execution at law against him. "It is a statutory conveyance from debtor to creditor."

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

C. O. Livingston brought a suit of ejectment in the circuit court for Duval county, in March A. D. 1889, against L. W. Spratt and W. B. Barnett, to recover possession of a certain lot of land described in the declaration and situated in the city of Jacksonville, Duval county, Florida. A trial of the cause before the court without a jury resulted in a finding and judgment for the plaintiff and the defendants appealed.

To maintain his action the plaintiff first introduced a deed from J. P. Sanderson and wife bearing date February 7, A. D. 1870, conveying to the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company lot eight (8) in block thirty-one (31) as described on the plan of the said city of Jacksonville. This lot embraces the land in controversy in this suit. Next a certified copy of the record of a certain cause in the Duval circuit court where Jonathan C. Greeley was plaintiff and William L. Trenholm, the comptroller of the currency, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company was defendant. This suit was commenced by attachment, the affidavit therein alleging that the defendant Trenholm, comptroller of the currency of the United States, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, was justly indebted to the affiant, Greeley, in the sum of $7,678.88, which sum was actually due from said Trenholm as such commissioner, and that he resided beyond the limits of the state of Florida.

The defendant appeared by attorneys, and filed pleas to the merits of the cause, which, after issue joined, was referred to a referee for decision. After hearing the testimony offered and argument of counsel the referee rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Greeley, against the defendant, William L. Trenholm, comptroller of the currency, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, for the sum of $5,186.77, and costs of suit.

The record shows that Greeley's suit was for moneys paid out by him for costs and expenses incident to litigation over the property held by the defendant, and known as the "Freedman's Savings Bank Building" situated in Jacksonville, Florida, and also for compensation to Greeley for services rendered by him as agent for defendant at Jacksonville.

Following the introduction of this record plaintiff put in evidence a certified copy of an execution emanating from the judgment rendered, and a deed from the sheriff of Duval county on a sale under said execution conveying the said lot eight (8) block thirty-one (81), to the plaintiff in this suit.

A notice of the sale of the Freedman's Bank building at auction by the commissioner was shown, and J. C. Greeley for the plaintiff testified that the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company went into possession of the property sued for in this suit in 1870 and remained in possession until the failure of the bank, and then the commissioners appointed under the Act of Congress went into possession and remained in possession until about the 25th day of March, 1880, when L. W. Spratt became the purchaser at the auction sale; that Spratt got into possession of the portion of the property sued for in this action by the attornment to him of the then tenant and who is his codefendant in this suit, and that he, Spratt, afterwards refused to comply with the terms of sale and refused to surrender possession. He also stated that he was the agent of the commissioners of the Freedman's Bank in the management of its real estate in Jacksonville from March, 1880, to the time of the trial of this suit.

Defendants did not offer to show any paper title to the lot in question but testified that they were present at the sale of lot eight (8), in block thirty-one (81), known as the "Freedman's Bank property," and at this sale and before the bidding began it was announced by the agent of the vendor that there was some defect in the chain of title which the vendor would have corrected in a few days, thirty being named as a limit in which this was to be done and a sufficient title to be made to the purchaser; that the purchaser at the sale was required to make a cash payment of $500 and was then to be let into possession of the premises, the balance of the purchase money to be paid when good title was tendered; that Spratt became the purchaser of said lot and paid in cash the $500, and Greeley, who as agent for the commissioners had been renting the building and collecting the rents, directed the tenants to attorn to him, Spratt, and gave him a key to a vacant room in the building; that Barnett did attorn to Spratt and has ever since recognized him as landlord.

Further, that shortly after the purchase by Spratt, Greeley, as the agent of the commissioners, tried to get Barnett to refuse to recognize Spratt as landlord, and to pay rent to the commissioners, and asserted that Spratt had no right to the possession. Also that said commissioners caused suits to be instituted against Barnett before the county judge of Duval county in August, 1880, to oust him of possession of said lot, and several suits were commenced by said commissioners against Barnett in the circuit court for Duval county in relation to said premises. Certified copies of the record of proceedings in both the county and circuit courts for Duval were offered in evidence by defendants. One was a proceeding in the county court by the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company against W. B. Barnett, delinquent tenant, August 11, 1880, and the decision was favorable to Barnett. Another was by Knox, commissioner, against Barnett, assumpsit for rent, commenced on July 8, 1880, and resulted in a judgment for defendant Barnett. Another was an action of ejectment commenced by Knox, commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company in September, 1882, against Barnett. This action it seems was dismissed on the plaintiff's motion.

Barnett further testified that he had been in the exclusive and continuous occupation of the premises sued for since the 25th of March, 1880, as the tenant of his codefendant, Spratt, and Spratt testified that he had been furnished by the agent of the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, at the time of his purchase, with a list of the tenants and the amount of their rent, and the key to a vacant room in the building, and that he renewed the lease to Barnett and took possession of the vacant room; that sometime in the summer of 1880 Greeley acting as the agent of the commissioners forcibly entered said room and ejected him therefrom; also that the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company had never tendered or caused to be tendered to him a good and sufficient deed to said property.

In rebuttal plaintiff put in evidence a bill filed by Spratt and Barnett on the 6th day of November, 1882, against John J. Knox, commissioner of the said Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, and George Wheaton Deans as administrator of the estate of Jacob Foreman, deceased. The purpose for which this bill was introduced was to show that Spratt and Barnett recognized the relation of purchaser of the property on the part of Spratt and that he was thereby seeking as such purchaser to have the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company to execute a deed to said property by virtue of his said purchase. The allegations of this bill are set out in the case of Knox v. Spratt, 19 Fla. 817. The mandate of this court in the case referred to on a reversal of the decision of the circuit court in refusing to dissolve an injunction therein granted, was also introduced in evidence. An affidavit of Spratt filed May 2, 1884, in a suit then pending in the circuit court for Duval county wherein he was complainant and George Wheaton Deans and John J. Knox, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company were defendants, was also put in evidence. The purpose being to further show that Spratt still recognized his status as purchaser of the property from the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company.

The plaintiff also showed by the sheriff of Duval county that he had paid the balance of the proceeds arising from the sale of the property at execution sale, after satisfying the judgment obtained by Greeley, to the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company.

Counsel for appellants insists here as grounds for reversing the judgment appealed from that the appellee, Livingston, acquired no title whatever at the execution sale under the judgment of Greeley against Trenholm, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, or that he did not acquire from this source such title as will sustain a recovery in ejectment, and conceding such to be the case that Spratt had been in actual, continuous and adverse possession of the parcel of land in controversy for seven years before the institution of the suit.

It is contended, first, that Trenholm was the mere trustee and holder of the bare legal title of the lot, and its sale under execution against him transferred no beneficial interest whatever to Livingston. To understand Trenholm's status to the lot in question at the date of sale a reference to the Act of Congress creating the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, and the amendments thereto is necessary. By Act of Congress approved March 3, A. D. 1865, certain named individuals fifty in number and their successors were constituted a body corporate by the name of "The Freedman's Savings & Trust Company" and by that name could sue and be sued in any court of the United States. The corporations named were the first trustees of the corporation and its business was to be managed and directed by the board of trustees with authority and direction to elect from their number a president and two vice-presidents, and also to appoint such other officers as might be deemed fit. The general business of this corporation was to receive on deposit such sums of money as might be offered by, or on account of, persons who had before the passage of the act been held in slavery in the United States, or their descendants, and to invest the same in stocks, bonds, treasury notes, or other securities of the United States. Provisions were made for the investment of the deposits to be made, and also for the repayment of the same, with interest thereon to the depositors. One of the provisions in the 12th section of the Act is "that no president, vice president, trustee, officer, or servant of the corporation shall, directly or indirectly, borrow the funds of the corporation or its deposits, or in any manner use the same, or any part thereof, except to pay necessary expenses, under the direction of the board of trustees." The board of trustees was authorized to fix the salaries of the president, vice-presidents, subordinate officers and agents of the corporation.

The original Act was amended in 1874, chapter 849, United States Statutes at Large.

The only provisions of this amendatory act necessary to be referred to here are those contained in the seventh section. This section provides "that whenever it shall be deemed advisable by the trustees of said corporation to close up its entire business, then they shall select three competent men, not connected with the previous management of the institution and approved by the secretary of the treasury, to be known and styled commissioners, whose duty it shall be to take charge of all the property and effects of said Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, close up the principal and subordinate branches, collect from the branches all the deposits they have on hand, and proceed to collect all sums due said company, and dispose of all the property owned by said company, as speedily as the interests of the corporation require, and to distribute the proceeds among the creditors pro rata, according to their respective amounts; they shall make a pro rata dividend whenever they have funds enough to pay twenty per centum of the claims of depositors. Said commissioners, before they proceed to act, shall execute a joint bond to the United States, with good sureties, in the penal sum of $100,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties as commissioners aforesaid, and shall take an oath to faithfully and honestly perform their duties as such, which bonds shall be executed in the presence of the secretary of the treasury, be approved by him, and by him safely kept; and whenever said trustees shall file with the secretary of the treasury a certified copy of the order appointing said commissioners, and they shall have executed the bonds and taken the oath aforesaid, then said commissioners shall be invested with the legal title to all of said property of said company, for the purposes of this act, and shall have full power and authority to sell the same, and make deeds of conveyance to any and all of the estate sold by them to the purchasers. Said commissioners may employ such agents as are necessary to assist them in closing up said company, and pay them a reasonable compensation for their services out of the funds of said company; and the said commissioners shall retain out of said funds a reasonable compensation for their trouble, to be fixed by the secretary of the treasury and the comptroller of the currency and not exceeding three thousand dollars each per annum. Said commissioners shall deposit all sums collected by them in the treasury of the United States until they make a pro rata distribution of the same."

There was still a further amendment to the chapter of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company passed in 1881, chapter 64, United States Statutes at Large.

By this Act section 7 of the Amendatory Act of 1874 was repealed, and the secretary of the treasury was authorized and directed to appoint the comptroller of the currency a commissioner who was required to give bond and take an oath faithfully to perform his duties and when the bond was given and oath taken, said commissioner was invested with the possession and legal title of all the property of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company for the purposes of this Act and the Act of 1874, chapter 349, United States Statutes at Large. Said commissioner was also invested with all the rights, prerogatives, and privileges, and required to perform all the duties, that were conferred and enjoined upon the three commissioners under the said Act of 1874, and from and after his qualification as such commissioner, the duties, rights, and authority of said three commissioners should cease and determine; provided, that nothing in the act should in any way impede or delay any case or cases instituted in any court by or against the said three commissioners appointed under the Act of 1874, but every such case should, upon the suggestion of the appointment of the comptroller as commissioner aforesaid, and due entry of the change on the docket of the court in which such cause was pending, be proceeded with in the name of such comptroller in the same manner as if such charge had not been made.

The Act of 1881, chapter 64, also provides "that said commissioner, with the approval of the secretary of the treasury, shall have the right and authority to sell any of the real and personal property of said company at public or private sale, as in his judgment he may deem best, and to buy in for the benefit of the company any property which may be offered for sale to pay debts and liabilities of said company, if in his judgment said property is being sacrificed by such sale, and to make to the purchasers of property sold by him deeds of conveyance for their respective purchases."

Such was the relation of William L. Trenholm, comptroller of the currency, to the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company and its property at the time Greeley obtained judgment against him as commissioner of said company. By Act of Congress, the same power that created the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, he, by virtue of his office of comptroller of the currency, was made a commissioner for this institution with the concurrence of the corporators, and as such was invested with the full title and possession of all of its property for the purpose of closing up its entire business. To this end he had express power and authority to dispose of all the property of the company and to employ such agents as were necessary to assist him in winding up its affairs, and to pay them reasonable compensation for their services out of the corporate funds. The evident design and effect of the Act of Congress in making the comptroller of the currency a commissioner for the institution named were to confer upon him as such the entire and complete management and disposition of the affairs of said company for the purpose of liquidation. He was the statutory substitute and successor of the company for the purpose mentioned. The record discloses the fact that Greeley's suit was to recover for expenditures of money and services rendered by him as agent for such commissioner in winding up a branch business of the company at Jacksonville, Florida, the principal office being in Washington, D. C., and the commissioner residing there.

It is not denied that the title of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company to the property involved in the case before us was vested in the said commissioner at the time Greeley commenced his suit of attachment against him. Spratt had gone into possession of this property under a contract of purchase from the commissioner, and as a consequence is not in a situation to deny his title. The commissioner, when sued at law by Greeley, did not object to the jurisdiction of the court, but interposed pleas to the merits of the cause, and when the property had been sold under execution, accepted the surplus arising from the sale after paying Greeley's judgment. Furthermore, it does not appear that any effort was ever made by any beneficiary of the company to arrest the proceedings at law against the commissioner, nor is the title to the property now called in question by any such person. The question then is, Could the legal title held by the commissioner be sold under execution at law and transferred to the purchaser? It cannot be denied that the title held by the commissioner was coupled with a trust, but that trust was the winding up of the entire business of the corporation. It included the collection of all debts due the company, a sale of all of its property, the payment of all of its debts and necessary expenses in closing up the business, and the disbursement of the remaining funds to the depositors.

Mr. Perry, in his book on Trusts, section 331, says: "As a general rule, the legal estate in the hands of a trustee has at common law precisely the same properties, characteristics, and incidents, as if the trustee were the absolute beneficial owner," and he also states that the trustee may sell and devise the estate held by him, and it may be taken in execution. This is qualified, however, as follows: "But these incidents do not generally interfere with the proper execution of the trust, for all conveyances and all incumbrances made or imposed upon the estate by the trustee, for other purposes than those of the trust, or in breach of the trust, are entirely disregarded by a court of equity, whatever may be the effect of such conveyances or incumbrances in a court of common law." There are authorities maintaining the view urged by counsel for appellee here, that a bare legal title in trust can be sold under execution against the trustee, and that a purchaser at such sale will acquire the title of the trustee, whatever it may be. The cases cited by counsel go to this extent. But there is a conflict in the law on this point, and many authorities hold that if one is the mere holder of a bare legal title for the benefit of another, an execution sale of such an estate against him transfers no interest whatever. If the estate and title of the commissioner in and to the property in question in this suit come within the character of the estates just mentioned, there is serious difficulty in holding upon the weight of authority that it can be taken in execution at law.

But it is further insisted for appellee that as the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company was a foreign corporation doing business in this state, the commissioner, appointed by authority of law to represent and act for it in winding up its business, came within the provisions and spirit of our attachment statutes, and suits could be instituted against him as against the corporation itself on all liabilities properly incurred by him in closing up the business of the corporation, and that for this purpose, to the extent of the powers conferred, the commissioner stood as a corporation sole liable to be sued as a nonresident corporation. Our Statute (chapter 1637, sec. 29; McClellan's Dig. § 22, p. 233), provides that "any company incorporated by any other state or country, or by law of Congress, and having property in this state, shall be liable to be sued, and the property of the same shall be liable to attachment in the same manner as individuals, residents of other states or countries, and having property in this state." If suit of attachment had been instituted in this state against the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, on a valid claim against it while it was the owner of property here, no doubt could exist as to the applicability of this statute to such suit. The supposed difficulty in the case before us is that Greeley's suit was not against the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, but against the commissioner appointed to wind up its business, and for a debt incurred by him in the performance of his duties as such commissioner. We are satisfied from an examination of the Act of Congress and the amendments thereto that the comptroller of the currency, as commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, did not sustain to said company and its depositors the relation of a trustee of a mere naked title for the benefit of the depositors. The original incorporators of this company, denominated trustees, occupied a trust relation to the depositors, yet it is evident that said trustees represented and stood for the corporation itself, and in this respect could sue, and were liable to be sued in the corporate name on all matters connected with the legitimate business of the company. By the amendments to the original act, congress substituted the comptroller of the currency in place of the original trustees for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the institution. As we have before said, he was the statutory substitute and successor of the company for the purposes of liquidation. His status was not that of a receiver of such company under the appointment of a court, nor does the office of an administrator conferred in a foreign jurisdiction properly illustrate his attitude. The views expressed by Chief Justice Waite, in speaking for the court in the case of Relfe v. Rundle [Life Assn. of America v. Rundle], 103 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 387, in reference to the status of a statutory successor of a dissolved corporation, aptly describe, we think, the office and functions of the commissioner in reference to the corporation named and its property. By the laws of Missouri the superintendent of the insurance department of the state government was authorized under certain circumstances to commence proceedings to dissolve insurance corporations organized under the laws of that state. A statute provided that "upon the rendition of a final judgment dissolving a company or declaring it insolvent, all the assets of such company shall vest in fee simple and absolutely in the superintendent of the insurance department of this state, and his successor or successors in office, who shall hold and dispose of the same for the use and benefit of the creditors and policy-holders of such company, and such other persons as may be interested in such assets." A certain insurance company was dissolved by a decree of the Missouri court, and Rundle and wife, policy-holders of the company, commenced suit in the state of Louisiana against said company, its local agent in the city of New Orleans, and a party who had recovered a judgment against it, for the purpose of having the assets in Louisiana of the dissolved corporation declared a trust fund to be applied to the payment of claims of Louisiana creditors and policy-holders. Relfe, who was the superintendent of the insurance department of the state of Missouri, was made a party to the suit in Louisiana on his own motion and then petitioned for the removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, and also filed within time in that court a copy of the record in the state court and gave the security required by act of congress. A motion was sustained to strike the cause from the docket of the circuit court on the ground, among others, that Relfe had no standing in the court, he being a creature of the state of Missouri, without capacity to sue or defend causes in the state of Louisiana. The opinion referred to says that "Relfe is not an officer of the Missouri state court, but the person designated by law to take the property of any dissolved life insurance corporation of that state, and hold and dispose of it in trust for the uses and benefit of creditors, and other parties interested. The law which clothed him with this trust was, in legal effect, part of the charter of the corporation. He was the statutory successor of the corporation for the purpose of winding up its affairs. As such he represents the corporation at all times and places in all matters connected with his trust. He is the trustee of an express trust, with all the rights which properly belong to such a position. He is an officer of the state, and as such represents the state in its sovereignty while performing its public duties connected with the winding up of the affairs of one of its insolvent and dissolved corporations. His authority does not come from the decrees of the court, but from the statute. He appeared in Louisiana not by virtue of any appointment from the court, but as the statutory successor of a corporation which the court had in a legitimate way dissolved and put out of existence. He was in fact the corporation itself for all the purposes of winding up its affairs." It is further said in the opinion: "We are aware that, except by virtue of some statutory authority an administrator appointed in one state cannot generally sue in another, and that a receiver appointed by a state court has no extra-territorial power; but a corporation is the creature of legislation and may be endowed with such powers as its creator sees fit to give. Necessarily it must act through agents, and the state which creates it may say who those agents shall be." So in the case before us congress has vested in the comptroller of the currency as a commissioner all the rights, powers, property, and liabilities of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company for the purposes of liquidation and the estate which he has is commensurate with the powers conferred. He represents the corporation at all times and places in all matters connected with his trust. That the corporation itself was liable to be sued and its property here attached is clear and we think it equally clear that the property in the hands of the commissioner appointed by authority of law to stand for and represent the corporation in matters connected with his duties as such is liable to be reached by attachment. Our attachment laws furnish a remedy against nonresident debtors owning property in this state, and the right of the state through the process of the courts to so appropriate property within its jurisdiction is beyond question. The discussion in the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, on this subject is exhaustive.

The case before us is to be distinguished from one of an ordinary trustee holding the bare legal title in trust for another in this, that the commissioner is invested by legislative authority with all the rights, powers, and liabilities, for the purposes of liquidation, that the original corporation had, and to this extent he is just as liable to suit on matters within the scope of his authority as the corporation itself would have been had it acted, and is made so by legislative authority. No law of trusts is violated by this construction. A general rule applicable to such estates is, that the trustee takes a legal interest and estate commensurate in extent and duration with the object and extent of the trust itself, and a legal interest and estate in him will, if possible, be declared sufficient for the purposes of the trust.

Zabriskie v. Morris & E. R. Co. 33 N. J. Eq. 23; West v. Fitz, 109 Ill. 425; Neilson v. Lagow, 53 U. S. 12 How. 98, 18 L. ed. 909; Packard v. Marshall, 138 Mass. 301; Wilcox v. Wheeler, 47 N. H. 488; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 475. Oftentimes the estate in the trustee has been enlarged or curtailed without regard to the terms of its duration to him in order that the trust created may be accomplished, and in the case before us, although the office of the commissioner is coupled with a trust, this will not conflict with the powers, liabilities, and estate conferred on him by the act of congress.

The other ground of defense relied upon in the trial court, of adverse possession, cannot be maintained. It is clearly shown and not denied that Spratt went into possession of the property sued for under an agreement to purchase it from the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company. The record before us shows that Spratt has persisted in the possession of the property under a claim of right as vendee from said commissioner and has sought in the courts a partial specific performance of the agreement to convey the property to him. It seems that a deed was tendered to him by the commissioner but was declined on the ground that there was a partial failure of title. The right of Spratt to a specific performance was settled adversely to him in 1887 in the decision reported in 23 Fla. 64. From the date of his purchase up to the time of this decision there is no question but that Spratt recognized his possession as that of vendee under his contract to buy from the commissioner. Such a possession was irreconcilable with an adverse holding on his part. Petty v. Mays, 19 Fla. 652; Knox v. Spratt, supra; Hart v. Bostwick, 14 Fla. 167. Counsel for appellants concedes that a vendee in possession under a contract to purchase does not hold adversely to the vendor until there is a repudiation of such a relation between them, but he insists that the efforts of the commissioner and his agents to oust Spratt of his possession converted it into an adverse holding and he can now rely upon it as a defense. The difficulty about this position is that Spratt was unwilling to accept the view that his possession was adverse, but persistently resisted the demands of the commissioner on the ground that such possession was rightful under the agreement to purchase. There is nothing to show that Spratt himself repudiated the relation of vendor and vendee certainly up to the time of the decision in this court in 1887, and the present suit was commenced in 1889.

Upon a review of the entire record we think the decision rendered in this case was correct and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

PENNSYLVANIA R. CO., Pf in Err.,
v.
William GOODENOUGH and Wife.

(.....N. J.....)

In an action by a husband and wife for a personal injury to the wife his contributory negligence will defeat the suit.

(Dixon, J., dissenta.)

(December 4, 1898.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to Mrs. Goodenough which were alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. William S. Gummere, for plaintiff in error:

In all cases where the wife is injured by the joint negligence of her husband and of a third party, the husband's negligence should be imputed to the wife by reason of their marital relationship, and should bar a recovery.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 46; Carlisle v. Sheldon, 38 Vt. 440; Peck v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 50 Conn. 379; Joliet v. Seward, 86 Ill. 402, 29 Am. Rep. 35; Yahn v. Ottumwa, 60 Iowa, 429

*Headnote by REED, J.

NOTE.—Husband's negligence as bar to recovery for wife's personal injuries.

There is apparently some conflict as to the contributory negligence of the husband being imputed to his wife. Some of the cases impute his negligence to her where she is riding in a vehicle with him as driver and is injured, and this is held on the ground of the relation of occupant, and driver and not of husband and wife. Morris v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 22; Carlisle v. Sheldon, 38 Vt. 440; Yahn v. Ottumwa, 60 Iowa, 429.

And where both are guilty of negligence which barred a recovery, it was said that if he was alone guilty his negligence would be imputed to her, in an action by the husband and wife. Peck v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 50 Conn. 379, 14 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 633.

Other cases, however, hold that the negligence of the husband as driver will not be imputed to the wife as occupant of the same vehicle. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Creek, 14 L. R. A. 733, 130 Ind. 139, 49 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 451; Miller v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 128 Ind. 97; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Spilker (Ind.) 55 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 200.

And where the husband and wife were riding in a wagon driven by another and she was killed by the cars, and it was contended that the husband and driver were both negligent, the court held that the contributory negligence of the driver will not be imputed to the wife. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Kutao, 73 Tex. 643.

But the doctrine of imputing the negligence of the driver to the occupant of the vehicle is not within the scope and purpose of this note. The leading case of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, affirming the right to impute such negligence has 23 L. R. A.

At common law, a right of action for a personal tort was not property. It did not pass under the English Bankrupt Acts, which vested all the property of the bankrupt, both real and personal, in his assignee.

Howard v. Crouther, 8 Mees. & W. 602.

It is a mere personal right, has no elements of property, and is not assignable.

Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566; Gardner v. Adams, 12 Wend. 297; North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244.

Whatever may be the case elsewhere, it was not the intention of the legislature of New Jersey to make a right of action of this kind property; or, at least, it did not intend to make such a right of action the property of the wife.

Married Women's Act (Rev. pp. 636, 637), §§ 1-8.

Can, then, a married woman maintain an action in her own name, without joining her husband therein, for an injury done to her?

The Practice Act, § 22 (Rev. p. 851) declares that "in any action by a husband and his wife, for an injury done to the wife in respect of which she is necessarily joined as coplaintiff, it shall be lawful for the husband to add thereto claims in his own right arising ex delicto."

Two things clearly appear from this section:

1. That, in suits of this kind, both the husband and wife must be joined as coplaintiffs; in other words, that the common law still governs such cases, the common-law rule being that "when an injury is committed to the person of the wife, during coverture, the wife been frequently denied and finally overruled in The Bernina, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 53.

There are some cases which impute to the wife the negligence of the husband on the ground that the damages to be recovered are community property, where the wife was hurt by the husband driving into an excavation. McFadden v. Santa Ana, O. & F. Street R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 252, 87 Cal. 404.

But see Nanticoke v. Warne, infra.

And the same doctrine was set forth in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. White, 80 Tex. 202, when the husband had charge of convict cars, but a recovery was had in that case.

Other cases impute negligence of husband to wife without discussing whether it arises from the form of action, or relation of driver, or relation of husband,—as where a wife riding in a wagon with her husband as driver was injured by a railroad train. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Greenlee, 62 Tex. 344.

And where a wife in a carriage driven by her husband was injured by the horse being frightened by a machine in the street, the court says: "The knowledge regarding the disposition of the horse by H. (the husband) is the knowledge of the wife;" but if the husband or wife knew nothing of the vicious character of the horse, and yet his viciousness contributed to the injury, the jury should find for the defendants. Huntoon v. Trumbull, 2 Mo-Crary, 314.

Our conclusions from this would be that in this case the imputed negligence would not affect the case, as the recovery was made to depend alone on the viciousness or good qualities of the horse.

And in Joliet v. Seward, 86 Ill. 402, 29 Am. Rep. 35, where the wife was left holding a team by her cannot sue alone in any case, and the husband and wife must join."

1 Chitty, Pl. * 73.

2. It also clearly appears, from the section referred to, that the husband has a personal interest in the verdict recovered for the wife's injury, because it permits him to add claims, in his own right, arising ex delicto.

That section, Revision, p. 851, provides that "any married woman living separate from her husband may bring suit in her own name for the recovery of damages for any injury done to her person or reputation; and it shall not be lawful for the husband of such married woman to control, discontinue, release, or in any way interfere with such action."

This is an enabling act; it confers upon married women, under certain conditions, a right which, except for this statute, they would not have.

Injuries received by married women who are living with their husbands can only be sued for by the husband and wife jointly, and the common-law right of the husband to control, discontinue, or release the same, still exists.

Beach v. Beach, 2 Hill, 260, 38 Am. Dec. 584; Anderson v. Anderson, 11 Bush, 327; Coolidge v. Parris, 8 Ohio St. 594; 1 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 706, 910-912.

If the common-law right of the husband still exists, there can be no recovery if he contributed by his negligence to bring about the accident which caused the injury sued for.

1 Bishop, Married Women, § 912; Tibbs v. Brown, 2 Grant, Cas. 39.

Mr. Samuel H. Grey also for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel K. Robbins, with Mr. John W. Wescott, for defendants in error:

husband and a blast in the street caused the team to run away injuring her, it was held that if the injury was caused by the negligence of the husband she could not recover, and that question should be submitted to the jury.

The doctrine that negligence of the husband will bar recovery unless the cause of action belongs to her alone, as announced in the main case, but may not where the wife can sue alone, does not seem to have been discussed in the two preceding cases, as in Missouri the right of the wife to such damages is her separate estate. Flori v. St. Louis, infra.

And in Illinois a wife may sue alone for personal injuries. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dunn, 52 Ill. 300.

Other cases hold that contributory negligence of the husband driving a vehicle in which the wife is riding will not bar a recovery by her administrator for damages to the wife caused by the negligence of other parties. The question of interest in the recovery is not discussed in these cases but the fact that suit was brought by the wife's administrator shows that the cause of action belonged to the wife. Hoag v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 111 N. Y. 199.

The same was held in Shaw v. Craft, 87 Fed. Rep. 317, (Ohio) but in that state the cause of action is recognized as separate estate. See Davis v. Guarnieri, infra.

The same was held where the wife sued in her own name. Platz v. Cohoes, 24 Hun, 101, affirmed in 89 N. Y. 219, 42 Am. Rep. 284.

Mere knowledge by husband of defects in a sidewalk over which his wife would cross on an errand, where he failed to warn her, will not bar a 22 L. R. A.

The question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, Sarah Goodenough, was properly left to the jury.

The contributory negligence of the husband (if any) in this case, could not be imputed to the wife.

1. Because "contributory negligence, to defeat a right of action, must be that of the party injured."

2. Had the plaintiff, Sarah Goodenough, been riding with any other person than her husband, or one who was her servant or agent, under like circumstances, the driver's contributory negligence could not be imputed to her.

Bennett v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 36 N. J. L. 225, 13 Am. Rep. 435; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Steinbrenner, supra; Robinson v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 11, 23 Am. A. 143, 129 Pa. 514; Elliott, Roads & Streets (1890), pp. 631, 632, and cases cited.

3. That the driver of the vehicle was her husband, can make no difference in the application of the principle.

None of the authorities, or cases, holding recovery in an action by the husband and wife, as it was not necessarily negligent to cross even with knowledge of the defects. Street v. Holyoke, 105 Mass. 62, 7 Am. Rep. 500.

And the same was held where the cause of action was vested in the husband who sued to recover for loss of time and services of his wife, the court saying that as an abstract proposition it should not be said that it was negligence for a husband to fail to warn his wife of danger in going on a sidewalk, but that he cannot recover for any damages that may result to her if he sees her going to a place where he knows she will probably be hurt and does not warn her. Nanticoke v. Warner, 106 Pa. 373.

And where the right to damages was recognized as separate estate in the wife, the contributory negligence of the husband knowing a building is unsafe will not be imputed to the wife who is injured by the fall thereof. Flori v. St. Louis, 3 Mo. App. 231, affirmed in 69 Mo. 341, 33 Am. Rep. 504.

And contributory negligence of husband in use of drugs purchased for his wife, will not bar an action by her administrator against the druggist causing death; but in this case the cause of action was recognized as separate estate. Davis v. Guarnieri, 45 Ohio St. 470.

And attempting to cross a river about dark in a boat sculled by a blind husband, where there is a lantern on board and they were accustomed to cross the river in that way, the wife acting as guide in directing the course, is not such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery by her administrator where a tug caused her death by negligence. Harris v. Uebelhoefer, 75 N. Y. 169. L. T.

that the contributory negligence of the husband, driving the vehicle in which she was hurt, should be imputed to the wife, in bar of the action, are based upon the relationship existing between them, or on the fact that they were coplaintiffs in the action; while all of the cases assigning any reason for so holding are in direct antagonism to the Bennett and Steinbrenner Cases.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. (1885), pp. 113, 114, and cases cited.

The cases holding that the contributory negligence of the husband should not be imputed to the wife are in harmony with the decisions in this state.

Hoag v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 111 N. Y. 199; Miller v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 128 Ind. 97; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Creek, 14 L. R. A. 733, 180 Ind. 139; Flori v. St. Louis, 8 Mo. App. 231.

The husband's being joined as coplaintiff in this action can have no possible weight in the solution of this question.

The right of the husband to the wife's choses in action, as well as to her other property, real and personal, was extinguished by the Act of 1862 (Rev. "Married Women," pp. 636, 637, § 1-3).

Vreeland v. Schoonmaker, 16 N. J. Eq. 512.

The husband, by virtue of the act, was deprived of the control which he had by the common law. He was prevented from recovering possession of and acquiring title to the personal property of the wife during coverture.

Compton v. Pierson, 28 N. J. Eq. 229; Van Cleave v. Rook, 40 N. J. L. 35.

A right of action growing out of a personal tort to a married woman, is held to come within the description of "property acquired in any manner."

Nor does the husband acquire any substantial interest in the judgment recovered in this suit by reason of being joined as coplaintiff.

There are no facts in this case which would warrant the court in holding that the husband was the servant or agent of the wife, and that his negligent conduct, if any, could be imputed to her on that ground.

The driver cannot be converted into the servant of the passenger, for the single purpose of preventing the passenger from bringing suit against a third party whose negligence has co-operated with that of the driver in the production of the injury. The identification must be so complete that the passenger would not only be debarred from a suit against the proprietor of the coach for the driver's negligence, but would also be responsible to third persons for injuries sustained by the carelessness of the driver in the course of the journey.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by a husband and his wife to recover for an injury to the wife, caused by a collision between the wagon in which they were driving and a train on the railroad of the plaintiff in error. At the trial it was urged by the defense that the husband, who was driving, was negligent, and that his negligence contributed to the wife's injury. The trial justice, however, charged that the negligence of the husband could not be imputed to the wife. This is assigned for error. To ascertain how far the conduct of the husband affects the right to recover in an action of this kind it is essential that the posture of the husband in relation to the suit shall be ascertained. If he is a party interested in the subject-matter of the action, then it follows that he cannot be permitted to recover when his negligent conduct contributed to the creation of the cause of the action. The rule at common law is entirely settled that for a tort to the wife, either ante or post nuptial, the husband must be joined with the wife in an action. Dicey, Parties to Actions, p. 409; 1 Chitty, Pl. 73; Comyns, Dig. title, Baron and Feme (V); Schouler, Husb. & W. 141. Upon the rendition of judgment, the husband has the right to receive the money. Bishop, Married Women, § 913. So completely is the husband identified with the prosecution of the action that he can release the cause of action. Beach v. Beach, 2 Hill, 260, 38 Am. Dec. 584; Ballard v. Russell, 33 Me. 196, 54 Am. Dec. 620; Southworth v. Packard, 7 Mass. 95; Anderson v. Anderson, 11 Bush, 327; Bishop, Married Women, § 912. If the wrong to the wife is inflicted through the connivance of the husband, his conduct is an answer to the action, although he may press the suit. Tybbe v. Brown, 2 Grant, Cas. 39. So his power over the action, and the effect of his conduct upon the result, are entirely settled at common law. There can be no doubt that if his negligence assisted to create the cause of action it would, at common law, be a complete defense to the action. Has this been changed by any legislation in this state? I think it quite clear that it has not. On referring to the act relating to the property of married women (Revision, p. 636), we find that the real and personal property of every married woman, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, shall be her sole and separate property. Personal torts do not create rights of property. The right to sue for such is not assignable. They do not survive the death of the injured person, because, in the language of Lord Ellenborough in Chamberlain v. Williamson, 2 Maule & S. 408: "Executors are the representatives of the temporal property,—that is, the debts and goods of the deceased,—but not of their wrongs, except where those wrongs operate to the temporal injury of the personal estate." The language of the section itself is inapplicable to a right to sue for a tort, for no rent, issue, or profit, in the sense of the statute, can arise out of a tort. Section 11 of the Act provides that she may maintain an action in her own name, and without joining her husband therein, for all breaches of contract, or for the recovery of all debts, wages, earnings, money, and all property which by this act is declared to be her separate property, and she shall have in her own name the same remedies for the recovery and protection of such property as if she were an unmarried woman. If a right to sue for a tort is property, then, by force of this section, the husband was an unnecessary party to this action. Yet section 22 of the Practice Act obviously refers to this class of personal torts, in an action for which both must join. This section provides that in any action by a husband and wife for an injury to the wife in respect of which she is necessarily joined as coplaintiff, it shall be lawful for the husband to add thereto claims in his own right arising ex delicto. This is a copy of section 40 of the common-law Procedure Act of 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. chap. 76), which undoubtedly refers to personal injuries to the wife, in actions to recover damages for which husband and wife must sue jointly.

If any doubt remained in respect to the general rule in this state that the husband must join with the wife in actions for personal injuries to the wife, it would be dissipated by section 24 of the Practice Act, which states the exception to the rule in such terms as to show the existence of the rule itself. This section provides thus: "Any married woman being in a state of separation from her husband, may bring suit in her own name for the recovery of damages for any injury done to her person or reputation; and it shall not be lawful for the husband of such married woman to control, discontinue, release, or in any way interfere with such action, but the same shall proceed and be under the control and direction of said married woman, as if she were a feme sole." So it is perceived that in all instances except when the feme covert is living in a state of separation from her husband he retains his common-law power of control over and interest in the action. The husband has not a mere power to sue for the wife, but he has a power coupled with an interest in the suit. Retaining this control over the suit, and this right to release, and consequently to compromise it for money, he cannot be permitted to create the cause of action by his negligent or fraudulent conduct, and then reap the benefit which this interest in the action confers.

We think the charge in this respect was erroneous, and the judgment must be reversed.

Dixon, J., dissenting:

The plaintiff, William Goodenough, and Sarah, his wife, were riding along a public street across the railroad of the defendant, in a wagon drawn by a horse which was driven by the husband, when a collision between the vehicle and a train of the defendant occurred, and the wife received severe bodily injury. This suit was brought to recover compensation for the injury thus suffered by 22 L. R. A.

the wife, and a verdict was obtained assessing her damages at $2,700, upon which a judgment was rendered that she recover that sum against the defendant. On writ of error to review this judgment, the only serious question presented on the record is whether the trial justice erred in charging the jury that, unless the husband was acting as agent of the wife, his negligence was not imputable to her. It is insisted by the defendant that such negligence should be so imputed, because of the marriage relation, and the legal necessity therefrom arising of joining the husband as a plaintiff in the suit. The argument rests upon the premise that the husband has a legal interest in the cause of action, and in whatever compensation may be recovered, and thence is deduced the conclusion that the husband's contributory negligence must preclude any recovery. I deny the premise.

It must, of course, be remembered that we are not dealing with the damages which a husband sustains by the physical injury of his wife, such as the expenses of her cure, and the loss of her service and society. These must be sued for by the husband alone (except as our statute permits them to be joined with such a cause of action as is now before us). Against the husband's claim for those damages no doubt his contributory negligence would be a defense. But the cause of action now under consideration is the direct injury to the wife's person, and the loss which she as an individual thereby suffers. In such a cause of action, and in any recovery at law thereupon, the husband, I think, has no legal interest. It may be assumed that such a cause of action, before it is merged in a judgment, does not come within the legal notion of "property." In Blackstone's classification of the various kinds of property (2 Bl. Com. 438) he ranges damages for injury sustained as property acquired and lost by suit and judgment at law, saying that, although the injured party has a right to damages the instant he receives the injury, and this right is given by the law of nature, yet a judgment is necessary to convert this right into "property." So far as this classification excludes from the legal definition of property a right to damages for an injury to property, it has been criticised, but with regard to an injury to the person it seems to be generally accepted as correct. Assuming its correctness, our married women's acts, which relate to a wife's property only, do not affect the right to these damages before judgment, and therefore we must consider whether the husband had a legal interest in such damages at common law.

It must be admitted that the husband was a necessary party to be joined with his wife in a suit for the recovery of such damages. But this was not because of his legal interest in the damages. He was a necessary coplaintiff with his wife in all suits at law for the vindication of her rights. Even when he had relinquished his power over his wife's rights, he was so joined. Innell v. Newman, 4 Barn. & Ald. 419. And after our statute had terminated the husband's interest in his wife's property, but before the latter statute authorizing a married woman to sue alone for her property, it was necessary that her husband should be joined as a coplaintiff; so that the necessity of joining him in the suit is not indicative of any legal interest in the cause of action. As is frequently stated in the books, he is joined for the sake of conformity. It may also be admitted that, unless he had surrendered his power, the husband could settle for the damages, or could release the wrongdoer from responsibility to the wife. Southworth v. Packard, 7 Mass. 95; Anderson v. Anderson, 11 Bush, 327; Beach v. Beach, 2 Hill, 260, 38 Am. Dec. 584; Ballard v. Russell, 33 Me. 196, 54 Am. Dec. 620. This, however, arose, not from the theory that the damages belonged to the husband, but from the power which he had over all rights of action belonging to his wife. He could make them his by reducing them to his own possession. Settling for the damages was so reducing them, and releasing the wrongdoer was deemed equivalent to settlement. The distinction between a husband's power over his wife's rights in action and a legal interest in them forms the basis of decision in Stall v. Fulton, 30 N. J. L. 430, and Peterson v. Mulford, 36 N. J. L. 481, where it was held that the husband's creditors had no claim on such rights of the wife, unless the husband had chosen to exercise his power over them so as to make them his own. If, without the exercise of such power, those rights were the property of the husband, the claims of his creditors could not have been denied. Having thus noticed those rules of the common law which might seem to favor the contention of the defendant, and having shown that they presuppose nothing antagonistic to the dictate of nature that compensation for a personal injury should belong to the person injured, it must further be noticed that there are rules of common law which clearly recognize this natural claim as legally subsisting in the case of married women. In an action for a battery or other personal tort done to the wife the wife must join. Bacon, Abr. title, Baron & Feme, p. 306. She must join because she is the meritorious cause of action, the husband joining for conformity only. Dengate v. Gardiner, 4 Mees. & W. 6. If the husband dies before or pending the suit, the right of action survives to the wife. Bacon, Abr. title, Baron & Feme, p. 304. But if the wife dies before or pending suit, the right of action is extinguished. Id. p. 306; Stroop v. Searts, 12 Serg. & R. 76. In view of the common-law maxim, actio personalis moritur cum persona, these rules plainly indicate to whom the right of action belongs. Because it survives the husband, it is not his; it dies with the wife, because it is hers. I conclude, then, that at common law the husband has no legal interest in the right or cause of action which accrues to a married woman for a tort to her person. He has some power over it, but no legal interest in it.

I have said that our married women's acts do not seem to affect this right of action; yet it would be entirely in accord with the spirit of those laws if by judicial construction their terms were made to embrace it.

That the legislature should have placed all a wife's real and personal property, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, beyond her husband's power of disposal, and made them her sole and separate property, as though she were a single woman, and should have left this most intimate right, which concerns her very existence, unsecured to her, can be reasonably accounted for only on the ground of inadvertence. But the defendant's argument is rested also upon the supposition that the husband has a legal interest in the compensation recovered in a suit for his wife's personal injury. This support likewise, in my opinion, fails. When a recovery has taken place, when the cause of action has become merged in a judgment, then I think our married women's acts become operative upon it. As already stated, the judgment is property, and all property received or obtained by a married woman, in any manner whatsoever, belongs by force of the statute to her alone, as if she were a single woman. It may be suggested that, the judgment being recovered by the husband and wife together, the property is not received or obtained by the wife, within the meaning of the statute. The same thing might be urged with respect to a chattel given by a third person to the wife, but delivered to the husband for her. At common law it would have been absolutely his. But now, I presume he would be deemed a mere agent in the transaction, and the chattel would be hers. Similarly, in this case, the husband appears with his wife in obtaining the property, but it is obtained on her account, and for her; and within any just view of the statute it is obtained by her, and not by her husband. Reason seems, therefore, to lead to the conclusion that the husband has no legal interest in such a judgment as is now before us.

Turning to previous judicial decisions, they appear to tend in the direction above pointed out. Counsel for the defendant relies upon Carlisle v. Sheldon, 33 Vt. 440; Perk v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 50 Conn. 379; Joliet v. Seward, 36 Ill. 402, 29 Am. Rep. 35; and Yahn v. Ottumwa, 60 Iowa, 429. While in these cases it was said that the negligence of a husband driving would be imputed to the wife riding with him, yet in every case the imputability was placed, not on the relation of husband and wife, but on that of driver and passenger. This will be seen by a quotation from the opinion in Carlisle v. Sheldon, which is the only case of husband and wife cited in the other decisions. The Vermont court said: The wife stands in no different position from that which she would occupy if the driver of the vehicle in which she was carried had been, instead of her husband, one employed for that purpose. . . . If she had been a passenger in a stage coach on this occasion, and had received the same injury, . . . the driver would be treated as being her agent. . . . There is nothing in the marital relation which would change the situation of the wife in respect to her husband's negligence under such circumstances, for the same consequences would have followed if the relation, instead of being that of husband and wife, had been that of parent and child, or master and servant, or if she had been an entire stranger." This is substantially the doctrine of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115; and, if that doctrine had been repudiated in Vermont, as it has been in New Jersey (New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Steinbrenner, 47 N. J. L. 161), it may fairly be inferred from the language above quoted that Carlisle v. Sheldon and the cases following it would have been decided differently. I have found only two cases where the decision rested on the mere relation between husband and wife, and only one of these is directly on the point presented by the case in hand. Both, however, tend to corroborate the opinion which I have formed. In Everts v. Everts, 8 Mich. 580, it was held, in an action by husband and wife for an assault upon the wife, that no act or words of the husband, unless the wife was privy to or participant in them, could be proved in mitigation of damages. In Hoag v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 111 N. Y. 199, an action by an administrator of a married woman to recover damages for her death, caused by the negligence of the defendant, it was adjudged that the contributory negligence of the husband in carelessly driving across the railroad track, whereby his wife, a passenger in his vehicle, was killed, was not imputable to the wife, and so did not bar the suit of her administrator. Yet, under the New York statute, as under ours, what would have defeated the action of the injured person in case death had not ensued would defeat the action of the administrator. Both upon reason and authority, then, I think the jury in the trial of this case were properly instructed that the contributory negligence of the husband constituted no defense. The judgment below should be affirmed.

ERROR to the District Court for Rice County to review an order made in certain foreclosure proceedings, which extended the time for redemption, in accordance with a statute passed after the final judgment of foreclosure, beyond what the mortgagor was entitled to at the time the mortgage was given and foreclosed. Reversed.

Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state.

The discussion in all cases of this character arises out of the distinction that exists between the doctrine of lex loci contractus, lex domicilii, etc., on the one hand, and lex fori on the other; for it is universally conceded that the latter must govern the remedy.

Andrews v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 510, and note.

I. The lex loci contractus—the law of the place where the contract is made, or is to be performed—is to govern as to the nature, validity, construction, and effect, of such contract.

II. The lex loci rei sita governs real property, the title to which can be acquired and lost only in the manner prescribed by the laws of the country where it is situated.

United States v. Crosby, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 115, 8 L. ed. 287.

III. The lex fori—the forms of the remedy and the order of judicial proceedings—are to be according to the law of the place where the action is instituted, without any regard to the domicil of the parties, the origin of the right, or the country of the act.

It is in this state an undisputed proposition of law that a mortgagee acquires no title or estate in the mortgaged premises, and only acquires a lien on the property.

Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. 390; Vanderslice v. Knapp, 20 Kan. 647; Alexander v. Shonyo, Id. 705; Winston v. Burnell, 44 Kan. 367.

Cox v. Martin, 44 Pa. 322, was an action to foreclose a mortgage. The legislature of Pennsylvania had passed an act which provided that "no civil process shall issue or be enforced against any person mustered into the service of this state, or of the United States, during the term he shall be engaged in such service."

The question was squarely presented in this case whether this act of the legislature was in contravention of section 10, article 1 of the Federal Constitution. The court said nothing is said about the legal remedies to enforce payment in case of default. The scire facias is given by our old Act of 1705, no allusion to which is contained in the mortgage. This remedy does not arise out of contract; it is conferred upon it by the legislature, and because conferred by the legislative power of the state, it may be suspended by the same power under pressure of public exigencies for a term that is neither indefinite nor unreasonable. This mortgage was made subject to that power; all contracts within the state are so made. The power permeates them all, if not expressly excluded by the contracting parties. No such contract, therefore, is violated, when the power acts, unless it transcends its constitutional limits.

Breitenbach v. Bush, supra; Von Baumbach v. Bade, 9 Wis. 559, 76 Am. Dec. 288.

What rights had the mortgagee in the case at bar, either under his contract or decree, that were impaired or affected, or how was the obligation of the mortgagor with reference to the mortgage impaired or affected?

The new law did not postpone the sale a moment; it did not impair his right to sell to the highest and best bidder and get all of the proceeds of the sale and apply it to the satisfaction of the judgment; and it did not prevent him from causing a general execution to issue for any remainder of the judgment, as he might have done before.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the district court of Rice county on the 25th day of May, 1891, by N. T. Greenwood, to foreclose a mortgage executed by Thomas A. Butler and wife on certain lots in the city of Lyons. Other parties, claiming liens on the land, were made defendants. Issues were joined, and on the 22d day of September, 1891, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $861.86, directing a sale of the premises without appraisal, subject to a mortgage for $6,000, and ordering execution to issue in six months in case the defendant failed for that time to pay the amount of the judgment, interest and costs. The decree concludes as follows: "And it is further adjudged and decreed by the court that the said defendants, and each of them, and all persons claiming, or to claim, by, through, or under them, or any of them, upon the confirmation of any sale of said lands or tenements hereunder, be barred and forever foreclosed of all title to, lien upon, or equity of redemption in said lands and tenements, or any part thereof, and that upon confirmation of any sale made as herein provided the sheriff be directed to put the purchaser of said lands or tenements in possession thereof." Afterwards, on the 7th day of April, 1892, on the application of the plaintiff for a supplemental judgment against certain other defendants, who were brought in by publication, a further decree was rendered, barring them also. Again, on the 22d day of April, 1892, a further order was made to supply omissions from the record, and a further and final decree was rendered, which concludes with an order barring the claims of all defendants in the same language as that contained in the original decree. On the 28d of March, 1893, an order of sale was duly issued on this judgment by the clerk of the court and on the 24th day of April 1893, the lots were sold to J. E. Putnam for $2,000 subject to the $6,000, mortgage. On the 25th day of May, 1893, the motion of the plaintiff to confirm the sale came on to be heard, and the sale was confirmed. The journal entry then proceeds as follows: "And it is further ordered and adjudged that so much of said motion as relates to directing the sheriff to make a deed to said purchaser of said lands and tenements, and put him in possession of said premises, be denied; to which last order and decision of the court the plaintiff and the said purchaser then and there excepted. And it is further ordered by the court that the said sheriff execute to the purchaser a certificate containing a description of the property sold, and the amount of money paid by said purchaser, together with the amount of costs up to this date, stating that, unless redemption is made within eighteen months thereafter according to law, said purchaser, his heirs and assigns, will be entitled to a deed for the same; to which last order of the court the said plaintiff and the said purchaser then and there excepted."

The question presented in this case is as to the correctness of the decisions of the court last quoted. The plaintiff in error contends that on the confirmation of the sale of the premises he was entitled to a deed and to the possession of the property. Elaborate briefs are filed, and the case has been fully and ably argued by counsel. For the defendants in error it is urged that chapter 109 of the Laws of 1893, known as the "Redemption Act," applies to this case; that the order made by the district court is in compliance therewith, and is valid. On the part of the plaintiff in error it is contended that this act does not and cannot affect the rights of the parties to and purchasers under judgments rendered before the passage of the law; and, further, that the act can have no application to contracts made before its passage; that as to such contracts it would be in contravention of the 10th section of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, because it would impair the obligation of contracts. Chapter 109 of the Laws of 1893 went into effect on the 17th of March, 1898. The twenty-fifth section reads: "The provisions of this act shall apply to all sales under foreclosure of mortgage, trust deed, mechanic's lien, or other lien, whether special or general, and the terms of redemption shall be the same." The statute in terms contains no exception of past contracts, or judgments already entered. The question as to the effect of this act on judgments already entered is necessarily involved in the decision of this case, and therefore should be first considered.

Speaking generally, it is the province of the legislature to establish within constitutional limits the rules, not only of procedure, but for the determination of rights, by which the courts shall be governed. These rules must, in the very nature of things, precede the action of the courts in the orderly determination of the rights of parties. Those interested in any controversy are given their day in court. At the appointed time the court hears their proofs, the presentation of their views as to the law fixing their rights, and thereupon proceeds to determine all questions, both of fact and of law, presented. This determination is entered of record, and becomes a final settlement and determination of the controversy. It hardly seems necessary to cite authorities to support the proposition that a final judgment so entered is not to be changed or set aside by the lawmaking power. Our form of government does not contemplate an appeal from the judgment of the courts to the legislature, nor does it contemplate nor authorize by a sweeping act of the legislature a change in the force and effect of a great class of judgments already entered. The precise question involved in this case was determined in the case of Mills v. Ralston, 10 Kan. 206. From the opinion in that case, delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer, we quote: "The purchaser at a sheriff's sale looks to the decree for the measure of interest and title he will acquire by his purchase. He knows he can get no more interest than the defendant possesses and the decree orders sold; but he bids, rightfully expecting to obtain all that. It is that interest which the sheriff offers; it is that he bids for; it is that which is struck down to him; and it is that which, if the sale be confirmed, he should then receive. . . . The proceedings on the sale were regular. The plaintiffs, defendants, and purchaser agreed in seeking a confirmation. The confirmation then followed as a matter of course. The decree barred redemption. The sale followed the decree. All the interest of the mortgagors (not an interest subject to the right to possess and redeem for two years) was offered by the sheriff, and was bid for by the purchaser. The confirmation closed that sale. The sale as made was the sale confirmed, and that by consent. The legal effect of that confirmation was to give the party a right to a deed, and the defendant could not, by objecting to a deed, deprive the purchaser of a right which flows from the confirmation. It is said that this carries the consent of the defendant to a point beyond that to which he intended it should go, and that the limit he intended is clearly indicated by his objecting to a deed. It is plain he wished only the confirmation of a sale of an interest subject to possession and redemption; but the trouble is, no such sale was made. It may be that, by consent of plaintiffs, defendant, and purchaser, the decree might have been modified, and the sale confirmed as of an estate subject to redemption; but nothing of the kind was done. Plaintiffs and purchaser were seeking a confirmation of the sale made, and might not have cared for a confirmation of a different one. This is not in the nature of a contract in which, unless the minds of the parties agree, there is no contract. The order and decree of a court is not simply the record of an agreement. It establishes rights founded upon past transactions. The law, and not the will of the parties, determines its effect. For instance, A. brings suit against B. B. enters his appearance, and consents to judgment, but objects to the judgment being a lien on his realty in the county. The judgment is entered, A. making no consent. The lien would follow. The law attaches it to the judgment. Just so here. The confirmation of a sale under a decree barring redemption entitles the purchaser to a deed. Neither plaintiffs nor purchaser made any consent. They asked affirmative relief; relief they were entitled to under a decree. They asked confirmation of a sale. The defendant consented to it. It was ordered. Then followed the right to a deed; a right resting upon decree, sale, and confirmation." Ogden v. Walters, 12 Kan. 282.

We have considered the case of Morley v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 146 U. S. 162, 38 L. ed. 925, which holds, where a judgment for money is entered, and by law bears 7 per cent interest, no rate being specified in the judgment, and a law is subsequently passed reducing the rate of interest on all judgments to 6 per cent, that such law operates on judgments rendered prior to its passage. The decision is put upon the ground that the interest in such case is in the nature of a penalty, or liquidated damages for the nonpayment of the judgment, and is a matter wholly within the discretion of the legislature, not being a part of the contract between the parties, nor fixed or established by the judgment of the court. From this decision Justices Harlan, Field, and Brewer dissented. We do not think that case directly in point. The subject of interest was not there a matter of judicial determination. It followed as a legal incident, as would accruing costs attending the enforcement of a judgment. In this case the parties to the suit were to have the amount of the plaintiff's recovery determined by the court, and to have an adjudication as to the rights of all the parties claiming an interest in or lien upon the mortgaged property. The plaintiff then sought a sale of the property, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of his claim. It was absolutely necessary that the decree should determine what interest should be sold, and whose rights should be barred. It directed a sale without appraisal of the interests of the mortgagors, but allowed them, in accordance with the law as it then stood, a stay of six months in which to redeem. In case of a failure to pay within that time it directed a sale of the interest of the mortgagors subject to the prior mortgage for $6,000, and decreed that on the confirmation of such sale the rights of all the defendants should be barred and foreclosed of all equity of redemption, and that the sheriff should be directed to put the purchaser into possession. The original judgment was entered almost a year and a half before the Act of 1898 was passed, and the final supplemental decree more than eleven months before its passage. It cannot be said that a sale of lands with a right of possession remaining in the judgment debtor for a year and a half thereafter is the same thing as a sale with a right to immediate possession on confirmation of the sale. It is simply the carving out and taking away from the estate originally decreed to be sold another estate limited for a year and a half. It diminishes the value of the lands to be sold by just exactly the value of the tenure, rent free, for a year and a half. The fact that the judgment would still draw interest does not affect the question as to the value of the security to be sold for its satisfaction. We conclude, then, that judgments rendered prior to the passage of the act are not affected by it, and that all sales of land under such judgments must be made in accordance with their terms, and will pass such estates as are thereby ordered to be sold. As the conclusion we have reached on this question is decisive of the case, it is unnecessary to now enter into a discussion of the constitutional question so ably presented by counsel on both sides.

The order directing that a certificate issue to the purchaser will be reversed, with the direction that the sheriff be ordered to execute a deed to the purchaser, and that he have immediate possession of the land sold.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Joseph SEGO, Appt.,

v.

Heber STODDARD.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A lead pencil mark across the name of a candidate is a distinguishing mark which makes the ballot invalid under Indiana statutes which prohibit any distinguishing mark or mutilation.
2. A hole in a ballot made in scratching out a stamp mark constitutes a distinguishing mark or mutilation within the prohibition of the Indiana statutes although the ballot is otherwise properly stamped.
3. A stamp at or on a square opposite a blank space left for the name of a candidate is a distinguishing mark under the Indiana statute which prohibits any stamp excepting in the square enclosing the device or in the square opposite the name of a candidate.
4. The provisions of the Indiana statutes that a ballot bearing a distinguishing mark or mutilation shall be void, and also that a stamp elsewhere than on a square prescribed by statute shall be treated as a distinguishing mark, are mandatory and not merely directory so that a corrupt intent in making such prohibited mark is not necessary to defeat the vote.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Porter County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to contest the alleged election of defendant to the office of sheriff of Porter County. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. L. Jones, Cass & Weir and Kern & Bailey for appellant.

Messrs. N. L. Agnew and D. E. Kelley, with Mr. E. D. Crumpacker, for appellee:

It is said in the case of State v. Black, 16 L. R. A. 769, 54 N. J. L. 446: "So long as the ballot can be marked for identification, or the vote of the citizen can be disclosed in any way, the voter is liable to be called to an account for his conduct. The coercionist will treat his refusal to vote a marked ballot as an adverse vote. The corruptionist will have the means of assuring himself that the vote he has purchased will be delivered. The thoughts of those interested in pure elections were turned by these considerations to the device of some scheme for voting which would secure compulsory secrecy, and at the same time provide for an orderly, equal, and convenient exercise of the right of suffrage." In Bechtel v. Albin (Ind.) April 4, 1893, this court declared respecting our election law: "That the great underlying object was to avoid the possibility of discovery, from the ballot, of the identity of the voter."

Ballots which contained stamp marks that did not touch any square at all are expressly denounced by the statute which in this respect was declared mandatory in Parvin v. Wimberg, 15 L. R. A. 775, 180 Ind. 561.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the general election held on the 8th day of November, 1892, the appellant, Joseph Sego, was the democratic candidate, the appellee, Heber Stoddard, the republican candidate, one Harrison H. Williams, the people's candidate, and one William B. Gibbs the prohibition candidate, for the office of sheriff of Porter county. At the meeting of the board of canvassers, convened in pursuance of law, there were canvassed and counted for each of said candidates, respectively, the following number of votes, viz.: for appellant, 2,020; for appellee 2,023; for Harrison H. Williams 100; and for William B. Gibbs 114 votes; whereupon appellee having been found by said board to have received the plurality of all the votes returned and canvassed, he was declared elected to said office. On the 15th day of November, 1892, within ten days after the result of said canvass was declared, appellant filed in the office of the auditor of said county his statement to contest the election of appellee to said office. Issue, trial before the board of commissioners, resulting in a judgment by the board that appellee had received a plurality of all the votes cast at said election, and had been duly elected to said office. The appellant appealed to the circuit court of said county, where there was a trial by the court, special finding and conclusions of law, whereupon there was another judgment rendered in favor of appellee, declaring that he had received a plurality of all the votes cast at such election and had been duly elected to said office, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is assigned for error that the circuit court erred in its conclusions of law. This is the only question presented by this appeal. The finding shows that the number of votes in the aggregate with which each candidate was credited by the canvassing board were all legal votes, and that each candidate was legally entitled to be so credited in the court. The controversy arises over sixty-five other ballots that had been returned to the clerk's office in sealed bags, none of which had been counted by the board of canvassers for either candidate. The finding and conclusions of law show that the sixty-five ballots so returned to the clerk's office uncounted had been cast by legal voters at said election, and that twenty-three of them were so stamped as to indicate the intention of the voters to vote for the contestee, Stoddard, and were free from marks or mutilations whereby said ballots could be distinguished, and should have been counted for the contestee and the circuit court did so count them, making his whole vote 2,046. No question is made in appellant's brief against the correctness of this ruling.

And of the uncounted ballots returned as aforesaid, the court found as matter of fact, and stated in its legal conclusions, that nineteen of them were so stamped as to indicate the intention of the voters to vote for contestor, Joseph Sego, and that said ballots were free from any marks or mutilations by which they could be distinguished and should have been counted for said Sego, and the court so counted them for him, making his whole number of votes 2,089.

No question is made on either side as to the correctness of this conclusion. The court further finds that two of said uncounted ballots were so stamped as to indicate the intention of the voters to vote for the contestor, Sego, and were free from marks or mutilations by which they could be distinguished, and were properly stamped, but that said two ballots were not protested by any member of the election board at said election whereat they were cast, and that the action of the election board in rejecting said ballots was unanimous in their decision that the same ought not to be counted, and said ballots were in no way disputed or protested and for that reason the court concluded as matter of law that they ought not to be counted and accordingly rejected them for that reason.

Whether that conclusion of law was right or wrong, as we shall hereafter see, can make no difference in the result of this case. We have left of the uncounted ballots twenty-one yet to consider. One of these was found to contain a lead-pencil mark across the name of Thomas Hammond, a candidate for congress on said ballot, another bore evidence of having been stamped in the square opposite the name of William A. Henneger for congress on said ballot, and of having the stamp erased by a knife, or some other sharp instrument, so that it made a hole clear through the ticket, and was also stamped to the left of each candidate on the republican ticket except Heber Stoddard. Five of said twenty-one ballots were stamped plainly and clearly in one of the large squares containing a device, and one of them in which the stamp was in the square containing the eagle at the head of the republican ticket also was clearly and plainly stamped between the word "republican" at the top of the ticket, and to the left of the name William Johnston on said republican ticket. Another is stamped in the square surrounding the rooster, and it is stamped in the square to the left of each of the names in the democratic ticket; another, stamped in the square surrounding the rooster, is also stamped on the square to the left of each of the names on the democratic ticket; another, stamped in the square enclosing the eagle, is also stamped to the left of the names of Allen Reynolds and Joseph Sego, on the democratic ticket, it appearing that there was a full list of candidates' names for the various offices printed on the republican ticket, including the offices for which Allen Reynolds and Joseph Sego were candidates; another, stamped in the square enclosing the rooster, is also stamped in the square to the left of the name of Allen Reynolds on the democratic ticket. Another ballot was stamped to the left of the names of Beck and Sego, in the democratic ticket, and Coats in the republican ticket, Stoner in the prohibition ticket, Yeoman, Shultz, Jones, Green, and Peck in the people's ticket, and is also stamped on the square to the left of the place for commissioner of the third district of Porter county, in a square opposite to which there is no candidate's name printed, and the ticket as to that office is left blank; another was stamped in the squares to the left of the names of Hammond, Bartholomew, and Sego on the democratic ticket, and to the left of the name of Burstram on the republican ticket, and on the squares to the left of the names of Shultz, Green, Peck, and Hamfeldt in the people's ticket; also in the squares to the left of the places for candidates for prosecuting attorney, county surveyor, and commissioner of the third district on the prohibition ticket, there being no candidate named on that ticket for either of these offices and as to them, the said prohibition ticket being blank.

Four of these rejected ballots contained large blurred marks or blotches in the square surrounding the device, four or five times as large as the ordinary stamp mark; two of these were voted for appellant and two for appellee. This leaves for consideration but five of the twenty-one rejected votes. These all contained more than one stamp mark in the large square enclosing the device. It is further found that these twenty-one votes rejected by the circuit court bore no other marks than those above indicated and that sixteen of them were so stamped as to indicate an intention to vote for appellant, and five of them were so stamped as to indicate an intention to vote for appellee. As we have seen, without these twenty-one votes, the count stands 2046 for appellee and 2039 for appellant about which there is no disagreement. It is not contended by appellant's learned counsel, as we understand them, that these twenty-one ballots were marked or stamped in the manner provided by what is known as our Australian Ballot Law; indeed, it is virtually conceded that these ballots were not stamped and marked according to the strict letter of that law. But it is insisted that such law as to its directions for stamping and marking ballots is not mandatory, but directory simply. So much of sections 45 and 52 of said law as amended by the Act approved March 6, 1891, that is applicable, reads as follows: Sec. 45: "The voter shall then, and without leaving the room, go alone into any of the booths which may be unoccupied, and indicate the candidates for whom he desires to vote by stamping the square immediately preceding their names. . . . Provided, however, that if he shall desire to vote for all the candidates of one party or group of petitioners, he may place the stamp on the large square enclosing the device and preceding the title under which the candidates of such party or group of petitioners are printed, and the vote shall then be counted for all the candidates under that title. If the voter stamps the large square enclosing the device, he shall not stamp elsewhere on the ballot, unless there be no candidate for some office in the list printed under such stamped device, in which case he may indicate his choice for such office by stamping the square to the left of the name of any candidate for such office on any other list. A stamp on a ballot in violation of this provision shall be treated as a distinguishing mark. If a stamp touches a square, it shall be counted on the square, but a stamp that touches no square shall be treated as a distinguishing mark."

"Sec. 52. . . . Any ballot which shall bear any distinguishing mark or mutilation shall be void, and shall not be counted."

The ballot containing a lead-pencil mark across the name of Thomas Hammond was in violation of the letter of the statute just quoted, which forbids the counting of a ballot with a distinguishing mark. The one which had been stamped in the square opposite the name of Henneeger, and that stamp mark erased so that a hole was thereby made through the ticket, though otherwise properly stamped at other places on the ballot, is in the same fix. The one stamped in the square containing the device at the head of the republican ticket, and also stamped between the word "republican" at the top of the ticket, and to the left of the name of William Johnston on said republican ticket, is in violation of section 45, which forbids a stamp anywhere else on the ticket when stamped in the square containing the device, unless there be no candidate for some office in the list printed under the stamped device. The exception could not apply, because the additional stamp here was in the republican ticket. The statute imperatively requires such additional stamp to be treated as a distinguishing mark, and the other section declares such a ticket to be void, and forbids it to be counted. The two stamped in the square surrounding the rooster, and also in the square to the left of each of the names in the democratic ticket falls in the same category as the last one above mentioned. The one stamped in the square enclosing the eagle, and also stamped to the left of the names of Allen Reynolds and Joseph Sego on the democratic ticket, there being a full list of candidates on the republican ticket for the various offices, including the offices for which Reynolds and Sego were candidates, is in violation of that part of said section 45 forbidding additional stamps on the ticket when the large square enclosing the device is stamped, where there is a full list of candidates under the device stamped, and declaring such additional stamp a distinguishing mark, and the other section 52 declaring it void and forbidding it to be counted. The one stamped in the square enclosing the rooster and also in the square to the left of the name of Allen Reynolds on the democratic ticket falls in the same category as the one before the last. The one stamped to the left of Beck and Sego in the democratic ticket, and Coats in the republican ticket, Stoner in the prohibition ticket, Yeoman, Shultz, Jones, Green and Peck in the people's ticket, and also stamped on the square to the left of the place for commissioner of the third district of Porter county in a square opposite to which there is no candidate's name printed, the ticket as to that office being left blank, is a violation of said section 45, declaring a ticket void, being a distinguishing mark to stamp at another place than on the device, and forbidding the same to be counted. There are only the squares to the left of names on the various tickets and the square enclosing the device, that can be lawfully stamped by the provisions of section 45. A stamp at or in a square opposite no candidate's name is a distinguishing mark. The one stamped in the squares to the left of the names of Hammond, Bartholomew, and Sego, on the democratic ticket, and to the left of the name of Burstram on the republican ticket, and also on the squares to the left of the names of Shultz, Green, Peck, and Hamfeldt in the people's ticket, and also in the square to the left of the places for prosecuting attorney, county surveyor, and commissioner of the third district on the prohibition ticket, there being no candidate named on that ticket for either of these offices, said ticket being blank as to said offices, is in the same category as the last one above mentioned. We need not, and do not, pass upon the validity of the four ballots rejected, because they each contained large blurred marks or blotches in the square surrounding the device four or five times as large as the ordinary stamp mark, because two of them were for appellant and two were for appellee, making the result the same whether they are counted or not. The five remaining rejected ballots each contained more than one stamp mark in the large square enclosing the device, were stamped contrary to section 45 the literal meaning of which is that one stamp mark is to be placed in any square, and no more. It violates section 52, in that such unnecessary stamp marks are distinguishing marks, and by its terms the ballots are made void and are forbidden to be counted. It is contended that the statute is directory merely, and not mandatory, as to the method of marking ballots or stamping them. This court, in speaking of this very provision of the law in Parvin v. Wimberg, 180 Ind. 566, 15 L. R. A. 778, said: "If we hold this statute to be directory only, and not mandatory, we are left entirely without any fixed rule by which the officers of election are to be guided in counting the ballots." Appellant's counsel earnestly insist that though the ballot is not stamped as the statute requires, and in violation of its terms, yet unless there is proof that the unauthorized or prohibited marking was done by the voter for a corrupt motive, the ballot must be counted. Such a construction would be utterly subversive of the leading idea, thought, and purpose of the act. At the time the legislature met that passed the act, there was a general belief in the public mind that the most threatening evil to government by the people was bribery or vote buying at elections. The evil was more dangerous in our state than in many of our sisters, because the two leading political parties were so nearly matched in numbers, thus rendering it practicable to change the result by the purchase of a few thousand votes. Criminal statutes imposing severe penalties against the crime had proven but idle and powerless fulminations, at which both the buyer and seller laughed, feeling that their mutual interest would hold the secret of their crime against free government securely locked in their breasts. So that the statute was the outgrowth of the desire of all to rid the state of the burning disgrace and ominous danger to popular government. And the leading idea and thought of the whole act was not to afford relief against the fraud of vote buying and bribery at elections after its commission, but it was to devise a plan by which the honest voter could not only be freed from intimidation by making his vote a secret known only to himself and his God, but it was to absolutely shut the door against making merchandise of his vote by the corruptible voter as near as human ingenuity could devise such a plan. That the plan has proven eminently successful is evidenced by the fact that all political parties warmly approve the law, and that thirty odd of our sister states have since substantially adopted it. The idea was not, as appellant's counsel seem to think, to so provide as to render it impossible for the purchased or bribed voter to afterwards identify the ticket he voted by looking at and inspecting it, because the other provisions of the act provide for a destruction of the ballots after they are counted, and before anybody except the officers can see them. But it was to guard against the possibility of the vote seller indicating to the buyer in advance how his ballot would be distinguished from the other ballots in the box, so that the buyer or his agent, who may be one of the election officers, could tell when the bribed voter's ballot was reached in the count that such bribed voter had carried out his contract. It was believed that if it could be rendered impossible for the buyer or his agent to identify the ballot voted by the purchased voter from a mere indication beforehand how it should be marked, the desired end would be reached, because it was believed that, as a general thing, a vote buyer would not risk his money on a vote seller without some assurance other than the mere word of the bribed voter. To that end a stamp, the same stamp, is required to be used in marking ballots and indicating the voter's choice, instead of a pen or pencil, which could be given a peculiar turn or a peculiar mark so as to distinguish the ballot. If that is true, how much more is it true that to carry out the general intent of the act that the ballots here in question are all in violation of the act. Many of them are expressly declared by the terms of the act void, and the others are such as render it possible to identify the ballot by the person engaged in buying it. See Bechtel v. Albin (Ind.) at last term.

Without counting the two tickets rejected by the court because they were not protested, the appellee has a clear plurality of all the votes by five.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina, Appt.,

T. L. MOORE.

(.....N. C.....)

1. If an occupation tax can be upheld in any case as an exercise of the taxing power, it must not violate a constitutional requirement of uniformity, and therefore a tax imposed by the legislature on the exercise of an occupation in some counties but not in others is unconstitutional.
2. The occupation of an "emigrant agent" does not belong to that class which is so inherently harmful or dangerous to the public that it may be either directly or indirectly restricted or prohibited, where the occupation consists merely in hiring laborers in the state to be employed beyond the limits of the state.
3. A license fee of $1,000 for the occupation of an emigrant agent unaccompanied by any police regulation whatever, is unreasonable and cannot be upheld.

(November 21, 1886.)

A PPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Criminal Court for New Hanover County acquitting defendant of a violation of the Emigrant Agent Act. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Frank L. Osborne, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Mr. Junius Davis, for appellee:

The act violates the rules of uniformity prescribed by the constitution of the state for the levying and assessing of taxes.

State v. Powell, 100 N. C. 526; Puitt v. Gaston County Comrs. 94 N. C. 718, 55 Am. Rep. 688; Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 89 N. C. 295, 45 Am. Rep. 679; Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 121; Wiley v. Salisbury Comrs. 111 N. C. 400.

It violates articles 1 and 17 of the Bill of Rights.

1 Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 744; Butcher's Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 757, 28 L. ed. 591.

The act is leveled at the laboring class only, that great mass who earn their living in the sweat of the brow, and is a barrier to many who may wish to embrace the opportunity and means offered by agents to emigrate from the state in the hope of bettering their condition.

Ex parte Kuback, 9 L. R. A. 482, 85 Cal. 274.

It is not "the law of the land."

It is partial only in its operation. It does not embrace all pursuing the denounced calling within the state, but applies only to certain counties and makes highly penal in them, what is entirely lawful in the other counties of the state.

State v. Divine, 98 N. C. 788; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 889; People v. Marx, 90 N. Y. 877, 52 Am. Rep. 40; State v. Goodwill, 6 L. R. A. 621, 88 W. Va. 179; State v. Fire Creek Coal & O. Co. 6 L. R. A. 859, 38 W. Va. 188; Baker v. Portland, 5 Sawy. 566; Com. v. Perry, 14 L. R. A. 825, 153 Mass. 117; Durkee v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 464, 9 Am. Rep. 508.

It violates the Constitution of the United States, in that it is an attempted interference with the right of congress to regulate commerce between the states. For interstate commerce consists as well of the transit of persons from state to state, of emigration from one state to another, as of the transportation of merchandise.

It violates the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It denies to those engaged in the business of hiring, within the prescribed counties, laborers to leave the state, the equal protection of the law.

San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 7 Sawy. 517, 13 Fed. Rep. 145, 722; 8 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 11, 13, 15; Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 81, 28 L. ed. 924; Pearson v. Portland, 69 Me. 278, 81 Am. Rep. 276; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 23, 29, 32 L. ed. 586; Pick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 869-873, 30 L. ed. 226, 227; State v. Divine, supra.

The reason of the act is public history. For it is notorious that its openly avowed purpose was to prevent negro laborers from leaving the state.

It is a bold and patent attempt to accomplish an unlawful object in an alleged lawful way.

Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 268, 28 L. ed. 548; Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 28 L. ed. 550; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 472, 24 L. ed. 530; San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. supra.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an indictment for the violation of chapter 75, Acts 1891; and it is found in the special verdict that the defendant, "without having first procured a license therefor from the treasurer of the state of North Carolina, did hire six laborers in the county of New Hanover, in the state aforesaid, to be employed beyond the limits of the said state, and did solicit other laborers in said county to hire themselves to be so employed, and that the said defendant on the day aforesaid, and in the county aforesaid, was engaged in imposed for revenue. This question has heretofore been but slightly touched in the decisions of the courts.

the business of hiring in the said county laborers to be employed beyond the limits of said state, and that the said county of New Hanover is east of the line, as at present established, and as so established on the 6th day of February, 1891, for the receiving of patients by the North Carolina Insane Asylum." The act referred to excludes, in express terms, from its operation, any of the counties in the state which are west of the said line, except a few, which are therein specifically named; and thus it appears that the same occupation may be lawfully and freely pursued in many of the counties of North Carolina, while in others a license fee of $1,000 is required to be paid into the state treasury, and its pursuit without such a license is denounced as a criminal offense and punishable by a fine of "not less than five hundred dollars and not more than five thousand dollars," or by imprisonment in the county jail "not less than four months, or confinement in the state prison at hard labor not exceeding two years for each and every offense, within the discretion of the court." It must be manifest from these provisions that the principle of uniformity is entirely disregarded, and that, if the act is to be considered as an exercise of the taxing power of the legislature, it must, under the repeated decisions of this court, be declared unconstitutional and void. Const. art. 5, § 3, authorizes the legislature to tax "trades, professions, franchises," etc.; and, although it is not expressly provided that such taxes shall be uniform, "yet," says Rodman, J., speaking for the court in Gallin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119, "a tax not uniform, as properly understood, would be so inconsistent with natural justice, and with the intent which is apparent in the section of the constitution above cited, that it may be admitted that the collection of such a tax would be restricted as unconstitutional." In Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 89 N. C. 291, 45 Am. Rep. 679, the principle just stated was distinctly recognized, and declared to be within the spirit and meaning of the fundamental law. Smith, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We should be reluctant to hold, if there were no question of constitutional right involved, that this method of levying taxes was sanctioned by our own constitution, and consistent with the equality and uniformity which it contemplates. The 'uniform rule' to be observed in the exercise of the taxing power seems to be so far applicable to the taxes imposed on 'trades, professions, franchises and incomes,' as to require that no discriminating tax be imposed upon persons pursuing the same vocation, while varying amounts may be assessed upon vocations or employments of different kinds." Again, in Pruitt v. Gaston County Comrs., 94 N. C. 709, 55 Am. Rep. 688, it was said: "The principle of uniformity pervades the fundamental law, and while not in the constitution applied in express terms to the tax on trades, professions, etc., necessarily underlies the power of imposing such tax." In this last case the court adopted the words of Miller, J., in the State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 28 L. ed. 663, "that while one tax may be imposed upon innkeepers, another upon ferries, and a still different tax on railroads, the taxation must be the same on each class that is, the same tax upon all innkeepers, upon all ferries, and upon all railroads, in their respective classes as taxable subjects." And again, in State v. Powell, 100 N. C. 525, the same language was accepted as a correct definition of "uniformity," and it was repeated that "uniformity, in its legal and proper sense, is inseparably incident to the power of taxation." The act under consideration, if intended to impose a tax, in the legal signification of the term, very plainly falls within the inhibition of the organic law, as interpreted so often by this court, for it cannot, with the least show of reason, be contended that the principle of uniformity is not violated when the same occupation is heavily taxed in one county, while in an adjoining county it is entirely free and untrammelled. It is too plain for argument that if the legislature had passed an act imposing a tax upon merchants doing business in the counties of New Hanover, Pender, and Bladen, while like merchants in the counties of Brunswick, Robeson, and Richmond were not required to pay such tax, the act would be void; and yet such a discrimination in taxation would be no greater than that which is attempted to be made under the statute in question. It is not very unusual in this country for the state, either directly, or through its various municipal corporations, to require the payment of a certain amount for the privilege of prosecuting one's profession or calling; and this is required, indiscriminately, of all kinds of occupations, whatever be their character,—whether harmful or innocent; whether the license is necessary to the protection of the public, or not. "While the courts are not uniform in the presentation of the grounds upon which the general requirement of a license for all kinds of employments may be justified, on one ground or another, the right to impose the license has been very generally recognized. Whatever refinements of reasoning may be indulged in, there are but two substantial phases to the imposition of a license tax on professions and occupations. It is either a license, strictly so called, imposed in the exercise of the ordinary police power of the state, or it is a tax laid in the exercise of the power of taxation." Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 101; Cooley, Taxn. 408. We have seen that under the latter view the law under consideration cannot be sustained, for the want of the uniformity required by the constitution; and this brings us to the other branch of the inquiry,—whether it can be upheld as a regulation under the police power of the state.

2. "The police of a state, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizen with citizen those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others." Cooley, Const. Lim. 704. "The power is very broad and comprehensive, and is exercised to promote the health, comfort, safety and welfare of society. Its exercise in extreme cases is frequently justified by the maxim 'salus populi suprema lex est.' It is used to regulate the use of property by enforcing the maxim 'sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas.' Under it the conduct of an individual and the use of property may be regulated so as to interfere, to some extent, with the freedom of the one and the enjoyment of the other." Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 686; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 1. "This power, under our federal system of government, has been left with the states, and the only limit to its exercise in the enactment of laws by their legislatures is, that they shall not prove repugnant to the provisions of the fundamental law—the state constitution and the Federal Constitution, with the laws made under its delegated powers." State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714; Cooley, Const. Lim. *574. In its fair and reasonable exercise, the legislature, by reason of the very nature of the power, is not restricted by constitutional provisions in reference to uniformity, as, says Judge Cooley, "the circumstances of a particular locality, or the prevailing public sentiment in that section of the state, may require or make acceptable different police regulations from those demanded in another. These discriminations are made constantly, and the fact that the laws are of local or special operation, only, is not supposed to render them obnoxious in principle." Cooley, Const. Lim. 480. This principle has been fully recognized in this state, and is illustrated by many decisions. In Intendant of Raleigh v. Sorrell, 46 N. C. 49, an ordinance of the city of Raleigh requiring, under penalty, oats to be weighed by the public weighmaster, before being offered for sale, was sustained as a valid police regulation. So, an ordinance forbidding the sale of fresh meat in the town of Durham, except at the market house (State v. Pendergrass, 106 N. C. 664), and an act regulating the sale of seed cotton in certain counties of the state, were held to be a proper exercise of the police power. So also, it may be stated, as a general principle, that all callings and professions which, by reason of their peculiar character, may directly or indirectly do harm to the public, are subject to police regulations, and a license may be required for their prosecution. "On this principle," says Tiedeman (Pol. Powers, § 101), "attorneys, physicians, druggists, engineers and other skilled workmen may be required to procure a license, which would certify to their fitness to pursue their respective callings, in which professional skill is most necessary, and in which the ignorance of the practitioner is likely to be productive of great harm to the public, and to individuals coming into business relations with them. So also, the licensing of dramshops, green groceries, hackmen and the like, is justifiable, in order that these callings may be effectually brought within the police supervision, which is necessary to prevent the occupation becoming harmful to the public." It must not be understood, however, that the exercise of the police power is without limit. On the contrary, it is settled by abundant authority that, while it is for the legislature to determine what regulations are needed to protect the public health, and secure public comfort and safety, and its measures calculated and intended to accomplish these ends are generally within its discretion, and not the subject of judicial review, it is nevertheless true that this extensive authority must be exercised in subordination to those great principles of fundamental law which are designed for the protection of the liberty and the property of the citizen. "Liberty, in its broad sense, as understood in this country means the right not only of freedom from servitude, imprisonment, or restraint but the right of one to use his faculties in all lawful ways, to live and work where he will, to earn his livelihood in any lawful calling and to pursue any lawful trade or vocation." Re Jacobs, supra; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 889. In Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585, Mr. Justice Field said "that among the inalienable rights as proclaimed in the declaration of independence is the right of men to pursue . . . any lawful business or vocation in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others. The right to pursue them, without let or hindrance, except that which is applied to all persons of the same age, sex and condition, is a distinguishing privilege of citizens of the United States, and an essential element of that freedom which they claim as their birthright." In the same case, Mr. Justice Bradley said: "I hold that the liberty of pursuit, the right to follow any of the ordinary callings of life, is one of the privileges of a citizen, of which he cannot be deprived, without invading his right to liberty, within the meaning of the constitution." In Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323, Andrews, J., remarked that a man's right to liberty includes "the right to exercise his faculties, and to follow a lawful vocation for the support of life." Judge Cooley says: "The general rule, undoubtedly, is that any person is at liberty to pursue any lawful calling, and to do so in his own way, not encroaching on the rights of others. It is not competent, therefore, to forbid any person or class of persons, whether citizens or resident aliens, offering their services in lawful business, or to subject others to penalties for employing them." These authorities are referred to for the purpose of showing that, under the mere guise of a police regulation, a person cannot be unduly restricted, or substantially prohibited, from pursuing a lawful occupation. In order to justify such legislation, the business must itself be of such a nature that its prosecution will do damage to the public, whatever may be the character and qualification of those who engage in it. Mr. Tiedeman, in his very reliable work (Pol. Powers, p. 290), remarks: "In order to prohibit the prosecution of a trade altogether, the injury to the public, which furnishes the justification for such a law, must proceed from the inherent character of the business. . . . But, if the business is not inherently harmful the prosecution of it cannot rightfully be prohibited to one who will conduct the business in a proper and circumspect manner. Such an one would be 'deprived of his liberty' without due process of law." It is on the ground of their inherently harmful and dangerous character that the keeping of gaming tables or the selling of intoxicating liquor, or other things of a demoralizing nature, may be absolutely prohibited. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 628, 81 L. ed. 205; State v. Joyner, 81 N. C. 534. This may be, and is often, directly accomplished by legislation, which, in its terms, is expressly prohibitory, instead of the circuitous method of imposing a burden in the nature of a license as a police regulation, which is difficult or impossible to be borne, and which, in the end, may make the occupation unprofitable. Cooley, Taxn. 404.

It must be apparent from an examination of the statute in question that the occupation of an "emigrant agent," as defined therein, does not belong to that class which is so inherently harmful or dangerous to the public that it may either directly or indirectly, be restricted or prohibited. The statute defines the said occupation "to mean any person engaged in hiring laborers in this state to be employed beyond the limits of the same." It cannot be seriously contended that a laborer, under our system of government, as indicated by the unquestionable authorities to which we have referred, does not possess the right of hiring his services to any one, either within or without the state; and, if he may do this, we are unable to see, as we have just remarked, how an agent or other person engaged in hiring him to be employed without the state can be considered as following an occupation which, in itself, is inherently dangerous or harmful, in the sense above mentioned. Indeed, this position is fully conceded by the attorney-general, and we will now consider whether the license imposed by the act is restrictive or prohibitory in its character.

While the probable harm and inconvenience of immigration, to the public, may not be averted by such legislation, it is of the greatest importance to all of the citizens of the state that the inexperienced and artless laborer may not be imposed upon by the false representations and other fraudulent practices of an emigrant agent; and it is one of the highest duties imposed upon the lawmakers to prevent such abuses by prescribing rigid and appropriate regulations, under which the said occupation can alone be followed. Regulations of this nature may be made in a variety of ways, but that which is most commonly adopted is the requirement of a license fee, which is exacted for the purpose of defraying the probable expenses of ascertaining the moral and other qualifications of the proposed licensee, and the proper inspection or other necessary police supervision under which the particular business is to be conducted. While the means adopted must have a relation to the accomplishment of these ends, it is not absolutely necessary, in all cases, that the law or ordinance imposing the license should prescribe any specific regulation, and it is sufficient if the court can see that the fee exacted is a reasonable proportion of the necessary expenses incident to the general police supervision. The entire absence, however, of any regulation or of any police supervision whatever is a powerful aid (and especially where the amount exacted is very large) in determining whether the license is not really a disguised species of taxation, or an indirect method of unduly restricting or prohibiting the business altogether. In this case, however, we have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that the act in question is not, and was not intended as, a mere regulation, but its object was either to tax or to restrict or prohibit the particular occupation mentioned therein. This is evident from the fact that it does not contain any of the features of a police regulation, nor is it connected, in any way with any police supervision. No provision whatever is made for the ascertainment of the moral character or other qualities of the applicant. The statute provides that "any person shall be entitled to a license" upon the payment of the prescribed fee, and therefore the vilest impostor may demand a license, and the treasurer has no discretion to withhold it. Neither are there any regulations as to the manner in which the business is to be carried on, and the licensee is left entirely unrestrained, except so far as he may be amenable to the general law. Even if there were such regulations, there is an utter absence of any provision for an inspector, or other officer whose duty it is to enforce them. The general scope and tendency of the act, in connection with the exaction of the very large license fee, induce us to believe that, viewed as a police regulation, it is so far restrictive and prohibitory as to contravene those fundamental principles we have enunciated, and which are intended to protect the citizen in the pursuit of an occupation not inherently dangerous or harmful to the public. It may be regulated, but it cannot be indirectly prohibited, by an exercise of the police power. Whatever doubt, however, that may possibly remain as to the validity of the act as a police regulation may be dissipated when we consider the reasonableness of the amount required for the license. We have already adverted to this principle, and will refer to some of the many authorities upon the subject. In Cooley on Taxation (page 408), it is said: "Where the grant is not made for revenue, but for regulation, a much narrower construction is to be applied. A fee for the license may be exacted, but it must be such a fee, only, as will legitimately assist in the regulation; and it should not exceed the necessary or probable expense of issuing the license, and of inspecting and regulating the business which it covers." In Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 274, it is said that, "in the regulation of occupations, it is constitutional to require those who apply for a license to pay a reasonable sum to defray the expenses of issuing the license, and maintaining the police supervision." The principle has been emphatically recognized by this court in State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554. In that case it appeared that the town of Salisbury, had under its charter, the authority to regulate the manner in which provisions might be sold in its "streets and markets," and to enforce such regulations by appropriate penalties, etc. The ordinance provided that "no butcher or other person shall cut up and expose to sale any fresh meats within the limits of Salisbury without first obtaining a license from the commissioners of the town, which license shall authorize the person or persons to sell meat at a certain stand, shop, or stall specified in said license, to be used as a market, and for which license said person shall pay the sum of $3.00 per month payable in advance." The court held that as the subjects of taxation were enumerated in the charter, and as the occupation of selling meat by butchers was not included therein, the town had no right to impose a tax upon that particular occupation; and, when it was urged that the license fee could be sustained as a regulation under the police power, it was held that it was not a police regulation, but a tax. The opinion was based upon the unreasonableness of the amount required for the license. The court (Ashe, J.) said: "There are authorities to be found to the effect that, under the police power, license may be granted for the exercise of particular avocations and employments, but in all such cases it is held that the fee or price exacted for the privilege must not be with a view to revenue; and in such cases it is competent and proper for the courts, where the effect and purpose of an ordinance are brought to be reviewed by them, to see that the fee or price paid for the privilege of exercising the franchise is reasonable, and not for the purpose of raising revenue. Desty, Taxn. 306. And to the like effect is State v. Hoboken, 38 N. J. L. 280." The court then proceeded to quote Dillon, Municipal Corporations, 857, to the effect that, in the case of a license under the police power, only "a reasonable fee for the license, and the labor attending its issue, may be charged." Several cases were cited to show that, because of the unreasonable amount exacted for a license, its imposition was considered as an exercise of the taxing, and not of the police, power. The authorities are abundant in support of the proposition, but its correctness is so fully established that it is hardly necessary to reproduce them in this opinion. We will refer, however, by way of further illustration, to the instructive case of St. Paul v. Traeger, 25 Minn. 248, 83 Am. Rep. 462. The city of St. Paul had, by ordinance, required a license fee of $25 for every huckster of vegetables who plied his trade in the streets of the city. In determining whether this was a license or a tax, the court, in the course of the discussion, said: "It cannot be claimed that it was enacted in the exercise of any police power, for sanitary purposes, or for the preservation of good order, peace, or quiet of the city, because, neither upon its face, nor upon any evidence before us, does it appear that any provision is made for inspection, etc. . . . The annual sum exacted for the license is manifestly much in excess of what is necessary or reasonable to cover expenses incident to its issue. . . . No regulations being prescribed in reference to its prosecution under the license, there could be little, if any, occasion for the exercise of any police authority in supervising the business, or enforcing the ordinance, and no cause for any considerable expense on that account." The court held that the ordinance was not a police regulation. Inasmuch as a license fee must be prescribed in advance, and in many instances it cannot be determined with accuracy what the expenses incident to the regulation may be, the courts are not inclined to be too exact in placing an estimate upon them, so long as the sum demanded is not altogether unreasonable. But we have no difficulty in holding, in the present case, that the amount of $1,000, to be paid in each county in which the occupation is pursued, is enormously in excess of the probable expenses incident to the regulation. We have seen that in fact there is no regulation at all, and therefore no expense, except the insignificant amount necessary to defray the cost of simply issuing a license. If a license fee of $3 per month was held excessive in State v. Bean, supra, where very many of the elements of a police regulation were present, what shall we say of the license fee of $1,000 in this case, in which there is virtually no expense, and where there is not a single feature which indicates any police regulation whatever?

As the questions discussed are of much importance, and especially because they involve the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, we have been somewhat elaborate in the expression of our views. Entirely mindful of that most salutary principle that no court should declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional unless it is plainly so, and deeply conscious, as we are, of the profound responsibility imposed upon those whose province it is to exercise so delicate a duty, we cannot hesitate in deciding that the act under examination is incapable of being sustained, in any point of view. Considered as a tax (and this, we think, is its true character), it is void for want of uniformity; and, considered as an exercise of the police power, it is likewise void, because of its restrictive or prohibitory character, as well as the unreasonable amount exacted as a license fee.

Affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Lewis N. HOPKINS, Collector of Taxes,
Appt.
v.

BAKER BROS. & CO.

(.....Md.....)

1. Stock in trade of a partnership doing business in a city, which remains there until it is sold in course of business is "permanently located" there for purposes of taxation, without regard to the residence of members of the firm, within the meaning of the exception in Md. Const., art. 3, § 51, making goods taxable at the residence of the owner, except when "permanently located" elsewhere.

2. A stock in trade of a trading partnership is properly assessed to the firm

*NOTE.—Tax on partnership property.
As regards place of taxation.*

Personal property of a partnership which is in the same state as its principal place of business is regarded as belonging at such place, for the purposes of taxation, under statutes taxing partnerships at their place of business, and is not taxable elsewhere in the state. Monroe v. Greenhoe, 54 Mich. 9; Osterhout v. Jones, Id. 223; Williams v. Saginaw, 51 Mich. 130; Putnam v. Fife Lake Twp. 45 Mich. 123; Torrent v. Yager, 52 Mich. 303; Hoadley v. Middlesex County Comrs. 105 Mass. 619; McCoy v. Anderson, 47 Mich. 502; Stockwell v. Brewer, 59 Me. 290; Fairbanks v. Kittredge, 24 Vt. 9; St. Johnsbury School District No. 1 v. Kittredge, 27 Vt. 650.

So a firm of cattle dealers having a place of business, is not taxable at another place where it has the use of the stock yards office in common with other dealers. Farwell v. Hathaway, 151 Mass. 242.

So a firm having stores at two places and sending bales to a mill at another place to be made over, which mill is owned and run by other parties, is not taxable at such place although the firm is allowed to sort and ship its goods from such mill. Lee v. Templeton, 6 Gray, 579.

So a bookselling and publishing firm having a place of business, is not taxable in another city where it keeps some of its plates stored, even though it has some printing and binding done in such place under contract. Little v. Cambridge, 9 Cush. 293.

But a firm having a factory at another place where starch is made, stored, and kept till sold has a "place of business" there although the sales were made at its regular place of business at another city in the same state. Barker v. Watertown, 137 Mass. 227.

An inhabitant is taxable in the state wherein he resides for his interest in a firm established and doing business in another state. Bemis v. Boston, 14 Allen. 363.

Under Kan. Gen. Stat., p. 1023, providing that personal property shall be listed in the township or city in which the person charged with the tax resided, a firm residing in one county and having personal property in another is liable only for tax in the former. Griffith v. Carter, 8 Kan. 565.

But Kansas Act 1874, § 7, requiring property of a firm to be listed by the principal accounting officer or by an agent or partner thereof, implies that it is to be listed as a whole at the place where one of the firm resided and carried on the business and not that each should list his part separately. Swallow v. Thomas, 15 Kan. 56.

instead of to the individual members, where the law provides for the assessment of goods at a place where they are permanently located, without regard to the residence of the owners.

(January 12, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel the payment of a tax assessed against property constituting a stock of goods in defendant's possession for purposes of trade. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas G. Hayes, for appellant:

The legal title to the stock in question is in the firm and not in the individual members of the firm, and is hence taxable to the firm and

The locality of the capital of a house purchasing cotton on commission is the same as the domicile of the members of the firm where they reside in the same city in which their business is located and is not regarded as distributed through the state where sent to purchase cotton. St. John v. Mobile, 21 Ala. 234.

Under Indiana Act Dec. 18, 1872, requiring boats to be listed where enrolled, registered, or licensed, they cannot be taxed where a firm of owners reside if they are not kept in that town. Eversole v. Cook, 92 Ind. 223.

But under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 6293, providing that boats shall be listed where the owners or one of them resides, if a boat owned by a firm is listed where two of the firm reside it is not also subject to taxation in another place in the same county where another member resides. Cook v. Port Fulton, 106 Ind. 170.

And under Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 7, § 13, and Stat. 1890, chap. 120, § 2, ships are to be taxed to the partners jointly where their business is carried on. Peabody v. Essex County Comrs. 10 Gray, 97.

A tax on a nonresident member of a firm may be levied in the state where such firm is doing business on his interest in the partnership to be collected from the property of the firm to which he belongs. Duer v. Small, 17 How. Pr. 201.

And a foreign firm having a resident partner and branch business in New York is liable to taxation in that place although the business there is tributary to the business abroad. Re McMahon, 66 How. Pr. 190.

But a resident partner in England, of a firm doing business in New York, is not liable for income tax of the firm in respect to profits made by buying and exporting goods from England. The profits which return to the resident partner in England as his share are taxable there. Sulley v. Atty-Gen. 5 Hurlst. & N. 711, 6 Jur. N. S. 1013, 8 Week. Rep. 472, reversing 4 Hurlst. & N. 769.

In Hubbardston Lumber Co. v. Covert, 35 Mich. 254, it was held that a firm has the characteristics of legal identity for the purpose of taxation, but this was not involved in the case. See also subheads—"Set-off for debts;" "Joint-stock association."

Set-off for debts.

In an assessment against the individual member of a firm for his interest in the property of the firm, he is not entitled to deduct the firm debts due in the state, but may have his proportionate share deducted if he makes a proper showing. State v. Parker, 34 N. J. L. 71.

It seems, in the absence of statute, that in East Jersey each member of the firm is assessed for his not to the individual members of the firm at their respective places of residence.

Goods and chattels are permanently located in Baltimore city when actually situated within its corporate limits, with no location elsewhere and not there temporarily, in transitu or on storage or deposit for temporary purposes.

The legislature had the power to say that the assessable value of the glass found in possession of appellees on the day of the assessment should be ascertained by the ascertainment of the average value of that glass as stock in trade for the year the taxes were levied.

State v. Sterling, 20 Md. 502.

The words "permanently located" as used in article 8, section 51, of Constitution, cannot be held to mean a location lasting forever. No such meaning is ever given to these words. The definition of "permanent" by the weight of judicial decisions does not embrace the idea of absolute perpetuity, but rather when used in connection with location, of indefinite duration.

And where three of the firm were nonresidents, the property of the firm was properly assessed where situated although the resident member lived in another city, but no deduction will be made for debts if the interest of the resident partner is not disclosed. Taylor v. Love, 48 N. J. L. 142.

And where one member of a firm resides in the state and the other members are nonresidents the firm is not entitled to deduction for debts. State v. McCheaney, 86 N. J. L. 548.

Joint-stock association.

The property of a joint-stock association that is a partnership is taxable at its place of business without regard to residence of its shareholders. Hoadley v. Middlesex County Comrs. 105 Mass. 519; Ricker v. American Loan & T. Co. 140 Mass. 846.

A joint-stock company is not exonerated from a tax imposed on insurance companies, "incorporated or associated under the laws of another government," even if the company is a partnership." Oliver v. Liverpool & L. L. & F. Ins. Co. 100 Mass. 581.

And a joint-stock company that was a partnership was taxable as a corporation under N. Y. Laws 1881, chap. 861, providing that every association organized under any law in this state shall be liable to pay tax on its corporate franchises or business. People v. Wemple, 6 L. R. A. 308, 117 N. Y. 138.

But a joint-stock company that is a partnership is not taxable under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat., pt. 1, chap. 12, title 4, § 1, providing that all moneyed or stock corporations shall be taxed on their capital in a certain manner. People v. Coleman, 16 L. R. A. 183, 138 N. Y. 279, affirming 87 N. Y. S. R. 120; Hoey v. Coleman, 46 Fed. Rep. 221; Byers v. Coleman, Id. 224.

And a statute imposing a tax on the shares of stock companies is invalid as applied to a partnership, under a constitutional provision that a tax must be imposed on some produce or goods, and a share is not a commodity. Gleason v. McKay, 184 Mass. 419; Ricker v. American Loan & T. Co. supra.

Name in which the assessment is made.

Firm property should be assessed against the firm in the partnership name, but slight discrepancy will not invalidate where no one has been misled. Van Dyke v. Carleton, 61 N. H. 574; Hill v. Graham, 73 Mich. 659; Lyle v. Jacques, 101 Ill. 644.

But in Thibodaux v. Keller, 20 La. Ann. 508, it was held that a purchaser of property sold for taxes belonging to Keller & Co. as the property of J. N. Keller for taxes of J. N. Keller, obtains no title. It seems that there an assessment is on a footing with a judgment. In Van Dyke v. Carleton, supra, the name of the firm was reversed. In Hill v. Graham, 22 L. R. A.

supra, a statute provided that an assessment in the wrong name would not invalidate. And in Lyle v. Jacques, supra, the name was one used by that firm doing business under several names but still the same firm.

Real estate handed in with other property belonging to the firm is properly assessed in the name of the firm. Hubbard v. Winsor, 15 Mich. 148.

Where timber land of a member of a nonresident firm is listed to such firm by its agent in the name of the firm, a levy against logs belonging to the firm for such tax was sustained. Sage v. Burlingame, 74 Mich. 120.

Dissolution.

If firm property is taxable, the subsequent dissolution of the firm will not affect the right to enforce the tax. Blodgett v. Muskegon, 60 Mich. 580; Robinson v. Ward, 18 Ohio St. 238.

And a tax assessed after dissolution and paid under protest, cannot be recovered back from the town if the affairs of the firm had not been wound up or there was firm property on hand. Oliver v. Lynn, 180 Mass. 148.

But in Von Phul v. New Orleans, 24 La. Ann. 261, it was held that a firm was improperly assessed after notice of dissolution had been duly published.

And a partner who paid taxes for the firm to prevent seizure after the firm had dissolved for taxes which were then due, may set off the same against his copartner when sued by him on a note given before seizure for such partner's interest. Evans v. Bradford, 35 Ind. 537.

But a partner renting his copartner's interest at dissolution cannot defeat the claim for rent by suffering a sale of an undivided one half for taxes due prior to the dissolution, as it was his duty to pay the whole notwithstanding the retiring partner said he would not allow such taxes if paid. Chapin v. Streeter, 124 U. S. 360, 31 L. ed. 475.

A purchaser of a partnership interest assuming the liabilities of the firm is bound to pay the taxes outstanding against the share of the retiring member. Wheat v. Hamilton, 53 Ind. 256.

But a partner is not liable for the firm tax after he had disposed of his interest in the firm, before the time for assessing. Washburn v. Walworth, 138 Mass. 499.

And in the absence of agreement one partner is not liable to the others for taxes paid by the firm on capital borrowed of such first-named member. Conn v. Conn, 23 Or. 452.

The interest in a firm in California, of a member residing in New York, is not such a debt at his death as to be assessable against his executors in New York as the surviving partners owe no debt to them until after liquidating the firm debts. People v. Coleman, 44 Hun, 20. L. T.

Emmens, 4 C. B. 479; Newton v. Mahoning County Comrs. 100 U. S. 562, 25 L. ed. 712; Harris v. Shaw, 18 Ill. 465.

Bank of Chicago*, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 490, 22 L. ed. 189) is limited in Maryland by the constitution; and under this limitation even special statutes for the taxation of partnerships as individuals, such as exist in other states, would be invalid.

The stock in trade of a merchant is not "goods and chattels permanently located."

The statute does not speak of such personal property as may be permanently located, but singles out "goods and chattels" by which is meant visible, tangible, movable things.

Kirkland v. Brune, 31 Gratt. 181.

And in this case the visible, tangible, movable pieces of glass have no permanent location whatever.

If a ship kept by a merchant at his dock sails away to return again, it has in a sense a permanent home there. There is far more permanency of location in this than in a box of glass which is intended to be sold and sent away never to return. And yet a ship is not "goods and chattels permanently located."

It is no argument to urge the equity of business men paying their taxes in their place of business.

Hooper v. Baltimore, supra.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was tried in the Baltimore city court on an agreed statement of facts. The agreement shows that Charles J. Baker, Wm. Baker, Jr., and Charles E. Baker compose the firm of Baker Bros. & Co.; that Charles E. Baker is a resident of Baltimore city and the other two members of the firm are residents of Baltimore county; that Charles J. Baker has a four-tenths interest and the other two have each a three-tenths interest in the firm. It is admitted that the place of business of the firm is on Charles street in Baltimore city, at which place is kept the stocks of the partnership of an average value of $80,000; that the firm, has been assessed by the appeal tax court of Baltimore city for $80,000 on their stock and $750 on their horses used in their business and taxes $1,393.95 for state and city taxes for 1892.

The appellees declined to pay those taxes but were willing to pay on the horses, which they keep permanently in the city, and on the three-tenths interest of Charles E. Baker. The question raised by the agreed statement of facts and the prayers were whether taxes could be levied and collected from the whole stock of the firm or whether only the three-tenths interest of Charles E. Baker therein was liable.

The court below decided that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover the amount of taxes due for the horses, and for the interest of Charles E. Baker in the whole stock of the partnership. A judgment was entered accordingly for $432.38, with interest and costs, and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The appellees rely upon section 51 of article 3 of the Constitution of Maryland, which provides that "the personal property of residents of this state shall be subject to taxation in the county or city, where the resident bona fide resides for the greater part of the year for which the tax may or shall be levied, and not elsewhere, except goods and chattels permanently located which shall be taxed in the city or county where they are so located." The principal question to be determined is the meaning of the term "permanently located" as used in section of the constitution it being contended by the appellees that the goods and chattels composing their stock in trade are not "permanently located" in the city of Baltimore. Article 16 of the Declaration of Rights asserts that "every person in the state or person holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of public taxes for the support of the government, according to his actual worth in real or personal property."

Taking this in connection with the provision of the constitution above quoted, it is clear that it was contemplated by the framers of the constitution that personal property such as that referred to in this case should be taxed somewhere. If a resident of Baltimore county has personal property (carriage and horses for example) which go in and out of the city without having any permanent abiding place in the city, he should pay taxes on the same in Baltimore county. The object of the constitutional provision was to insure as far as possible taxation once, and to prevent it more than once on the same property. As the situs of personal property is ordinarily the place of residence of the owner, the constitution provides that personal property should be taxed where the owner bona fide resides for the greater part of the year, but as that provision alone might work great hardships on the county or city where goods and chattels of the owner are permanently located, the exception was made. Goods and chattels permanently located at the residence of the owner are to be taxed there, so what might be called his "floating goods and chattels" are taxed at the place of his residence, because they have no actual situs of their own, and hence that of their owner is adopted, but such goods and chattels as compose the stock in trade of the appellees are not carried backwards and forwards between Baltimore county or some other county and the city of Baltimore. As long as they are the property of the appellees they are located in Baltimore city, and they are as "permanently located," there as such goods and chattels can be anywhere. They are not manufactured or purchased to be kept as long as they remain in existence.

The separate articles constituting the stock may continue the property of the appellees for a day, a week, a month, a year, or longer, but until they are sold they remain permanently in Baltimore, and are not moved from place to place. That is clearly what is meant by "permanently located"—not that the goods and chattels must remain until they are worn out or indefinitely. The agreed statement of facts shows that the average value of the stock carried by the appellees is $80,000 and that they were assessed for that amount. In other words, the appellees keep constantly on hand at their place of business in Baltimore city $80,000 worth of goods and chattels in the shape of glass, etc. It may be true that $5,000 worth of glass may be sold and shipped away to-day, and another lot of glass worth $5,000 may be substituted for it to-day or to-morrow, but the stock of goods and chattels of the value of $80,000 is kept on hand—is permanently located at their place of business. It is not necessary to itemize the stock in trade when it is assessed. The assessors examine the stock—the goods and chattels—and fix their value for taxation, just as they do the furniture or other tangible personal property at the respective residences of the appellees. If the contention of the appellees is to prevail, their merchandise cannot be taxed anywhere. No merchant expects to keep his stock permanently on hand in the sense that term is used by the learned counsel for the appellees. He expects to sell as soon as he can receive his price, and as he sells he replenishes his stock. The articles are changing from day to day, but the stock which represents the aggregate of the goods and chattels remains about the same. Yet, can it be claimed that a merchant who resides and carries on his business in Baltimore is not to be taxed for his stock in trade. A reasonable construction must be given the constitutional provision, and we must bear in mind the object in taxing goods and chattels permanently located in the city or county where they are so located.

If the position of the appellees is correct it is possible to have hundreds of thousands of dollars, probably millions, of tangible personal property, goods, and chattels, within the city of Baltimore, having the benefit of its police and fire protection from year to year and yet not contribute one dollar to the support of the police and fire departments. Merchants transacting business in Cumberland, Hagerstown, Frederick, Annapolis and other incorporated cities and towns in the counties could escape all municipal taxes on their stock in trade by living beyond the corporate limits of those cities and towns, whilst those living within such cities and towns must pay the municipal as well as the state and county taxes on their stock in trade. Such a construction of the law would encourage fraud. A resident of a remote county might carry a large stock in trade in Baltimore city or on the eastern shore without the knowledge of the authorities of the county where he resided.

We recognize fully the force of the argument of counsel for the appellees that property cannot be taxed simply because it may seem inequitable to permit it to escape taxation. But when we are called upon to construe statutes or the constitution on this subject it is our duty in seeking the true interpretation of language used to place a reasonable construction upon it, and to bear in mind the fact that our constitution aimed to require all persons to bear their just share of the burden of taxation.

This case differs wholly from those of Hooper v. Baltimore, 13 Md. 464, and Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Appeal Tax Court of Baltimore, 50 Md. 397, cited by the appellees. Harper was a resident of Baltimore county and this court decided that his ship was not permanently located "within the state," and hence it could not be taxed by

Baltimore city. The statute then in force required property owned by residents of this state, and not permanently located elsewhere within the state, to be assessed to the owner in the county or city where he resided. The ship was registered in the custom house at Baltimore, but under the law of congress existing at that time, she could not be registered elsewhere whilst the owner resided in Baltimore county, as Baltimore city was the port of entry of the district which embraced Baltimore county, and hence the fact that she sailed from the port of Baltimore city to foreign ports did not permanently locate her there if, in the language of the court in that case, "a vessel built for and actually employed in the foreign trade can be said to be permanently located anywhere." The case in 50 Md. 397, supra, determined that the rolling stock of the company could not be assessed in Baltimore city, as it was not permanently located there within the meaning of the General Assessment Act of 1876, which had a provision very similar to that in the constitution. The court decided that Baltimore city was not the home office of the corporation. It said on page 416: "The engines and cars of the appellant have no abiding place or permanent location in this state, so as to become incorporated with the other permanent property of the state, and are only brought here transiently when employed in the operation of the road." The court uses as equivalent terms "abiding place and permanent location." In this case the goods and chattels have an "abiding place" in Baltimore city; and are "incorporated with the other permanent property" of the city. They are not simply in transitu or temporarily located, and it is not a strained construction of the language of the constitution to determine, as we do, that the stock in trade of the appellees is "permanently located" in the city of Baltimore, and hence liable to taxation there.

We do not deem it necessary to determine whether this stock could be taxed in Baltimore city by reason of the fact that it is owned by a firm transacting business there. We are of the opinion, however, that it is perfectly proper to assess the property to the firm instead of to the individual members thereof according to their respective interests.

There are many reasons why this should be so. The interest of the partners may vary from time to time, and should it be necessary at any time to sell the property for taxes it might be very inconvenient and cause serious delay in the collection of taxes if the interests of partners must be determined as they would likely have to be before any one would purchase.

As partnership assets are liable for partnership debts before they are for the debts of the individual members of the firm it would be proper to levy the taxes against the firm. Assessing the firm instead of the individual members, will save much inconvenience to the authorities and do no injustice to any one. It follows from what we have said that the judgment below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed and new trial awarded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Re WILL OF Julia C. HOLT, Deceased.

Georgiana NEEDHAM et al., Respts.,

v.

Lydia M. BORDEN et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. Attesting witnesses to a will must be such as are competent at the date of attestation, and, if then competent, their subsequent incompetency, from whatever cause, will not prevent the probate of the will.
2. The rule of competency in such cases, in this state, is that defined by the statute. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 73, §§ 6, 7.
3. A married person is not to be deemed an incompetent attesting witness at the time of the execution of a will, simply because the husband or wife of such person is a beneficiary under the will.
4. And the question of incompetency in such case can only arise subsequently on the probate of the will, upon his or her examination as a witness, and then only in the single contingency that such beneficiary becomes a contestant, and does not then consent to the examination of the witness.

5. The statute makes void a legacy to an attesting witness. But this provision does not, under the laws of this state, apply to the husband or wife of such witness. Neither has any present direct or certain interest in a legacy to the other.

(December 29, 1893.)

APPEAL by contestants from an order of the District Court for Dakota County, affirming an order of the Probate Court, which admitted to probate an alleged will of Julia C. Holt, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jay W. Crane, for appellants:

By the common law the husband of a legatee could not be a competent witness to a will.

Giddings v. Turgeon, 58 Vt. 106; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 106 Mass. 474, 8 Am. Rep. 356; Holdfast v. Dowling, 2 Strange, 1253; Hatfield v. Thorp, 5 Barn. & Ald. 589; 1 Jarman, Wills, pp. 71-73; 2 Redf. Wills, p. 4, note 3; 4 Kent, Com. p. 508; 1 Woerner, Administration, 75; Fortune v. Buck, 23 Conn. 1.

*Headnotes by VANDERBURGH, J.

NOTE.—The above case is interesting as expressing a decision that the competency of a person to attest a will is to be determined by his competency at that time to testify under the general statutory provisions as to witnesses where the statute makes no other provision as to witnesses to wills.

Our probate code provides that a will shall be "attested and subscribed in his (testator's) presence by two or more competent witnesses."

Gen. Laws 1889, § 19, p. 98. The word "witness" is defined:—"A witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received as evidence for any purpose, whether such declaration is made on oral examination, or by deposition or affidavit."

Minn. Stat. 1878, chap. 73, title 1, § 6.

Therefore before a person is and can be a witness as provided by section 6, chapter 73, he must be sworn and his declaration under oath received for some purpose.

The person who attaches his name to a will, attesting the signature of the person executing the same, is certainly not a witness within the meaning of section 6 of title 1 of chapter 73.

As it is not used in the statutory sense of section 6, the word "witnesses" as found in section 21 of the Probate Code must mean witnesses at common law.

Therefore the word "witnesses," in section 21, must be construed in accordance with the rules at common law.

The witnesses must be competent at the time of the attestation.

Hawes v. Humphrey, 9 Pick. 350, 20 Am. Dec. 481; Stewart v. Harriman, 56 N. H. 25, 23 Am. Rep. 408; 4 Kent, Com. 510; 1 Redf. Wills, 253, and note 1; 1 Jarman, Wills, p. 70; Hatfield v. Thorp and Holdfast v. Doucing, supra.

The attesting witnesses are regarded in law as persons placed around the testator, in order that no fraud may be practiced upon him in the execution of the will, and to judge of his capacity. They must therefore be competent witnesses at the time of the attestation; otherwise the will is not well executed.

2 Greenl. Ev. § 691, note 3.

It is contrary to the spirit of the law to place round the testator such an interested person as the husband of the legatee or devisee, to guard against fraud and judge of his capacity.

1 Woerner, Administration, 75; Giddings v. Turgeon, and Sullivan v. Sullivan, supra.

If this court should find that under the laws of Minnesota, E. Z. Needham is a competent witness to the will, it must modify the judgment of the district court and declare the will void as to Georgiana Needham.

Laws 1889, § 21, p. 98, Probate Code; Winslow v. Kimball, 25 Me. 498; Jackson v. Woods, 1 Johns. Cas. 168; Jackson v. Durland, 2 Johns. Cas. 314.

Messrs. Stringer & Seymour, for respondents:

All persons, except as hereinafter provided, having the power and faculty to perceive, and of making known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses.

Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 73, § 7.

Husband and wife are now made witnesses for and against each other.

Wilson v. Wilson, 43 Minn. 398.

No question is raised here by contestants but that E. Z. Needham testified with the permission of his wife. Mrs. Needham was in court and failed to object to Mr. Needham's so testifying, but her consent was given when she, through her attorney, called on him as a witness.

Wolford v. Farnham, 44 Minn. 159.

The mere fact that a husband is a legatee in a will does not disqualify the wife from being a competent witness to its execution.

Hawkins v. Hawkins, 54 Iowa, 443; Butes v. Officer, 70 Iowa, 343.

Maxwell v. Hill, 89 Tenn. 584, holds that a witness to a will, who becomes heir to the devisee upon the latter's death, intestate, after the death of the testatrix, is not "interested in the devise" within the meaning of the Code of Tennessee, section 3003, which provided that wills shall be subscribed by at least two witnesses, "neither of whom is interested in the devise."

Vanderburgh, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The will in question here contains a legacy to Georgiana Needham, estimated by the testator at about $400, and it was attested by two witnesses, one of which was E. Z. Needham, who is and was at the time of such attestation the husband of Georgiana. Mrs. Needham is the proponent of the will, and in the probate court objection was made by the contestants, appellants here, to the allowance and probate of the will on the ground that the husband of the proponent E. Z. Needham was not a competent witness to the will. The action of the probate court, allowing the will, having been affirmed by the district court, the case is brought here on appeal from the judgment of the last-named court.

1. The first question presented involves the competency of the attesting witness E. Z. Needham. Undoubtedly he must have been a competent witness at the time of the execution of the will. This is the established doctrine of the common-law authorities, from the case of Holdfast v. Doucing, 2 Strange, 1253, down to the present time (1 Redf. Wills, 253; 2 Greenl. Ev. par. 691; Morrill v. Morrill, 53 Vt. 78, 38 Am. Rep. 659); and it is clearly recognized in our statute (Probate Code, chap. 2, § 19), which requires that a will shall be attested and subscribed in the testator's presence by two or more competent witnesses. But, if competent at the time of the execution of the will, their subsequent incompetency, from whatever cause it arises, shall not prevent the probate and allowance of the will, if it is otherwise satisfactorily proven. The appellants, however, contend that the attesting witnesses must be such as would be competent under the common-law rule, and that they are impliedly not included in the definition of "witness" (Gen. Stat. chap. 73, § 6), because their competency is to be determined as of the time of the attestation, and not as of the time when they may be called to testify on the probate of the will. But this construction cannot be upheld. The cases from Massachusetts are not in point, because there the statutes removing the objection to the competency of witnesses on the ground of interest and of the relation of husband and wife are expressly declared not to apply to attesting witnesses to a will. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 106 Mass. 478, 8 Am. Rep. 356. The question of the competency of such witnesses in this state is determined by the statute. Gen. Stat. chap. 78, §§ 6, 7, 9, 10. An attesting witness is competent, if he be one who would at the same time be competent to testify in court to the facts which he attests; and so the courts hold. Thus in Jenkins v. Daves, 115 Mass. 601, an attesting witness is declared to be one who at the time of the attestation would be competent to testify; and in Morrill v. Morrill, 53 Vt. 78, 88 Am. Rep. 659, "competency to testify must exist at the time of the attestation. The attestation contemplated the subsequent testimony to the facts attested when the will should be proved. The incompetency of the husband or wife to testify where either was an interested party at the common law arose out of the unity of interest and of personal relations. This unity of interest may be removed, and yet, owing to the unity and confidential nature of their personal relations, the common-law rule in respect to competency remains, on grounds of public policy. Lucas v. Brooks, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 453, 21 L. ed. 783; Giddings v. Turgeon, 58 Vt. 110. It is conceded that the unity of interest, so far as relates to property, has been done away with by statute (Wilson v. Wilson, 43 Minn. 400), and the general disqualification to testify on the ground of interest is removed by Gen. Stat., chap. 78, § 7; but it is denied that the statute has removed the general incompetency growing out of the marriage relation. But the only limitation upon the competency of either is found in section 10, which provides that neither party shall be examined without the consent of the other. They are not thereby made incompetent witnesses, nor are they to be classed as such, though their right to be examined is contingent upon the consent of that one for or against whom the witness may be offered. It does not follow that a married person is incompetent to attest a will because the husband or wife of such person is a beneficiary under the will. He can only become incompetent in a single contingency, and that is, in case such interested party shall become a contestant on the subsequent probate of the will. If the latter be not a contesting party, he is in no position to raise the objection, and he may not choose to do it if he is; and if he be one of the proponents, he thereby consents to the testimony of the attesting witnesses. The contingency which would make him incompetent may never arise, and if it does, it must be deemed to arise subsequent to the act of attestation. In the case at bar, then, what evidence is there that the witness is incompetent? The wife is proponent, and offers to examine her husband as a witness. No question, therefore, in respect to his competency is raised. Incompetency in a witness is not presumed, and the question is to be determined when the offer to examine the witness is made, and then the facts are to be ascertained by the court. The witness is not shown to be incompetent in this case, and his evidence on the probate of the will was properly received. In Tillotson v. Prichard, 60 Vt. 107, it is held that the wife of the grantor in a Minnesota deed was a competent attesting witness thereto, under the provisions of the statute we have been considering, and the court says "that she was a competent witness, and might be examined with the consent of her husband," and also held, as we do, that the plaintiff, by offering the deed in evidence, consented to her being a witness.

2. The appellant also contends that if the husband be a competent witness, then the legacy to his wife should be held void under the statute which annuls beneficial devisees, etc., to a subscribing witness on account of the marital relation. But there is nothing in this point. The husband has no direct or certain interest in the legacy to his wife. It is absolutely hers in her own right, and free from his control. Gen. Stat. chap. 69; Wilson v. Wilson, supra. The only devisees or legacies which the statute annuls are those made to subscribing witnesses, which clearly does not apply to the husband or wife of the legatee. In England, where husband and wife are competent witnesses (Taylor, Ev. pp. 1145, 1147), the statute has gone further (1 Vict. chap. 26, § 15), and also avoids gifts, legacies, and devises to the husband or wife of an attesting witness. It could not be done without the statute. This legislation assumes both the competency of the witnesses and that they had no interest in the legacies which would have made the same void without the aid of legislation to that effect. The construction we have adopted is in conformity with the spirit of modern legislation on the general subject of the rights of husband and wife, and the practical results will no doubt be no more serious than in the case of parents or children, who may unquestionably attest deeds and wills for each other. 1 Alb. L. J. 246. It is a matter largely for the judgment of the legislature.

Judgment affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

QUEEN INSURANCE CO. et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

STATE OF Texas.

(.....Tex.....)

1. A combination of insurance companies to establish uniform rates of insurance and of agents' commissions is not illegal under the Texas Anti-trust Law of March 30, 1899, prohibiting trusts for restrictions in trade or the production, price, or rates of transportation for commodities or articles of commerce, since a contract of insurance is not "trade" nor is it an "article of commerce" or a "commodity."

NOTE.—In connection with the elaborate review of the anti-trust legislation in the above case, see State v. Phipps (Kan.) 18 L. R. A. 657, which held 22 L. R. A.

that a combination of insurance companies was within the prohibition of the statute.

- 2. The words "restrictions in trade" in an anti-trust law making such restrictions a felony punishable by heavy penalties, by fine or imprisonment, cannot be construed to include all contracts which in any sense restrict trade, but are limited to combinations such as those between producers or dealers to limit production or supply of an article and thus acquire a monopoly of it and then unreasonably enhance prices, or those quasi public corporations which might be disabled by the combination from performing duty to the public.
- 3. It is not illegal at common law for insurance companies to make a combination to establish uniform rates of insurance and of commissions to agents.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Travis County in favor of the state in a proceeding to enjoin an alleged illegal combination between defendants to fix rates and agents' fees, and to prohibit defendants from doing any additional business in the state. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meers, Leake, Henry, Miller & Reeves, for plaintiffs in error:

There is nothing in the statute that tends in the slightest degree to indicate that any strained or unnatural meaning is intended to be given to the words used.

The arrangement and collocation of the words plainly show that they are to be understood in their ordinary sense and signification. The only two words used in the statute, which it would appear from the allegations of the petition are relied upon to cover, or apply to, the business of fire insurance, are, "commerce" and "commodities." The business carried on by fire insurance companies is neither one nor the other.

The first clause of the act prohibiting combinations for the restriction of trade is wholly inoperative, because it does not specify what acts or conduct shall constitute "restrictions in trade."

The words, "restraint of trade," are universally limited to such restrictions as harmfully affect the public interest.

Powers, p. 226; Koehler v. Feuerbacher, 2 Mo App. 11.

The word "trade," as used in the first clause, as well as when considered in respect to the subsequent clauses, must be given its ordinary meaning.

The obvious and most usual sense in which the word "trade" is employed is to express traffic, exchange, and dealing.

Higginson v. Pomeroy, 11 Mass. 112; May v. Rice, 101 U. S. 237, 25 L. ed. 799.

The act is void under section 56, article 3, of the State Constitution, which provides that "the legislature shall not, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, pass any local or special law regulating labor, trade, mining or manufacturing."

Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550.

The 18th section of the Act, which excepts from its provisions, "agricultural products or livestock while in the hands of the producer or raiser" renders it obnoxious not only to the express denunciation of our Bill of Rights and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, but also to the fundamental principles—the very genius of free institutions—in which our whole system of government inheres.

Absolute equality of right in the same things is the only due course of law of the land.

Many of the cases, both state and federal, base their doctrine, with unanswerable force, not upon express limitations found in the written constitution of the state, but upon the great, inherited rights of the American people upon which their written constitutions are founded, and which, alone, give assurance of the permanency of their freedom.

The court erred in holding that the petition set out a good cause of action at common law, and that the state, by its attorney-general, had the right to prosecute the same.

The court erred in rendering judgment against the defendants, enjoining them from carrying out their agreement, not to pay the local agents more than 15 per cent commissions, and not to place their business in the hands of any agent who should demand and receive more than said amount of commission from any other company, because said agreement is not against the public interest, but, on the contrary, is in accord therewith, as its tendency would necessarily be towards the reduction of rates of insurance charged the public, through the lessening of the expenses of the business.

The combination charged against defendants, and the acts alleged to have been committed in pursuance thereof, namely, the attempt to fix a uniform rate of commission to be paid to soliciting agents, do not create or tend to create, or carry out, restrictions in trade; because, instead of working a public injury—as all contracts respecting trade must do, in order to be an illegal restriction thereof—the necessary tendency and result of this reduction of expenses with respect to agents must be to promote the public interest by cheapening the cost of indemnity against loss by fire to the great body of the people of the state.

Messrs. Charles A. Culberson, Atty-Gen., and Frank Andrews, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the State:

The petition set forth a good cause of action against the defendants and the attorney-general had the authority and it was his duty under the constitution and laws of this state to institute and maintain the action in behalf of the state and the court did not err in so holding.

The court did not err in rendering judgment against defendants enjoining them from carrying out their agreement to fix, regulate, and control the rates of commission to be paid to fire insurance agents for their labor in this state, and the evidence conclusively sustains the finding of the court that such combinations existed, and that the same created a monopoly and prevented free and unrestricted competition in the labor, occupation, and profession of fire insurance agents in the insurance business in the state of Texas.

Private corporations created by the legislature or under its authority may lose their franchises by misuser or non-user of them, and the same may be resumed by the government under a judicial judgment upon a quo warranto to ascertain and enforce a forfeiture. This is the common law of the land and is a tacit condition annexed to the creation of every such corporation; and the combination and monopoly alleged and proved in this case is such a misuser as would warrant the state in restraining the combination and resuming the franchises, such combination and monopoly being against the public policy of this state.

The Act of March 30, 1889, to define trusts and provide for punishments and penalties of corporations, persons, firms, and associations of persons connected with them, and to promote free competition in the state of Texas, includes within its terms and intendment every trust, combination and illegal conspiracy or other agreement in restraint of trade, and was intended to apply, and does apply, to every nature of trust, in whatsoever business, occupation, or profession the same may be formed.

The Act of March 30, 1889, defining and prohibiting trusts is not rendered unconstitutional because of the exception in the thirteenth section thereof, because the said Act applies equally to all persons and classes of persons in the same conditions and circumstances; and that court should never declare unconstitutional and void any statute which has received sanction of the co-ordinate legislative and executive departments of the government, unless there is an irreconcilable conflict between such statute and the organic law of the state.

On Petition for Rehearing.

The Act of March 30, 1889, applies to the combination charged in the petition and the construction of the court limiting the application of the Act was error.

What law could the legislature pass not obnoxious to the constitution that would include this combination? It used in the act under discussion every comprehensive term applicable to trusts known to our language; and it is also noticeable that all the terms were used in the disjunctive, showing conclusively that the legislature intended that each term should be separately considered.

That only such as were injurious were intended to be affected is evidenced by the very terms used. It is well understood that a "trust" is a combination for private gain, and to the public injury.

United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn., 58 Fed. Rep. 58; Kan. Laws 1889, chap. 257; Me. Laws 1889, chap. 266; Mo. Gen. Laws 1889, p. 96; Tenn. Laws 1889, chap. 250; N. C. Laws 1889, chap. 374.

In view of the public history which led to the various acts of legislation upon the subject of trusts, state and national, it seems to us that it does not admit of doubt that the legislature intended this act to apply to every trust which injured the public; and more especially is this true when applied to any business licensed by the state and affected with a public use. The business of insurance is charged with the public use in this state. The legislature had the power to charge it with a public use.

Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247.

The manifest purpose of the law being to prevent all combinations in restraint of trade to the public injury, and the language used for that purpose being sufficient to include this combination, the duty of the court is to effectuate the legislative intention.

1 Kent, Com. 461; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 240.

Upon examination of the question sent out and required to be answered by the great commercial agencies of Bradstreet's and Dun's it will be found that the questions of insurance are twice propounded. It will be noted that the question is not, Do you carry insurance? but, How much are you insured for? They assume that all mercantile concerns and interests are insured, and this assumption is based upon the intimate experience of the agencies with mercantile pursuits. It shows how intimately is this business connected with the trade of the world.

There are two important reasons why Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 163, 19 L. ed. 357, should not be authority in this case. In the first place the decision was rested upon the broader ground of a local contract, and the utterances as to insurance not being commerce are dicta. On the other hand the case was decided in 1868, more than a quarter of a century ago, when insurance had a very limited use, and such uses as it now has were not only unknown but at that time unthought of.

That the law-maker is incapable of the subtle distinctions and nice shadings of a learned judge, ought not to defeat the purpose of the 22 L. R. A.

Perry v. Keene, 56 N. H. 580; License Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 469, 18 L. ed. 500; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 197, 200, 201.

That the words "restrictions in trade" if given their ordinary and technical meaning, would make punishable all contracts in restraint of trade, however reasonable they may be, does not justify the restricted meaning given the words by the court; for if the legislature passes such an act, as it has the unquestioned authority to do, the only duty of the court is to enforce the law as it finds it, giving the words used their "ordinary meaning" or "signification."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. chap. 7, sub. 4, p. 197; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 55 Tex. 314, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. Teleg. Co.* 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708.

The uncontroverted evidence in the case shows that the combination controlled more than 80 per cent of all the fire insurance business in Texas.

This combination controls, and compels through fear of entire loss of business, a vast army of men to labor for it at greatly reduced compensation. The business is commerce itself; the labor of the agents is commerce itself; and the business of insurance as applied to both is trade itself, and the restrictions of the court upon the meaning of these terms will but prove a license to still greater evils and the exacting of still greater tribute.

United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn., 58 Fed. Rep. 58, is authority for the conclusion that only such restraints in trade as are unreasonable and to the public injury are within the meaning of an act of congress.

If it be correct, the necessity for restricting the meaning of the words to avoid the evils pointed out by the court that might possibly arise has been dissipated and the proper construction of the act would be as here contended for; that is, the combination charged is within the statute if the restraint is unreasonable.

The business of insurance in this state being charged with a public use, the state, through its attorney-general, independent of statute, may restrain those engaged in the business from carrying out a combination to the injury of the public, and prevent them from acquiring a virtual monopoly of the business.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 1 L. R. A. 894, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 385, 72 Tex. 404.

To transact insurance business a public franchise is required, and the consent of the state, through its proper officers, must first be obtained before the business can be pursued. These are just, reasonable, and constitutional regulations.

State v. Stone (Mo.) Dec. 4, 1893; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77.

The court is of opinion that the combination is not illegal, for the reason that insurance is not a "prime necessity."

In Richardson v. Buhl, 6 L. R. A. 457, 77 Mich. 632, friction matches were held to be prime necessities because of their daily use.

In India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, 14 La. Ann. 164, it was held that India bagging was an article of "prime necessity" to cotton planters.

In Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co., 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159, coal is held to be a "necessity."

In People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co., 5 L. R. A. 886, 54 Hun. 854, sugar was held to be a necessity.

In Santa Clara Valley Mill & Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 887, lumber is considered to be a necessity.

Any article of general use and benefit to the public, which affords to the public convenience, comfort, enjoyment, and profit, ought to be considered "a prime necessity." Insurance affords all these in this latter day of business progress, and has become an important factor in every business of the country and in the use and enjoyment of property and possessions and belongings.

The combination being hurtful to the public, and the business being charged with a public use and being free from unlicensed competition, and the injury being one which individuals cannot redress for manifest reasons, it becomes the duty of the attorney-general to take such action in the name of the state as will prevent and restrain the injury to the public.

Const. art. 4, § 22; State v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 81 Tex. 530; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 1 L. R. A. 849, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 335, 72 Tex. 404; United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co. 125 U. S. 274, 81 L. ed. 748; People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 353, 8 Am. Dec. 243.

The legislature has never attempted to say what rates insurance companies may collect as a tax from the public. We conclude, therefore, that the law only "allows" them to collect a reasonable tax or rate of insurance.

State v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. supra.

Section 4 of the Act requires the attorney-general to enjoin combinations and trusts in the name of the state. It is a declaration of public policy and must be so regarded. Being a valid law, its command to the attorney-general should not be disregarded; and being a declaration of public policy, must have weight with the court in connection with the authorities, if they need any further support, in holding that the injunction will be granted as prayed for.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the name of the state of Texas, by its attorney-general, against the Texas Insurance Club, an association of insurance agents, and against fifty-seven foreign insurance corporations doing business in this state under permits granted in pursuance of the statutes of the state. It is alleged in the petition that the Texas Insurance Club was created with the consent and by the procurement of the other defendants, with the object of organizing a combination for the purpose of fixing a uniform rate of insurance throughout the state upon a graduated scale, and of thereby preventing competition among each other, and at the same time of establishing a fixed rate of commission to be paid to the agents of such companies. It is claimed in the petition that the acts charged against the defendants show an illegal combination, as defined and denounced in the Act of March 30, 1889, entitled "An Act to Define Trusts and to Provide for Penalties and Punishment of Corporations, Persons, Firms and Associations of Persons Connected with Them, and to Promote Free Competition in the State of Texas." Laws 1889, p. 141. It is also claimed in the petition that the combination, purposes, and acts of the defendants are in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy, and therefore illegal at common law. The prayer was that the Texas Insurance Club be dissolved, and that the permits of the other defendants be canceled, or that the defendants be enjoined from carrying out the objects of the combination as alleged in the petition. The trial court held that the Act of March 30, 1889, did not apply to a combination to fix rates of insurance or the commissions of the agents of insurance companies, and also that the act was unconstitutional and void, by reason of the 13th section, which excepted from its operation "agricultural products and livestock while in the hands of the producer or raiser;" and sustained a demurrer to so much of the petition as charged a violation of that statute. However, the demurrer to that part of the petition which charged a combination alleged to be illegal at common law was overruled; and after hearing the evidence the court held that the effective allegations of the bill were sustained by the proof, and entered a decree enjoining the defendants from making or carrying out any agreements between them establishing fixed rates of insurance, or fixing the percentage of commissions to be paid to their agents. The defendants appealed, and the attorney-general filed cross-assignments of error. The court of civil appeals affirmed the judgment of the district court in every particular, but held that the Statute of March 21, 1889, was invalid, because it nowhere in terms declared that "trusts" such as are defined in the first section are illegal. Assuming that the whole case is before us upon the pleadings and facts as determined by the court of civil appeals, we will proceed to dispose of the questions involved in it, so far as may be necessary for its disposition.

The Act of March 30, 1889, reads as follows: "Act to Define Trusts and to Provide for Punishments and Penalties of Corporations, Persons, Firms and Associations of Persons Connected with Them, and to Promote Free Competition in the State of Texas. Section 1. Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Texas: That a trust is a combination of capital, skill or acts by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons, or of either two or more of them for either, any, or all of the following purposes: First—To create or carry out restrictions in trade. Second—To limit or reduce the production or increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities. Third—To prevent competition in manufacture, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or commodities. Fourth—to fix at any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established, any article or commodity of merchandise, produce or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption in this state. Fifth—To make or enter into, or execute or carry out any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind or have bound themselves not to sell, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity or article of trade, use, merchandise, commerce, or consumption below a common standard, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such articles, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article or commodity or transportation between them or themselves and others to preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or others in the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite any interest they may have in connection with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, that its price might in any manner be affected. . . . Sec. 4. Every foreign corporation violating any of the provisions of this act is hereby denied the right and prohibited from doing any business in this state, and it shall be the duty of the attorney-general to enforce this provision by injunction or other proceedings in the district court of Travis county, in the name of the state of Texas. . . . Sec. 6. Any violation of either or all the provisions of this act shall be and is hereby declared a conspiracy against trade, and any person who may be and may become engaged in any such conspiracy, or take part therein, or aid or advise in its commission, or who shall as principal, manager, director, agent, servant, or employé, or in any other capacity knowingly carry out any of the stipulations, purposes, prices, rates or orders thereunder, or in pursuance thereof, shall be punished by fine not less than fifty nor more than five thousand dollars and by imprisonment in the penitentiary, not less than one nor more than ten years, or by either such fine or imprisonment. Every day during a violation of this provision shall constitute a separate offense. Sec. 7. In any indictment for an offense named in this act it is sufficient to state the purposes or effects of the trust or combination, and that the accused was a member of, acted with, or in pursuance of it, without giving the name or description, or how, when or where it was created. Sec. 8. In prosecutions under this act it shall be sufficient to prove, that a trust or combination as defined herein exists, and that the defendant belonged to it, or acted for or in connection with it, without proving all belonging to it or proving or producing any article of agreement or written instrument on which it may have been based, or that it was evidenced by any written instrument at all. The character of the trust alleged may be proved by its general reputation. . . . Sec. 10. Each and every person, firm, corporation, or association of persons who shall in any manner violate any of the provisions of this act, shall for each and every day that such violation shall be committed or continued, forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars, which may be recovered in the name of the state of Texas, in any county where the offense is committed, or where either of the offenders reside, or in Travis county, and it shall be the duty of the attorney-general, or the district or county attorney to prosecute for and recover the same. Sec. 11. That any contract or agreement in violation of the provisions of this act shall be absolutely void and not enforceable either in law or equity. Sec. 12. That the provisions hereof shall be held cumulative of each other and of all other laws in any way affecting them now in force in this state. Sec. 13. The provisions of this act shall not apply to agricultural products or livestock, while in the hands of the producer or raiser. . . . The omitted sections throw no light upon the questions under consideration.

Admitting, for the present, that the language of the statute sufficiently manifests the intention of the legislature to make such combinations as are defined therein unlawful, and to make punishable acts committed in violation of its provisions, and that it is not in conflict with the constitution by reason of the fact that it exempts "agricultural products and livestock while in the hands of the producer or raiser" from its operation, we still have the question whether the combination charged in the petition is embraced within the provisions of the law. We are of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. To determine that it is so embraced, we must hold either that it is a restriction in trade, within the meaning of the first subdivision of section 1, and that these words sufficiently define an offense so as to make it punishable under our laws, or that the contract of insurance is a commodity such as is named in the other subdivisions. A combination between two or more insurance companies to increase their rates or to diminish the rates to be paid to their agents is, in a general sense, a combination in restraint of trade. But we think that the words "restrictions in trade" were not intended to receive that construction in the statute under consideration. If so intended, it may be gravely doubted whether, under our laws, they sufficiently designate an offense so as to make it punishable. Our Penal Code contains the following general provisions: "Art. 3. In order that the system of penal law in force in this state may be complete within itself, and that no system of foreign laws written or unwritten may be appealed to, it is declared that no person shall be punished for any act or omission unless the same is made a penal offense, and a penalty is affixed thereto by the written law of this state." "Art. 6. Whenever it appears that a provision of the penal law is so indefinitely framed, or of such doubtful construction that it cannot be understood, either from the language in which it is expressed or from some other written law of the state, such penal law shall be regarded as wholly inoperative." "Art. 9. This code and every other law upon the subject of crime which may be enacted, shall be construed according to the plain import of the language in which it is written, without regard to the distinction usually made between the construction of penal laws and laws upon other subjects; and no person shall be punished for an offense not made penal by the plain import of the words of the law." It must be conceded that except as to laws which result in a contract, or which create a vested right, it is not in the power of one legislature to control the action of another. Any statute laying down a canon of construction may, as a general rule, be repealed, either expressly or impliedly, by a subsequent statute; and where, under a rule of construction declared in a former law, a statute cannot take effect, which would be operative but for the former act, the argument is certainly cogent that it was the intention of the legislature in the last enactment to repeal the rule of construction laid down in the former. But it may be argued with equal force that a provision of the Penal Code affixing a punishment to an act named or otherwise designated, but not accurately and expressly defined, should be enforced, notwithstanding the rules of construction laid down in its general provisions. It may be plausibly maintained that the intention was that all the provisions should stand together, and that the special provision should be deemed an exception, and that the general rule should yield to it. Yet, under article 3 of the Penal Code as it existed before the Revised Statutes took effect, which "declared that no person should be punished for any act or omission as a penal offense, unless the same is expressly defined," it was held that a special provision of that Code, which sought to make punishable an act without defining it, was inoperative. Johnson v. State, 4 Tex. App. 63; Wolff v. State, 6 Tex. App. 195; Rogers v. State, 8 Tex. App. 401. See also State v. Foster, 31 Tex. 578. That provision was repealed by the Revised Statutes, which adopted in its stead the amended article 3, hereinbefore quoted. But in French v. State, 14 Tex. App. 76, article 398, as amended by the Act of March 27, 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 67), was held inoperative by reason of the rule of construction laid down in article 3, supra. In like manner, in Ex parte Gregory, 20 Tex. App. 210, 54 Am. Rep. 516, the rule of construction announced in article 9 was recognized as applicable to a municipal ordinance. That article was primarily intended to abrogate the rule of the common law that penal statutes should be construed strictly; but it expressly declares another rule, which is in accord with the common law, and which is founded upon the soundest reason. There is a maxim that ignorance of the law excuses no one, which is not true as applied to every case, for a man is not guilty of theft who honestly takes property under an honest claim of right, though he be mistaken as to the law. But it is true in the sense that no one can allege his ignorance of the law which makes a certain act penal, in justification of his commission of that act. If he be held bound to know the law, he should have the means of knowing it, and hence he should not be punishable for the infringement of a statute unless it designate with a fair degree of clearness and precision the act or omission which is forbidden by it. The offense need not be "defined," in the logical legal sense of that word, for general terms may be used, which in themselves require to be defined; but the terms employed should be sufficiently definite in their meaning as plainly to designate the very act which is sought to be made punishable by law.

Applying these rules of construction, we are of opinion that the acts charged against the defendants do not subject them to the forfeitures and penalties therein provided for, under that part of the statute which seeks to make unlawful combinations "to create or carry out restrictions in trade." These words are very comprehensive in any aspect, and, if their meaning is limited, it becomes difficult to define the sense in which they were employed by the legislature. In ordinary language, the word "trade" is employed in three different senses: First, in that of the business of buying and selling; second, in that of an occupation, generally; and, third, in that of a mechanical employment, in contradistinction to agriculture and the liberal arts. Ordinarily, when we speak of "trade," we mean commerce, or something of that nature; when we speak of "a trade," we mean an occupation, in the more general or the limited sense. In law, the words "restraint of trade" are fairly well defined; and the question presents itself whether, in the use of the words "restrictions in trade," the legislature meant to use the word "trade" in the last sense, or as the mere equivalent of "commerce" or "traffic." Some contracts in restraint of trade are held to be contrary to public policy, and unlawful in the sense that they will not be enforced by the courts. Others are lawful and enforceable. To be unlawful, they must be unreasonable. As to restraints which are reasonable, the authorities are not in accord, though the evident tendency of modern decisions is to uphold such contracts in doubtful cases. The rule as to contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade has been applied without question to very varied employments,—to professional men, such as attorneys at law and physicians, as well as to merchants, shopkeepers, carriers, and those engaged in mechanical pursuits of every character. The rule is founded both upon the ground that the public has an interest in the employment, and upon the further ground that it is contrary to public policy; that any person should wholly deprive himself of his right to pursue an occupation in which he is presumably skilled. See Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th Am. ed. *417, and English and American notes. But while a party may bind himself for an adequate consideration not to pursue his avocation within the limits of a prescribed locality, provided the limits be reasonable, he cannot bind himself not to follow his trade in any place whatever. Now, an agreement between two or more persons, by which one of them undertakes to bind himself not to follow his trade or practice his profession in a territory of prescribed limits, is "a combination," within the meaning of the statute under consideration. A contract between two or more to do a thing is a "combination of . . . acts" of such persons to bring about the performance of the contract. It is upon this theory, in part, that the charge made in the petition is based. Now, the clause of the act which we are endeavoring to construe makes no distinction between such restraints of trade as are reasonable and such as are unreasonable. Hence, if we should give to the words, "restrictions in trade" their ordinary technical meaning it would follow that the act made punishable all contracts in restraint of trade, however reasonable they may be. It would follow that if one merchant engaged in the hardware business should buy out another, such other agreeing not to pursue the same business on the same block or street, or in the same town, for a limited time, both would be subject to the penalties affixed by the act. It is probable that the legislature has the power to make such a law; but it is unreasonable to presume that they intended to make it, and no construction ought to be given to an act which would lead to such results, unless its language is so clear and unambiguous as to admit of no other conclusion. It is true that article 9 of the Penal Code, already quoted, requires us to construe the act "according to the plain import of the language in which it is written, without regard to the distinction usually made between the construction of penal laws and laws upon other subjects;" but when the words employed have different meanings, one being more limited than another, it does not require that we should construe them in the more comprehensive sense. The principle is inherent in the construction of all laws of doubtful import, that the intention of the legislature must be sought for, and, when discovered, must govern. In discovering that intention it is proper to look to the consequences of any particular interpretation, and, if they be found unreasonable or oppressive, such interpretation ought to be rejected. The penalty affixed by the act in question for a violation of its provisions is a fine of not less than $50, nor more than $5,000, and imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one, nor more than ten years, or by either such fine or imprisonment. Each day of the continuance of the combination is made a separate offense. The offense may be punished by confinement in the penitentiary, and is therefore a felony. We do not think that it was the purpose of the legislature to give to the word "trade" so comprehensive a meaning as would subject all parties to "contracts in restraint of trade" (as these terms are understood at common law) to such heavy penalties; and conclude that the word must be construed in a more restricted sense, and as synonymous with "traffic." In this sense it embraces the buying and selling of any article of commerce, the barter of such articles, and their transportation by common carriers; but it does not embrace the business of insurance, which is trade only in the sense that it is an occupation or employment.

If, therefore, the acts charged in the petition are punishable under the statute, they must be denounced by some other provision. Is the contract of insurance an "article of commerce" or a "commodity," within the meaning of those terms as used in the remaining four subdivisions of the statute? In Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the business of insurance, as carried on in one state by a company chartered by another, was not commerce between the states; and the same doctrine is affirmed by the supreme court of Kansas. State v. Phipps, 50 Kan. 609, 18 L. R. A. 657. We have no reason to doubt the correctness of the conclusion. It is only by a strained construction that the word "commerce" can be made to embrace the business of insurance, and to say that insurance is an article of commerce is a construction still more strained. It is an aid to commerce, but not commerce itself; nor is it an article of commerce. In Nathan v. Louisiana, 49 U. S. 8 How. 78, 12 L. ed. 993, the court says that a dealer in foreign exchange "is not engaged in commerce, but in supplying an instrument of commerce. He is less engaged in it than the ship builder, without whose labor foreign commerce could not go on." The word "commodity" has two significations. In its most comprehensive sense it means "convenience, accommodation, profit, benefit, advantage, interest, commodiousness;" but, according to Webster's International Dictionary, the use of the word in this sense is obsolete. Page 286. The word is ordinarily used in the commercial sense of any movable or tangible thing that is ordinarily produced or used as the subject of barter or sale; and we think that this was the meaning intended to be given to it by the legislature in the statute in question. This clearly appears by the context. The language descriptive of the second category of offenses—"to limit or reduce the production or increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities"—implies that a commodity is something that may be produced; so, by that description, of the third class, a commodity is something that may be manufactured, made, transported, and sold; in the fourth, it implies something that may be sold, used, or consumed; and so, also, the fifth and last class, it relates to a commodity that is the subject of sale and transportation. Insurance is neither "produced," "consumed," "manufactured," "transported," nor "sold," in the ordinary signification of any of these words, and therefore it is not within "the plain import" of the language employed in the act.

But there is another point of view from which the statute in question should be considered. Its title is, "An Act to Define Trusts, and to Provide for Penalties and Punishment of Corporations, Persons, Firms, and Associations of Persons Connected with Them, and to Promote Free Competition in the State of Texas." The term "trusts" is not here employed in a technical legal sense. By very recent commercial usage, the meaning of the word has been extended so as to comprehend combinations of corporations or capitalists for the purpose of controlling the price of articles of prime necessity, or the charges of transportation for the public. The formation of gigantic combinations for these purposes in late years has created alarm and excited the liveliest interest in the public mind. The amount of discussion which it has invoked, considering the time during which it has progressed, is probably without parallel. See 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. 856, and notes. In the year 1888 the discussion seems to have become general, and in 1889 many legislatures, including our own, made laws for the purpose of punishing and repressing such conspiracies. Id. 1851, note 2. Notable instances of these combinations were those of the manufacturing corporations engaged in refining sugar, which were declared illegal by the court of appeals of New York in the cases of People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 121 N. Y. 582, 9 L. R. A. 39; "The Cotton-Seed Oil Trust" (State v. American Cotton Oil Trust, 40 La. Ann. 8); "The Diamond Match Trust" (Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L. R. A. 457); "The Chicago Gas Trust" (People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 180 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497); "The Standard Oil Trust" (Rice v. Rockefeller, 56 Hun. 516); "The Cattle Trust" (Gould v. Head, 83 Fed. Rep. 886); and "The Alcohol Trust" (State v. Nebraska Distilling Co. 29 Neb. 700). The instances of combinations shown by the cases cited serve to illustrate the causes of popular discontent, and the evils which the legislatures of several states sought to remedy by direct statutory enactments upon the subject. They were combinations organized for the purpose of affecting the prices of articles of prime importance in commerce, or the rates of transportation and intercommunication. The evils resulting from these practices were doubtless paramount in the minds of our legislators when they passed the statute under consideration, and it was to repress these practices that the law was enacted. By "the plain import of its language" it makes unlawful all combinations to raise or depress the price of all articles of commerce whatever, or to increase or diminish the rates of transportation of such articles. It seems to us, therefore, that the words in the first subdivision of section 1 of the Act—"to create or carry out restrictions in trade"—were intended only as a general expression of the purpose of the law, and that the acts defined in the subsequent members of the section were intended as a specific definition of what was meant in the first. National Benefit Co. v. Union Hospital Co., 45 Minn. 272, 11 L. R. A. 437, was a case involving the question of a partial restraint of trade, and in their opinion the court says: "There are two classes of cases, some of which appellants have cited, which are often confounded with, but are clearly distinguishable from, cases like the present, and stand upon an entirely different footing. The one is combinations between producers or dealers to limit the production or supply of an article so as to acquire a monopoly of it, and then unreasonably enhance prices. The other is where a corporation of a quasi public character, charged with a public duty, as a railway company, gas company, or the like, enters into a contract restrictive of its business, which would disable it from performing its duty to the public." We think it was to combinations of the character described in these remarks that our statute was intended to apply, and not to combinations of persons engaged in any employment which may be restrictive of that business. But it is a rule of construction that each word and sentence should be presumed to be intended for a purpose, and that each should be given effect; and it may be argued that our construction destroys the effect of the words in the first clause, and that under such construction they might have been omitted without changing the meaning of the section. But the argument defeats itself. If the words "restrictions in trade" are not to be limited in their meaning, then all the subsequent parts of the section were unnecessary, and might have been omitted without altering the sense. Every act therein defined is clearly a "restriction in trade," in the most comprehensive meaning of those terms. The same argument may be made in reference to the words "article" and "commodity," and it may be said they should be construed to have a different meaning. But, if the word "commodity" was employed in its broadest meaning, it embraced "article," and the latter might have been omitted. The fact is, the section of the act under consideration abounds in tautology; and its general structure is such that rules based upon grammatical niceties should not prevail over broader and more liberal rules of construction. Our conclusion is that the case stated in the petition does not come within the provisions of the statute; but we are not prepared to concur with the court of civil appeals in holding that the whole act is inoperative. It is true that, while trusts are defined in the first section, nowhere, either in that or any other section, are they expressly declared unlawful. The following sections provide forfeitures for corporations and punishment for persons who "violate any of the provisions of the act," but they do not designate what shall constitute a violation of its provisions in any direct terms. Confining ourselves to the letter of the law, there is a clear hiatus,—a lack of connection in its provisions. But the legislature evidently intended to affix a punishment to some acts, and it is reasonable to presume that the acts they have defined were those intended to be forbidden. This intention is made more evident by the sixth section, which declares that a violation of the provisions of the act is "a conspiracy against trade," etc.; also by the seventh, which provides that it shall be sufficient, in an indictment under the act, "to state the purposes and effect of the trust or combination and that the accused was a member of and acted with or in pursuance of it, without giving its name or description, or how, when, or where it was created." The eighth section also provides that it shall be sufficient to prove upon the trial that "the trust or combination as defined herein exists and that the defendant belonged to it or acted for or in connection with it, without proving all the members belonging to it," etc. There is no express declaration that trusts are unlawful,—the acts which are declared to constitute a trust are not expressly made punishable, nor is any act expressly declared to be a violation of the provisions of the statute; yet the language is sufficient, we think, to manifest unmistakably the intention of the legislature to punish as offenses some of the acts defined in the first section, and it is but reasonable to conclude that the purpose was to subject them all to a like punishment. The intention of the legislature is the aim of statutory construction, and where, though not expressed, it is clearly manifested by implication from the language used, we cannot say that it should not have effect. That which is not expressed in words may be "plainly imported" by implication. We have deemed it proper to say this much upon this question, although its determination, in our opinion, is not necessary to a decision of this case. The other question, as to the validity of the statute, involves a construction of the constitution, and we do not feel called upon to determine it. The decision of a grave constitutional question, although involved in a case, is properly pretermitted until a controversy arises in which such decision becomes necessary to its disposition.

Having determined that the acts charged against the defendants are not embraced within the provisions of the statute, it becomes necessary to decide whether or not they are unlawful at common law. We have found no direct decision in any court of last resort upon the point. The decisions upon cases involving similar questions are not altogether harmonious. We have seen that contracts in unreasonable "restraint of trade" are illegal in the sense that they are not enforceable. Of these, there is a well-defined class,—those in which the parties seek to bind themselves by an agreement that one of them shall cease to pursue his vocation. The terms are usually employed by the courts in this sense. It is clear that the combination in question is not of this class. But, employing the terms in a looser sense, it is frequently said that agreements to raise or depress prices between persons engaged in the same business is a combination in restraint of trade. That such contracts, as applied to certain kinds of business, are unlawful, in the sense that they are not valid, there is no doubt; but whether the rule extends to every class of business is a different question. It extends to a business in which the public have a right, as distinguished from a business which may be merely beneficial to the public. Such is the carrying trade, and especially the business of transportation by railroad and communication by telegraph. Railroad and telegraph companies derive their right to condemn property from the fact that their business is established for a public use. So, the business of gas companies, who have acquired a right to lay their pipes in the public streets, in analogy to that of railroad companies, is treated as public. People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497. Thus far we may clearly see our way; but when we come to a business not public in its character, in the sense previously indicated, difficulties arise. We take it as being well settled that all the combinations among dealers in provisions or other articles of prime necessity are deemed in law contrary to public policy, and contracts to effect or carry out such combinations are held void. India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, 8 La. Ann. 164; Santa Clara Valley Mill & Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 178, 8 Am. Rep. 159. Combinations of this character are commonly called "monopolies," but they are not the technical monopolies known to the common law. 4 Bl. Com. chap. 12, § 9. The doctrine that they are illegal probably had its origin in the laws against forestalling, regrating, and engrossing,—offenses which, at a very early day in England, were made punishable by statutes which have since been repealed. They were probably offenses at common law, though their precise nature, as defined in that system, seems to be obscure. 1 Bishop, Crim. L. 8th ed. § 525. According to Blackstone, "forestalling" was defined by the statute "to be the buying or contracting for any merchandise or victual coming in the way to market; or dissuading persons from bringing their goods or provisions there, or persuading them to enhance the price when there; or of any practices to make the market dearer to the fair trader;" and "regrating" "to be the buying of corn or other dead victual in any market and selling it again in the same market or within four miles of the place." "Engrossing" is "the buying up large quantities of corn or other dead victual with intent to sell them again." As we have said, these statutes have been repealed in England. They were applicable to a condition of society which no longer exists. But it is to be presumed that the common-law principle which underlies them is the origin of the modern doctrine on the subject. We find that most of the cases in which agreements among manufacturers and dealers to increase the price of their wares and commodities related to some merchantable article of necessity or of great utility. In the case of India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, supra, it is said in the opinion that bagging is an article "of prime necessity" to cotton planters. In the elaborate opinion delivered in the trial court in the Sugar Refining Case, Judge Barrett lays stress upon the fact that sugar is "a necessary article of commerce." People v.

North River Sugar Ref. Co., 22 Abb. N. C. 164, 2 L. R. A. 33. So, also, in the opinion in the same case in the supreme court. 54 Hun, 354, 5 L. R. A. 386. In the opinion in the same case in the court of appeals the question was not discussed, it not being deemed necessary to a decision of the case. 121 N. Y. 582, 9 L. R. A. 33. In Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 682, 6 L. R. A. 457, the court also says: "The article" in controversy "has come to be regarded as one of necessity, not only in every household in the land, but one of daily use by almost every individual in the country." Similar expressions may be found in other cases. On the other hand, in Central Shade Roller Co. v. Cushman, 143 Mass. 353, an agreement between three manufacturers of shade rollers to control the manufacture and sale of their products was held not unlawful, distinctly upon the ground that their wares were not articles of "prime necessity." The doctrine was adhered to and reaffirmed by the same court in the subsequent case of Gloucester Isinglass & Glue Co. v. Russia Cement Co., 154 Mass. 92, 12 L. R. A. 563. In the latter case the court says: "Their contract had no relation to an article of prime necessity, or to staple commodities ordinarily bought and sold in market." In most of the cases in which agreements between persons doing a business not of a public character have been held contrary to public policy and void, the contracts related not only to articles of commerce, but to staple commodities.

Insurance is a mere contract of indemnity against a contingent loss. Though it is an important aid to commerce, it is not a business of commerce, or one in which the public have any direct right. No franchise is necessary for its prosecution, and no one has a right to demand of an underwriter that his property shall be insured at any rate. Any individual may execute a policy, and so any company incorporated for the purpose of insuring property may refuse to execute one, unless it be so bound by its charter. Forced insurance, for obvious reasons, is detrimental to the public interest, and it is therefore not probable that such restriction will be found in any charter. Labor is necessary to production and transportation, and therefore it is not merely an aid, but a necessity, of commerce. It is advantageous to the public, and in that sense they have an interest in it. The services of professional men are likewise indispensable in most civilized communities, and are presumably likewise advantageous to the public. The public have an interest in them in the same sense in which they have an interest in the business of insurance. It follows, therefore, that if insurance companies are to be brought within the rule that makes agreements to increase the price of merchandise illegal, upon the ground that the public have an interest in their business, agreements among laborers and among professional men not to render their services below a stipulated rate should be held contrary to public policy and void upon the same ground. Combinations among workmen to increase or maintain their wages by unlawful means are unlawful. But are such combinations unlawful when the only means resorted to to accomplish their objects is a refusal on part of the parties to the agreement to accept employment at a lower rate of wages than that designated in the contract? This is the next question for determination, and it is not without difficulty. In treating of criminal conspiracies, Mr. Bishop says: "Whatever the language of some of the old cases, no lawyer of the present day would hold it indictable for men simply to associate to promote their own interests, or specifically to raise their wages. If the means adopted were mutual improvement of their mental or physical powers, mutual instruction in their methods of doing their work, mutual inquiring and imparting information as to the wages paid in other localities, or anything else of a like helpful nature, severally enabling the members to obtain higher wages, nothing could be more commendable, and nothing further from the inhibition of the law; or, if employers should combine simply to reduce wages, not proposing any unlawful means, perhaps we might not so much commend them, yet still they would stand under no disfavor from the law,—the result of which is that a conspiracy to enhance or reduce wages is not indictable per se, while yet it may be so by reason of proposed unlawful means." 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 283, subd. 2. The author then proceeds to consider certain means which have been determined to be unlawful, in which a mere agreement by men not already under contract not to work unless for a certain rate of wages does not seem to be included. But the matter seems to be involved in some obscurity. In a previous section the author cites the remarks of distinguished English judges, including Lord Mansfield, to the effect that such agreements are unlawful in themselves, but adds: "In a later case, Earle, J., perhaps with a view to conforming to the Statute of 6 Geo. IV., chap. 129, § 4, yet distinctly qualifying the words of Lord Mansfield, stated it as settled that workmen are at liberty, while they are perfectly free from engagements, and have the option of entering into employment or not, to agree among themselves to say, 'We will not go into any employ unless we can get a certain rate of wages.'" Mr. Freeman, in his note to the case of People v. Fisher, says: "Recent decisions in England, and the spirit now prevailing there and in this country, of giving encouragement to workmen in their endeavors to associate themselves into organizations for their mutual benefit, have settled beyond question that unemployed workmen may unite, and agree not to work unless for a certain price. This is a plain right, upon which no doubt ought ever to have existed." 28 Am. Dec. 508. The learned annotator then quotes: "The law is clear that workmen have a right to combine for their own protection, and to obtain such wages as they may choose to agree to demand;" citing Reg. v. Rowlands, 5 Cox, C. C. 436, 460. In Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111. 33 Am. Dec. 246, it was held by the supreme court of Massachusetts that an association among journeymen bootmakers, in which they bound themselves not to work for any person who employed one not a member of the association, was not indictable at common law. Following that decision, that court also held, in Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499, that an agreement among certain defendants by which they sought to compel the plaintiff, a shipping master, among other things, to ship men from them at an established rate of wages, was not illegal, and did not give a ground of action, although the plaintiff's business had been damaged by the conspiracy. So, also, in Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 10, 8 Am. Rep. 237, they say that "it is no crime for any number of workmen to associate themselves, and agree not to work for or deal with certain men or certain classes of men, or work under certain wages or without certain conditions." We take it, therefore, that the weight of authority is against the proposition that such a combination among workmen was indictable at common law. It does not follow, however, that any agreement of that character is not against public policy, and therefore void; but it is proper to show that it was not an indictable offense at common law, for, if so, any contract in pursuance of such an agreement would have been illegal, in the sense that it would not be enforceable in the courts.

Upon the question whether an agreement among workmen to raise their wages is contrary to public policy, as being in restraint of trade, there is some conflict in the authorities. In Collins v. Locke, 4 App. Cas. 674, the judicial committee of the privy council held that a contract between stevedores in a certain port, by which they agreed to parcel out the stevedoring business, was not void, as a contract in restraint of trade, at common law. The court says: "The objects which this agreement has in view are to parcel out the stevedoring business of the port among the parties to it, and to prevent competition at least among themselves, and also, it may be, to keep up the price to be paid for the work. Their lordships are not prepared to say that an agreement having these objects is invalid if carried into effect by proper means,—that is, by provisions reasonably necessary for the purpose,—though the effect of them might be to create a partial restraint upon the power of the parties to exercise their trade." In Master Stevedores' Assn. v. Walsh 2 Daly, 1, which was a civil action, it was held that it was not unlawful for workmen to agree that they would not work below certain rates, and that a by-law of an association which provided a pecuniary penalty for the violation by way of a fine could be recovered. The decision was not by a court of last resort, but the opinion is able, learned, and exhaustive, and, as it seems to us, convincing. See also Sayre v. Louisville Union Benev. Assn. 1 Duv. 143, 85 Am. Dec. 618. In Ladd v. Southern Cotton Press & Mfg. Co., 58 Tex. 172, it was also decided, in effect, that a combination among the compressing companies in the city of Galveston, by which they increased the prices for compressing cotton, was not unlawful. This proposition is based distinctly upon the ground that compressing cotton is not a public business. On 22 L. R. A.

the other hand, it is held by the supreme court of Illinois, in More v. Bennett, 140 Ill. 69, 15 L. R. A. 361, that an association of stenographers, one of the objects of which was to control prices to be charged for work by its members, is an illegal combination, and that its rules would not be enforced so as to sustain an action of one member against another. The cases cited all relate to combinations between carriers or dealers in, or producers of, staple articles of commerce, as the opinion itself shows. The court also quotes from Tiedeman on Commercial Paper (section 190), as follows: "All combinations of capitalists or of workmen for the purpose of influencing trade in their especial favor by raising or reducing prices are so far illegal that agreements to combine cannot be enforced." The cases cited by this author do not sustain the proposition. Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co., 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159, was a combination to affect the price of coal. Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 434, 49 Am. Dec. 282, was an association composed of the proprietors of canal boats to regulate the rate of transportation. In the other cases cited—Brisbane v. Adams, 3 N. Y. 129; Noyes v. Day, 14 Vt. 384; Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194; and Thompson v. Davies, 13 Johns. 112—it is simply held that agreements to prevent competition in bidding at auction sales are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. Combinations of that character tend to affect the price of the thing to be sold, and directly to defraud the owner. In his work on Sales, the same author lays down the same proposition, and attempts to sustain it by the same authorities. Tiedeman, Sales, § 303. Notwithstanding our great respect for the court which made the decision, we cannot concur in the doctrine announced in the case of More v. Bennett. It is opposed to the well-considered cases on the same point which we have previously cited, and which as we think, lay down the correct rule. Now, the business of stevedores is essential to maritime commerce, and that of compressing cotton is an important aid to traffic in that staple. In that particular, neither are secondary to the business of insurance. The public has an interest in the one, just as it has in the others: and, if it be law that those engaged in lading ships and in compressing cotton may combine to regulate their charges, we see no good reason why insurance companies may not combine for a similar purpose. The same may be said of lawyers, physicians, dentists, and others pursuing like occupations, in which many persons may have an interest in the services to be performed. But there is a stronger reason for holding illegal combinations to enhance prices among those engaged in occupations which are licensed, and are protected from unlicensed competition, than among those of whom no such license is required. In Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co., 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159, Judge Agnew, who delivered the opinion, puts the case very strongly against a combination among coal companies to control the market, and yet says: "To fix a standard of prices among men in the same employment, as a fee bill, is not in itself criminal, but may become so when the parties resort to coercive restraint or penalties upon the employe or employers, or, what is worse, to force of arms." For these reasons, we conclude that the combination in this case is not illegal at common law.

But, if it should be determined that the combination charged in the petition is so far illegal as to make any contract growing out of it void at common law, we are not prepared to say that it would either subject the corporations engaged in it to a forfeiture of their franchises, or to be enjoined at the suit of the state. The application of either rule would result in grave consequences. A corporation which exceeds its powers in an important particular commits a breach of an implied condition of its contract, and may be properly held subject to the penalty of a forfeiture. But the sanction of a rule of law which holds a contract not made punishable merely void as against public policy is ordinarily simply to refuse the parties any remedy for its enforcement, and it may be doubted whether the courts would interfere to enjoin their performance. The courts may command parties to a legal contract in restraint of trade to refrain from violating its provisions, but can they enjoin a party to a contract merely void to refrain from its performance? The rule is to leave the parties as they have left themselves. If the contract be executory, a court will not enforce it in favor of one claiming under it; if executed, it will not rescind it at the suit of a party claiming against it. The public policy which creates the rule in these cases, it seems to us, has gone no further in providing a sanction for its enforcement than to refuse a remedy in the courts to either party to the agreement. The North River Sugar Refining Case was tried, and appealed to the supreme court in banc, and thence an appeal was again taken to the court of appeals. It was stubbornly contested and argued with distinguished ability on both sides at every stage of its progress. In the opinion of the trial judge, stress is laid upon the fact that the tendency of the combination was to create a monopoly in restraint of trade. 22 Abb. N. C. 164, 2 L. R. A. 33. In the supreme court this is made a principal ground upon which the opinion of the court is based. The opinion recognizes that it was a conspiracy in restraint of trade under the statute of New York, and an indictable offense. 54 Hun, 354, 5 L. R. A. 386. But it is notable that the court of appeals expressly waives any consideration of that question, and holds that the defendant corporation had subjected its charter to forfeiture, by reason of its having exceeded its powers in forming with other corporations a trust in the nature of a partnership. It may be that to restrain a party from performing a contract merely void at common law, as being contrary to public policy, would be to violate the rule which leaves all the parties to suffer the consequence of their improvident engagements of such a character, and gives relief to none; but this would not apply if the interest of a third person was to be affected. The question is not without difficulty, and, since its determination is not necessary to this case, we do not decide it. It may be that a thorough examination of the authorities would show that it is settled.

We would not be understood as holding that the combination declared in this case is not detrimental to the public, and that sound policy does not demand the suppression of that and all like organizations of a similar magnitude. There are certain contracts, and perhaps combinations, which the law regards as being against public policy. The courts cannot extend the rule merely by reason of their opinion as to what the law ought to be. What other combinations or contracts should be held illegal on the ground of public policy is a political question,—that is to say, one which it is the province of the legislative department of the government to determine. The legislature has power to weigh the public interest even "in golden scales," and, if such combinations be found detrimental, they can denounce the evil, and provide the remedy.

It follows that we are of opinion that this action cannot be maintained, and therefore the judgments both of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the District Court are reversed, and judgment is here rendered for the defendants in the latter court, the plaintiffs in error in this court.

Rehearing denied.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Albert WELTON

v.

Thomas J. DICKSON et al., County Commissioners, and Aaron C. LODER et al., App'ts.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. The constitutional provision, "The property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation," prohibits, by implication, the taking of private property for any private use whatever, without the consent of the owner.

2. Such constitutional provision forbids private property from being compulsorily taken or damaged for any but public use, and then only upon just compensation being made, the amount of which is to be assessed by a jury.

NOTE.—The above case does not deny that a so-called private road may be condemned at the expense of the petitioner if it is in fact to be open for the public use and therefore does not weaken the conclusion expressed in the note to Latah County 22 L. R. A.

v. Peterson (Idaho) 16 L. R. A. 31, but it will be seen that in the present case the private road constituted a mere easement which was essentially private.

- 3. The want of power in a legislature to transfer to one man the property of another without his consent, either with or without compensation, does not depend upon constitutional restriction, but upon the fact that it is not the exercise of the power of making laws or rules of civil conduct, which is the branch of the sovereign power committed to the legislature.
- 4. When the public exigencies demand the exercise of the power of taking private property for the public use is solely a question for the legislature, upon whose determination the courts cannot sit in judgment.
- 5. But what is such a public use as will justify the exercise of the power of eminent domain is a question for the courts to decide. But if the public use be declared by the legislature the courts will hold the use public, unless it manifestly appears from the provisions of the act that they can have no tendency to advance and promote such public use.
- 6. Sections 47-52, chap. 78, Comp. Stat. 1893, authorize the taking of private property for private use,—the roads therein mentioned being essentially private, and beyond the public control,—and said sections are therefore unconstitutional and void.
- 7. The absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law affords the only test of equity jurisdiction, and the application of this principle to a particular case must depend altogether upon the character of the case, as disclosed in the proceedings. It is not enough that there is a remedy at law. It must be plain and adequate, or, in other words, as practical and efficient to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity.

A PPEAL by defendants Loder and Marshall from a decree of the District Court for Lancaster County in favor of complainants in a proceeding brought to restrain the attempted establishment of a private road over complainant's land. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. N. Z. Snell and Beeson & Root, for appellants:

The county commissioners had exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the questions as to the opening of this road, and the plaintiff had the right to appear before them and object to the establishment of the road and to a full hearing as to the necessity or right to have the road laid out and established, and it will be presumed that they would decide it correctly, but if Mr. Welton was dissatisfied with their decision he could take the case to the district court by appeal or on error; and the district court had no power or authority to take the whole matter out of the hands of the commissioners in this summary manner and assume jurisdiction to try and determine the whole case.

Messrs. Pound & Burr, for appellee:

No remedy is adequate that does not stop the threatened danger and prevent the unlawful and lawless invasion and appropriation of plaintiff's homestead.

Commissioners acting under color of law and proceeding without any legal authority to permanently appropriate the land of a private citizen may be enjoined from proceeding with such appropriation.

Curran v. Louisville, 38 Ky. 632.

Ragan, O., filed the following opinion: Chapter 78, Comp. Stat. 1893, provides: "Sec. 47. When the lands of any person shall be surrounded or enclosed, or be shut out and cut off from a public highway by the lands of another person or persons, who refuse to allow such person a private road to pass to or from his or her said land, it shall be the duty of the county board on petition of any person whose land is so surrounded or shut out, to appoint three disinterested freeholders of the precinct or township, in counties under township organization, in which the land lies, as commissioners to view and mark out a road from the land of the petitioner to the nearest public highway, and assess the damages the person will sustain through whose land the road will pass. Sec. 48. The person desiring to secure the right of way shall give the person or persons through whose lands the road will run, at least two days' notice of such intended application, by leaving or causing to be left a written notice at his usual place of abode; and satisfactory evidence that such notice has been given shall be presented to the board before commissioners shall be appointed. Sec. 49. The commissioners shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, take and subscribe an oath before some judge or justice of the peace, that they are not interested nor of kin to either of the parties interested in the proposed road, and that they will faithfully and impartially view and mark out said road to the greatest ease and convenience of the parties, and as little as may be to the injury of either, and assess the damages which will be sustained by the party through whose land it will run. Sec. 50. Said commissioners shall make out a report of their proceedings, stating particularly the course and distance of said road, and the amount of damages assessed, which report, together with a certificate of the oath, shall be returned to the county commissioners and filed by the county clerk. Sec. 51. If the report be approved by the county board, and the petitioner shall produce satisfactory evidence that he has paid the damages assessed (or tendered payment, if the party refuse to receive it), and all costs attending the proceedings, the county board shall grant an order to said petitioner to open a road not exceeding fifteen feet in width; and if any person or persons obstruct said road, such person or persons shall be liable to all the penalties for obstructing a public road; provided, however, if such road shall pass through any enclosure, and it shall be required by the owner thereof, the person applying for such road shall put up and keep at each entrance into such enclosure a good and substantial swinging gate; provided further, that either party may appeal from the decision of the county board in like manner as prescribed in case of public roads. Sec. 52. Upon the establishment of the right of way, as in this chapter provided, the same shall vest and descend as an easement in the party and his or her heirs or assigns forever." The board of county commissioners of Lancaster county, on the petition of Owen Marshall and Aaron C. Loder, appointed three commissioners, who viewed and marked out a private road through the land of one Albert Welton, and made report of their proceedings to said board of county commissioners. Thereupon, Welton brought this suit to the district court of Lancaster county to enjoin Marshall and Loder and the board of county commissioners from laying out and establishing on his land the private road petitioned for. The suit is based on the grounds that the statute quoted above is unconstitutional, and that the threatened action of the defendants, if permitted, will work an irreparable injury to Welton, for which he has no adequate remedy at law. The appellants demurred to the petition on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. The court overruled the demurrer, and entered a decree perpetually enjoining the board of county commissioners from establishing such private road on the lands of Welton. The case comes here on appeal. The principal question in the case is the constitutionality of the sections of the statute recited above.

If B's land shall be shut off from public highways by the land of A., and he shall refuse to allow B. a private road across his (A's) land, then this statute against A's consent, takes a part of his land, and transfers it to B., to be used as a private road by him, his heirs and assigns, forever.

Section 21, article 1, of the Constitution of the state, provides: "The property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor." The uniform holding of the courts is that such a constitutional provision as this is an implied prohibition on the power of the legislature to take the private property of A. without his consent, even when compensation is made, and transfer it to B., for his private use. The supreme court of the state of New Jersey, in Coster v. Tide Water Co., 18 N. J. Eq. 54, declares: "This want of power in the legislature does not depend upon any constitutional restriction, but upon the fact that it is not the exercise of the power of making laws or rules of civil conduct, which is the branch of the sovereign power committed to the legislature. To justify the taking of the citizen's property by the legislature, the use for which it is appropriated must be a public use." Speaking on this subject, the eminent jurist, Cooley, says: "The right of eminent domain implies that the purpose for which it may be exercised must not be a mere private purpose; and it is conceded on all hands that the legislature has no power, in any case, to take the property of one individual, and pass it over to another, without reference to some use to which it is to be applied for the public benefit. The right of eminent domain does not imply a right in the sovereign power to take the property of one citizen, and transfer it to another, even for a full compensation, when the public interest will be in no way promoted by the transfer." Cooley, Const. Lim. 2d ed. 580.

Now, is the use for which this statute authorizes the taking of appellee's land a public or private one? Is the purpose of this law to take A's property, and transfer it to B., for the use of the public, or for B's private use? If the private road contemplated by this law is for the use of the public, the law is good. If, on the other hand, the road authorized is for the private use and benefit of an individual, the law is void. And, whether one or the other, is a question of law. To make the use public, it need not be for the benefit of the whole public or state or any large portion of it. It may be for the inhabitants of a small or restricted locality. But the use and benefit must be in common, not to a particular individual or estate. Coster v. Tide Water Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 54.

A statute of Ohio provided: "The trustees of any township may, whenever in their opinion the same will be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare, cause to be established, located, and constructed as hereinafter provided, any ditch within such township." Certain parties petitioned for the construction of a ditch across the lands of others, under said statute. On the trial the court was requested to charge the jury as follows: "If you find that the petitioners . . . are the only persons in any way interested in the location of the ditch, and that it would not be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare to locate the ditch in question, then and in that case you should return your verdict against the proposed ditch." The court refused to give this instruction, and the case was taken to the supreme court for review, and that tribunal says: "The facts being ascertained, the question of whether or not the ditch will conduce to the public health, convenience, or welfare, within the meaning [of this statute], so that it will be of public use, is a question of law." In Jenal v. Green Island Draining Co., 12 Neb. 168, was considered a statute of this state authorizing the construction of levees, dykes, and drains, and the reclamation of wet and overflowed lands, by incorporated companies. The act provided, among other things that the company might appropriate any land, stone, timber, gravel or other materials necessary for the right of way or construction, maintenance, or improvement of the proposed work, by first paying into the county treasury of the county where the land is situate, for the use of the owner of the land, the amount of damage assessed by the appraisers who were appointed therefor. Chief Justice Maxwell, speaking for this court, said: "The statute in question authorizes the entry upon lands, and construction of drains, whenever the private interest of the corporation requires it, and without reference to the public welfare. Any number of persons, not less than three, being the owners of wet and overflowed lands, whenever it is for their interest, may locate a ditch across the lands of others. . . . This is an infringement of the right of private property, and is unauthorized and void." The general road law of this state (Comp. Stat. 1893, chap. 78), confers on county boards of the several counties of the state general supervision over the public roads of the state, with power to maintain them; requires a petition for a public road to be signed by ten freeholders; fixes their width at 66 feet; makes the cost of their construction and maintenance a public charge; provides that, when persons traveling with carriages shall meet on such roads, each shall turn to the right of the center thereof; prohibits all persons addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors from being em-played as drivers on said roads; prohibits the running of horses on such roads; the leaving in such roads, unhitched or unguarded, any horses or teams; and that the overseer of each road district shall annually cause furrows to be plowed on either side of all such roads, as fire guards. None of these provisions are found in this act in reference to private roads, and none of these provisions apply to private roads. Had the legislature intended that these private roads should be for the public use, then, indeed, the entire private road act would be superfluous, but the law we have under consideration expressly provides: "Upon the establishment of the right of way, as in this chapter provided, the same shall vest and descend as an easement in the party and his or her heirs or assigns forever." The fact that the legal title is not taken, but an easement created, does not render this law less objectionable, for of what value is one's legal title, if another have the possession and use forever? Marshall and Loder would acquire no greater estate to the land in question if Welton gave them an absolute warranty deed. The public have an easement in all public roads, while the legal title remains in the adjoining owner, but by this law no right in or to the private road is conferred on the public. This law is, and was intended to be, an act for the transfer of A's property, against his consent,—compensation being made to him,—to B., his heirs and assigns, for their private use and convenience, and is therefore in conflict with the implied prohibitions of the constitution, and void.

In Bankhead v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 540, the question of the constitutionality of a private road law was decided. By the statute considered in that case, it was provided: "Section 1. Private roads may be laid out in the same manner as county roads, and the general road laws of the state, as to the establishment of county roads, are applicable, except that it is not necessary that any person but the applicant shall sign the petition." Section 2 provides that the board of supervisors may appoint a commissioner to report upon the application, and requires a bond from the applicant to pay all costs and damages. Section 3 provides that no such road shall be ordered to be opened until the costs and damages have been paid, and the conditions on which it is established shall have been complied with by the applicant. Section 4 provides that on the final hearing the board may receive petitions for and against the proposed road, hear testimony, and establish the road, upon the payment of costs and damages, and upon such condition, as to fences, as to the board may seem just to all parties concerned. Laws 1866, chap. 127. It will be observed that the Iowa law is substantially the same as the one under consideration here, with the exceptions that the Nebraska statute contains no provisions allowing the board of county commissioners to receive petitions for and against the proposed road; and the Iowa statute has no provisions vesting the perpetual easement in the private road established in the party petitioning therefor. Bankhead v. Brown, supra, arose out of an effort of Bankhead to have established a private road, under the provisions of the Iowa law just quoted, across the land of Brown, in order to reach Bankhead's coal mine. The establishment of the private road was restricted by Brown on the ground that the law authorizing it was unconstitutional, in that it proposed the taking of private property for private uses. Dillon, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "With respect to the act, . . . we are of opinion that roads thereunder established are essentially private,—that is, are the private property of the applicant therefor,—because: (1) The statute denominates them 'private roads.' . . . If the roads established thereunder were not intended to be private, and different from ordinary and public roads, there was no necessity for the act. (2) Such roads may be established upon the petition of the applicant alone; and he must pay the costs and damages occasioned thereby, and perform such other conditions, as to fences, etc., as the board may prescribe. (3) The public are not bound to work or keep such roads in repair, and this is a very satisfactory test as to whether a road is public or private. (4) We see no reason, when such a road is established, why the person at whose instance this was done might not lock the gates opening into it, or fence it up or otherwise debar the public of any right thereto. Could not the plaintiffs, in this case, after having procured the road in question, abandon it, at their pleasure? Could they not relinquish it to the defendants without consulting the board of supervisors? If this is so, does it not incontestably establish that it is essentially private? For it must be private if it is of such a nature that the plaintiffs can, at their pleasure, use or forbid its use, abandon or refuse to abandon it, relinquish or refuse to relinquish it. If the act is valid, might not the plaintiffs, having procured the road, use it for laying down a tram or horse railway, and forbid everybody from using the road, and even exclude all persons therefrom? Who could prevent it? These considerations mark the great difference between such a road and a public highway, and demonstrate the essentially private character of the road. In the following cases, acts substantially like the Iowa act providing for the establishment of private roads have been declared unconstitutional. Neubitt v. Trumbo, 39 Ill. 110, 89 Am. Dec. 290; Dickey v. Tenison, 27 Mo. 373; Clack v. White, 2 Swan, 540; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Sadler v. Langham, 34 Ala. 311; Newell v. Smith, 15 Wis. 102." The language quoted above from the learned judge in reference to the Iowa law is applicable to the statute under investigation. The eminent jurist, commenting on the constitutional provision of the state of Iowa "that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," continues: "The limitation . . . upon the right of eminent domain, or the power of the legislature to take private property for public use, is found in all, or nearly all, of the state constitutions. Many of the questions growing out of this limitation upon the otherwise absolute power of the legislature to take property of one for the benefit of the many have been settled by adjudication." And he deduces from the numerous authorities cited by him in the opinion the following propositions: "(1) That the constitutional limitation above quoted prohibits, by implication, the taking of private property for any private use whatever without the consent of the owner. (2) That it forbids private property from being compulsorily taken for any but public use, and then only upon just compensation being made, the amount of which is to be assessed by a jury. (8) When the public exigencies demand the exercise of the power of taking private property for the public use is solely a question for the legislature, upon whose determination the courts cannot sit in judgment. (4) That what is such a public use as will justify the exercise of the power of eminent domain is a question for the courts. But 'if a public use be declared by the legislature the courts will hold the use public, unless it manifestly appears by the provisions of the act that they can have no tendency to advance and promote such public use.'" We are entirely satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions of this opinion, and follow it without hesitation. Statutes similar to the Nebraska law have been held invalid in the following cases: Stewart v. Hartman, 46 Ind. 331; Re Albany Street, 11 Wend. 149, 25 Am. Dec. 618; Osborn v. Hart, 24 Wis. 89, 1 Am. Rep. 161; Orear v. Crossly, 40 Ill. 175; Sholl v. German Coal Co. 118 Ill. 422, 59 Am. Rep. 379.

Counsel for appellants, in their brief, cite us to many authorities to sustain the validity of the law assailed as invalid in this case. In some of the cases cited the statutes were held good on the ground that the general public had a right to use the private roads provided for by the statutes. Such was the ground of the decision in Shaver v. Starrett, 4 Ohio St. 495; Denham v. Bristol County Comrs. 108 Mass. 202. In Sherman v. Buick, 82 Cal. 242, 91 Am. Dec. 577, the court sustained the constitutionality of a law very similar to our own, but did so by holding that, although the statute denominated the road a "private road," it was in fact and in law a public road, under the control of the government, and open to every one who might have occasion to use it, and the court declared that "the phrase 'private road' is unknown to the common law. All roads are public." The opinion, as counsel say, is ably reasoned, but we do not think this court can say that all roads are public roads, in this state. The legislature has said that all public roads shall be 66 feet wide, and, by the law we are considering, it is provided that private roads shall be 15 feet wide. Evidently, then, the legislature has attempted to recognize two classes of roads. If Marshall and Loder had opened the private road they sought to across Welton's farm, and had been indicted under the criminal statutes for running their horses on a public road of the state, and the proof had shown that the running of their horses was on a private road established under this private road law, can any one doubt that the jury would have been rightly instructed to acquit them?

Counsel for appellants also insist that appellee has an adequate remedy at law, by appeal from the order of the board of county commissioners, should it make an order establishing the road, and that, therefore, this case must be dismissed. The law being invalid, the case of the appellee resolves itself into an appeal on his part to a court of equity to enjoin the appellants from committing a threatened trespass. The supreme court of Illinois, in Poyer v. Des Plaines, 123 Ill. 111, lay down the rule in such case thus: "There are two exceptions, clearly recognized, to the rule that courts of equity will not interfere to restrain a trespass, whether committed under the forms of law or otherwise, which are (1) to prevent irreparable injury; and (2) to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Before a court of equity will interfere to prevent a trespass upon the ground of irreparable injury, such facts must be alleged from which it may be seen that irreparable mischief will be the result of the act complained of, and that the law can afford the party no adequate remedy." In Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 74, 18 L. ed. 580, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "The absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law affords the only test of equity jurisdiction, and the application of this principle to a particular case must depend altogether upon the character of the case, as disclosed in the proceedings. It is not enough that there is a remedy at law. It must be plain and adequate, or, in other words as practical and efficient to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity." The facts averred in the appellee's petition show that the trespass threatened by the appellants, if committed, would cause appellee an injury, to the redress of which his legal remedy would be inadequate.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed. The other Commissioners concur.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the District Court for Oklahoma County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fred M. Elkin, for appellant:

At the time the contract alleged in the complaint was made there was no statute of frauds in force in this territory. The common law put in force in this territory by act of the legislature of the territory of Missouri, on the 19th day of January, A. D. 1816, was the common law as modified by statute to the fourth year of the reign of James I., 1607.

Mo. Stat. p. 436.

The statute of frauds is not a part of the common law but was an enactment of the parliament of England, passed during the reign of Charles II., half a century after the above date. The statute of frauds in force in most of the states of the Union is the Statute of Anne.

The common law is in force and the statutes of Missouri are not.

It may be said generally that the common law has been adopted as the basis of jurisprudence in every state in the Union except Louisiana, and in that state it is adopted in criminal matters.

The common-law rules for construction of statutes are a part of the common law adopted in Massachusetts. Com. v. Churchill, 2 Met. 118.

The rule that statutes are to be construed with reference to the principles of common law applies also to constitutional provisions. McGinnis v. State, 9 Humph. 43, 49 Am. Dec. 697.

The common law of one state is not necessarily common law in another, as each state adopts such portions as are suitable and desirable. Bent v. Thompson (N. M.) Jan. 23, 1890.

Effect of English decisions.

The construction which British statutes had received in England at the time of their adoption in this country, even to the time of the separation of this country from the British empire, may be regarded as part of the statutes, but subsequent decisions are not to be regarded as binding. Cathcart v. Robinson, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 264, 8 L. ed. 120.

The English decisions rendered prior to May 14, 1776, are evidence of what the common law was which was adopted by the Georgia Act of 1784, but not as being themselves the law. To be conclusive of any question they should be clear and well settled, but the Georgia court is free to adopt a different view, if it believes the law was otherwise at that time. Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 122.

It is said in Marks v. Morris, 4 Hen. & M. 463, "it was the common law we adopted and not English decisions," and these will be looked to for information merely, and not as authority.

The court says that we should take the standard of that law, namely, "that we would live honestly, should hurt nobody, and should render to every one his due, for our judicial guide." Marks v. Morris, supra.

The adoption of the common law by the Washington Code 1881, § 1, does not shut the courts up to following English or other American decisions as to what the common law is. The court is to administer justice according to the promptings of reason and common sense, which are the cardinal principles of common law, and not to take the English decisions blindly, without inquiry as to their reason or application to the circumstances. Sayward v. Carlson, 1 Wash. 29.

English decisions made since the Revolution have no binding force, but are consulted as expositions of the rules and principles of the common law by men of experience. Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373; Bowie v. Duval, 1 Gill & J. 175; Stump v. Napier, 2 Yerg. 45.

Usage, tradition, and works of approved authority may be relied upon as well as decisions of the courts to show what was the common law. Com. v. Churchill, 2 Met. 118.

Burford, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed his complaint in the court below to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of real estate situated in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma county, Okla. Terr. A demurrer was filed to the complaint, alleging, as grounds: First, that the court has no jurisdiction of the person of defendant, or the subject of the action; second, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, to which the appellant excepted, and brings the case to this court by appeal. The amended complaint, to which the demurrer was sustained, reads as follows:

"In the district court of the third judicial district of the territory of Oklahoma, in and for Oklahoma county. Francis R. McKen-non, plaintiff, vs. Harvey R. Winn, defendant. Amended complaint. Plaintiff herein, Francis R. McKennon, complains of the defendant, Harvey R. Winn, and says that heretofore, to wit, on the 23d day of April, A. D. 1889, the said defendant entered upon and occupied, as a town-site claimant, under the public land laws of the United States, a certain tract of land in the city of Oklahoma City, in Oklahoma county, in the territory of Oklahoma, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: Lots numbers 11 and 12, in block 9, in said city, county, and territory; the same being a part of the south-east quarter of section 33, township 12 north, of range 3 west of the Indian meridian. That afterwards, to wit, on the — day of April, A. D. 1889, the said defendant, being an occupant still of said tract, as above stated, and being desirous of inclosing said

No decisions of the courts of England, under the authority of the Statute of James passed in 1533, or in analogy to it, have any force or effect in Delaware where that statute was never in force. Hulley v. Security Trust & S. D. Co. 5 Del. Ch. 578.

Constitutional and statutory adoption of common law.

In some states the constitution has expressly adopted the common law, as in Delaware Const. 1776, art. 20; New York, art. 1, § 17; Maryland, Declaration of Rights, art. 5; Michigan (1850) Schedule 1; Wisconsin (1848), art. 4, § 13; West Virginia, art. 8, § 21.

In Massachusetts the common law is adopted without express mention by the provision in the Constitution, chap. 6, art. 6, "that laws heretofore adopted, used, and in force in the province, colony, or state of Massachusetts Bay should continue in force."

And in Kentucky, the Constitution (1850), art. 8, § 8, continued in existence the laws which were in force June 1, 1792.

In many other states the common law has been expressly adopted by statute. Arizona Rev. Stat. 1887, § 2365; Mansfield Dig. (Ark.) 1884, § 566; California Pol. Code, § 4468; Colorado, Mill's Anno. Stat. 1891, § 4184; Florida Rev. Stat. 1892, § 56; Idaho Rev. Stat. 1887, § 18; Illinois, Starr & C. Anno. Stat. chap. 28, § 1; Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, § 236; Kansas Gen. Stat. 1889, § 7231; Missouri Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6561; Montana Comp. Stat. 1887, 6th Div., § 201; Nebraska Comp. Stat. 1891, chap. 15, § 1; Nevada Gen. Stat. § 3021; New Mexico Comp. Laws, 1883; North Carolina Code, § 641; R. I. Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 259, § 1; Pennsylvania Act, Jan. 28, 1777; South Carolina Gen. Stat. § 2738; Texas, Sayle's Civ. Stat. 1888, § 3128; Vermont Rev. Laws 1880, § 689; Virginia Code 1849, chap. 16, § 1, 2; Washington, Hill's Code of Procedure, § 106; Wyoming Rev. Stat. 1887, § 496.

The common law was extended to all the territory within the limits of the state of Alabama to the exclusion of Spanish and French law by the Ordinance of 1787, which was in force in the Mississippi territory, providing that the inhabitants should always be entitled to "the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury, of judicial proceedings according to the course of common law," and by the recognition of this ordinance in the Alabama constitution. Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 3 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 707, 65 Am. Dec. 374.

The common law became a part of the law of Iowa also by reason of the Ordinance of 1787, even if it would not have been the law independent of that ordinance. O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 381.

ing all the laws heretofore adopted, used, and approved in the province, colony, or state of New Hampshire and usually practiced on in the courts of law, adopts the body of the common law so far as applicable to the institutions of the state. State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550.

The common law of England so far as applicable to the condition of Massachusetts, is adopted by the Constitution, part II, art. 6, declaring that "all the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used, and approved in the province, colony, or state of Massachusetts Bay and usually practiced on in the courts of law, shall still remain and be in force until altered or repealed by the legislature, such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this constitution. Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373.

The common law is adopted in South Carolina by General Statute, § 2734, so far as it is "not altered by this act nor inconsistent with the condition of this state and the customs and laws thereof." Edwards v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) Sept. 29, 1866.

The statutes which adopt the common law usually make express exception in terms more or less similar to those above quoted of such parts of the common law as are inapplicable to the condition of things in this country or inconsistent with our constitutions and laws.

The adoption of the common law by the Territorial Act of Nevada, 1861, p. 1, being ratified by the state constitution, the common law so far as it is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States, or of the state, must be enforced. Van Sickle v. Haines, 7 Nev. 249.

This decision regarded the statute as including the adoption of the common law on the subject of riparian rights, but was overruled on this point in Reno Smelt. M. & R. Works v. Stevenson, 4 L. R. A. 60, 20 Nev. 226, in which it is held that the common law on this subject is inapplicable to the condition of Nevada.

What constitutes the common law adopted.

The rules of admiralty are not necessarily a part of the common law so as to be binding in a collision case, where the action is brought in a court of common law. Sawyer v. Eastern Steamboat Co. 46 Me. 400, 74 Am. Dec. 463.

The distinction between common law and admiralty in the Constitution of the United States is to be determined by the system exercised in England before the Revolution, and by the state courts before the adoption of the Constitution. Bains v. The James & Catherine, Baldw. 568.

That common law and admiralty jurisdiction are tract with a substantial fence, and erecting thereon a house, and said defendant not having sufficient means (money) wherewith to inclose and otherwise improve this tract, the said defendant entered into an oral agreement with this plaintiff, whereby it was mutually agreed and understood by and between the said defendant and this plaintiff that the said plaintiff should furnish to the said defendant a sufficient sum of money wherewith to inclose said tract with a substantial fence, and that said plaintiff should furnish one half of the amount of money necessary to erect upon said tract such a house as the said plaintiff and defendant might thereafter agree upon, and, in case the said defendant could not furnish sufficient money to pay defendant's portion or share (one half) of the cost of such house, then, in the latter event, the plaintiff was to lend to the said defendant a sum of money sufficient to pay for said defendant's share of the same. That the said defendant should continue in the occupancy of said tract, and that the said defendant should hold and occupy the said tract with a view to acquiring title thereto from the United States government, and that such title should be acquired and held for the benefit of said defendant and plaintiff, in equal portions or shares. That afterwards, to wit, on the — day of May, A. D. 1889, it was agreed by and between the said plaintiff and defendant that the said tract should be occupied and held by the said defendant,—the lot number 11 for the benefit of this plaintiff, and the lot number 12 for the benefit of said defendant. That in pursuance of the aforesaid agreement this plaintiff, hereto-entirely distinct although administered by the same tribunal is also declared in The Sarah, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 391, 5 L. ed. 644.

Whether or not the ecclesiastical law of England is adopted as part of the common law has been somewhat in dispute. In the affirmative are Crump v. Morgan, 38 N. C. 91, 40 Am. Dec. 447; LeBarron v. LeBarron, 36 Vt. 386; and to the contrary are Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 184, 10 Am. Rep. 460; Burtis v. Burtis, Hopk. Ch. 557, 2 L. ed. 522, 14 Am. Dec. 563; Perry v. Perry, 2 Paige, 501, 2 L. ed. 1003. The instances in which courts have by implication adopted some portion of the ecclesiastical law add weight to the affirmative; but, without further considering the subject here, it will be separately treated hereafter.

The common law, so far as it respected the erection of churches of the episcopal persuasion of England, the right to present, or collate to such churches, and the corporate capacity of the parsons thereof to take in succession seems to have been fully recognized and adopted in the province of New Hampshire. Pawlet v. Clark, 3 U. S. 9 Cranch, 333, 3 L. ed. 749.

Adoption in particular matters.

The numerous decisions mentioned below on particular subjects must be considered in the light of illustrations merely. It would be impossible in this note to follow out the law on each of these subjects and show its present exact condition. For instance the law as to Shelley's Case, 1 Coke, 88, or as to the various water rights below mentioned, involves many decisions which may not even mention the subject of common law. And it is not presumed that even those which consider the question of the adoption of the common law on these subjects are all presented here. But a reference to these subjects is here made by way of illustrating the rule of the courts as to the adoption or rejection of the common law.

The law-merchant is a part of the common law. Cook v. Renick, 19 Ill. 598; Platt v. Eads, 1 Blackf. 81. The common law as to nuisances prevails in Alabama. Ferguson v. Selma, 43 Ala. 400.

As to remedies.

The superior court in Georgia is governed by the rules and practice of the common law, so far as they are permitted to operate by the constitution and laws. Straffin v. Newell, T. U. P. Charit. 172, 4 Am. Dec. 705.

Without any statutory provision giving any specific remedy, where a purely statutory right or remedy is asserted, courts will adopt analogous common-law remedies to forward the ends of justice. Hightower v. Fitzpatrick, 42 Ala. 597.

The adoption of the common law with general British statutes in aid of it by the legislature of Missouri in 1816 included an adoption of the action of ejectment, including the fiction of lease, entry, and ouster. Grande v. Foy, 1 Hemp. 105.

The common-law practice to review an action of fore, to wit, on the twenty-eighth day of April, A. D. 1889, furnished and paid unto the said defendant a sum of money, to wit, fourteen dollars and eighty-five cents, in full payment of the entire costs of a certain fence erected upon and inclosing said tract, as in the foregoing agreement provided, and the said defendant then and there accepted said amount of money in pursuance of said agreement. That in pursuance of the aforesaid agreement said parties caused to be erected upon the said tract a small frame house, at a cost of the value of thirty dollars, and that this plaintiff afterwards, to wit, on the — day of May, A. D. 1889, paid to the said defendant the sum of five dollars in part payment of this plaintiff's share of the cost of said house, and said sum was then and there accepted by said defendant as such part payment. At the time last stated this plaintiff instructed defendant to call upon one Felix L. Bone—the said Bone being then and there this plaintiff's agent—for the balance of the share of this plaintiff of the cost of said house, to wit, the sum of ten dollars, and the said defendant then and there agreed to do so. That on the day and dates last above stated the said Bone had in his possession, and subject to the order of this plaintiff, moneys of this plaintiff greatly in excess of the amount last above stated, and on the said last above named day this plaintiff instructed said Bone to pay to this defendant the sum of ten dollars. That in pursuance of, and under the terms of, the aforesaid agreement, this plaintiff, heretofore, on, to wit, the — day of —, A. D. 1889, went into and took possession of the said lot eleven

The common-law rule not to consider any paper as part of the record unless made so by the pleadings, or by some opinion of the court referring to it, is common to all courts exercising admiralty jurisdiction according to the courts of common law. Fisher v. Cookerell, 80 U. S. 5 Pet. 253, 8 L. ed. 115.

The equitable right, founded on common-law principles, of a junior mortgagee to redeem from a prior mortgage exists in Alabama. Wiley v. Ewing, 47 Ala. 424.

The disqualification of jurors by relationship is, in Delaware, controlled by the common law, there being no statute on the subject. State v. Williams, 24 Ohio L. J. 435.

Limitation of the adoption.

The adoption of the common law by Nevada Gen. Stat., § 8021, so far as "not repugnant to, or in conflict with the constitution and laws" of the United States and of the state, adopts only so much of the common law as is applicable to the condition of that state. Reno Smelt. M. & R. Works v. Stevenson, 4 L. R. A. 60, 20 Nev. 202.

This is the general rule expressed more or less like the above statement in the decisions of all the states.

The common law of England is not to be taken in all respects to be that of America. Our ancestors brought with them its general principles and claimed it as their birth-right, but they brought with them and adopted only that portion which was applicable to their situation. Van Ness v. Pacard, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 144, 7 L. ed. 377.

In Morgan v. King, 80 Barb. 9, it is said that in adopting the common law of England there is no adoption of any mere formal rules or written code, or mere verbiage in which the common law is expressed, but that the written law of England is adopted as a constantly improving science, rather than as an art; as a system of legal logic, rather than as a code of rules,—that is that the fundamental principles and modes of reasoning and the substance of the rules of the common law are adopted as illustrated by the reasons on which they are based, rather than by the mere words in which they are expressed.

Only such parts of the common law and its statutory affinities as concern the conditions and circumstances of the people are in force in Delaware. State v. Williams, 24 Ohio L. J. 435.

To the same effect are decisions in other states. People v. Randolph, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 174; Bent v. 22 L. R. A.

Thompson (N. M.) Jan. 23, 1890; Browning v. Browning, 3 N. M. 371; Harkness v. Sears, 26 Ala. 493, 69 Am. Dec. 745; Pennock's Estate, 20 Pa. 233, 59 Am. Dec. 718; Vicksburg & J. R. Co. v. Patton, 31 Miss. 156, 66 Am. Dec. 552.

Rules must be relaxed the enforcement of which would be entirely unsuited to the interests of the people they are to govern. McClintock v. Bryden, 5 Cal. 100, 63 Am. Dec. 87.

This was said in discussing the effect of mere possession of public lands as against miners. Ibid.

Allowing a tradesman's book as evidence against the original debtor on the oath of the tradesman alone was held in 1788 to be in accordance with the law prevailing in Pennsylvania and adapted to the peculiar situation of the country, although different from the rule in England. Poultney v. Ross, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 238, 1 L. ed. 117.

So the rule in England that the books of a tradesman cannot be put in evidence without the oath of a clerk or proof of his handwriting if dead, is not adopted in Illinois, where a tradesman employs no clerk but keeps his own books. Boyer v. Sweet, 4 Ill. 120.

So the publication of a communication by a newspaper, which has no tendency to obstruct the administration of justice, and not reflecting upon the integrity of the judge or in any way impeaching his conduct, is held not to constitute a contempt, even if it might be so regarded in England. Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. 404.

The ancient common-law rule allowing conveyance of land by parol was not adopted in Ohio, even prior to the enactment of the statute of frauds, and was not adapted to the circumstances and state of society, but was opposed to the policy of all the laws respecting lands under which titles were recorded and the universal custom of giving and receiving deeds. Lindsley v. Coats, 1 Ohio, 245.

The court says the ancient common-law mode of transferring real estate by parol was adopted at a time when writing was practiced or understood by but few individuals. Ibid.

But in Lavalle v. Strobel, 89 Ill. 370, it is said that verbal partition followed by livery of seisin was good until the adoption of the statute of frauds, although in that case no verbal partition was in fact involved.

The common-law rule of shifting inheritances, being radically different from the provisions as to descent in the Ordinance of 1787, cannot be regarded as being in force in Illinois. Bates v. Brown, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 710, 18 L. ed. 535.

In Indiana also the English rule of shifting inheritances is held to be inapplicable. Cox v. Matthews, 17 Ind. 367.

(11), and occupied same. That afterwards, to wit, on the 3d day of June, A. D. 1889, this plaintiff learned from the said Bone that the said defendant had not called upon the said Bone for the sum of ten dollars. That on the day last above stated this plaintiff offered to pay, and tendered to said defendant, the said sum of ten dollars, the balance due from plaintiff to defendant on account of the said house erected; and the said defendant then and there refused to accept or receive the same, and said defendant then and there refused, and has ever since and does now still refuse, to fill defendant's part of said agreement. That heretofore, to wit, on the — day of —, A. D. 1890, said defendant made application to board No. 2, town-site trustees, for a deed to said tract of land, to wit, lots numbers eleven and twelve (11 &

12), in block No. nine (9), and on the 15th day of January, A. D. 1891, said lots were by said board awarded to said defendant, and on the — day of —, A. D. 1891, said board issued to said defendant a deed therefor. That said board of trustees were duly appointed by the secretary of the interior, and qualified, as such trustees, in accordance with the laws of the United States. That heretofore, to wit, on the 3d day of September, 1890, said board, in pursuance of the authority vested in them, entered at the United States land office the southeast quarter section thirty-three, township twelve north, of range three west of the Indian meridian, of which last-named tract said lots number eleven and twelve, in block number nine, are a part and parcel, and patent for the same was duly issued to said board of

So in Ohio it is said to be utterly opposed to our policy. Drake v. Rogers, 13 Ohio St. 21, overruling Dunn v. Evans, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 169.

This doctrine was, however, adopted in North Carolina. Cutlar v. Cutlar, 9 N. C. 324; Caldwell v. Black, 27 N. C. 463.

But was abolished by statute thereafter.

The right to hunt on unenclosed ground claimed in South Carolina, though conceded to be contrary to the law of England, is considered but not expressly decided in Fripp v. Hasell, 1 Strobb. L. 178, but the land was found to be in fact sufficiently enclosed.

The common law in relation to villenage does not govern in respect to slaves. Fable v. Brown, 2 Hill, Eq. 378.

The rule of the common law that the cutting of a standing tree is waste is wholly inapplicable to the condition of Indians, when a large proportion of the territory consisted of forest. Dawson v. Coffman, 28 Ind. 220.

It is said in Hieatt v. Morris, 10 Ohio St. 523, in respect to long-continued use of a party wall, that if the mere fact of twenty-one years' enjoyment was relied on to support it "we, as at present advised, should probably hold that such an unbending rule is not adapted to the circumstances and existing state of things in this country."

Estates in joint tenancy are held not to exist in Ohio, being not in accordance with the policy of the society and institutions of that state. Sergeant v. Steinberger, 2 Ohio, 806.

The common-law rule denying a reversal in part only of a judgment against an infant and another is rejected in Connecticut on the principle that common-law rules may be varied from so far as they may appear "contrary to reason or unadapted to our local circumstances, the policy of our law, or simplicity of our practice." Wilford v. Grant, Kirby, 117.

The doctrine of charitable uses is upheld in Indiana as not dependent upon the Statute of Elizabeth, but the doctrine of cy pres is rejected as unsuited to our institutions. Grimes v. Harmon, 35 Ind. 198, 9 Am. Rep. 690.

In Van Sickle v. Haines, 7 Nev. 249, it was held that the right of a riparian owner having title to the soil under the water of a stream must be determined in Nevada by the common law.

But this was reconsidered in Reno Smelt. M. & R. Works v. Stevenson, 4 L. R. A. 80, 20 Nev. 269, in which it was held that the common-law doctrine of riparian rights is rejected in Nevada as unsuited to the condition of that state.

In Edwards v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) Sept. 29, 1893, the adoption of the common law by statute is regarded as an adoption of the so-called 23 L. R. A.

common-law rule as to surface water, although that rule does not appear to have been ever actually adopted by any decision until long after the independence of the United States. See note to Gray v. McWilliams (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 593.

The common-law rule that the owner of land through which a stream of water flows must have previously appropriated it to some use before he can be said to sustain any damage from its diversion, is held inapplicable in Vermont. Martin v. Bigelow, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 187, 16 Am. Dec. 694.

In Fulmer v. Williams, 1 L. R. A. 603, 123 Pa. 191, it is said: "On this continent the early settlers found large rivers with navigable tributaries forming vast systems of internal communication extending hundreds, and in some instances thousands, of miles above the reach of tide water. The common-law definition of a navigable river was unsuited to this state of things and seems never to have been adopted in Pennsylvania." But the decisions have not been uniform as to the adoption of common law in respect to navigable streams, and no attempt is made here to present that subject further than merely to call attention to it.

The English common law as to waters has been held inapplicable to our large lakes, such as Lake Champlain, and the fact that no such lakes exist in England is sufficient to explain the inapplicability of the English law to our lakes. Champlain & St. L. R. Co. v. Valentine, 19 Barb. 494. For the law of this country as to ownership of the bed of lakes and ponds, see note to Gouverneur v. National Ice Co. (N. Y.) 18 L. R. A. 695.

So the common law as to waters is held inapplicable to the Niagara river, which is a national boundary, there being no such river in England. Kingman v. Sparrow, 12 Barb. 201. For rivers and lakes as state boundaries, see note to Buck v. Ellensolt (Iowa) 15 L. R. A. 187.

The adoption of the common law as to easements of light and air is a matter on which the decisions are in some conflict and which is the subject of another distinct note soon to appear.

In United States courts and territories.

There is no common law of the United States as distinguished from the individual states. People v. Folsom, 5 Cal. 374; Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 658, 8 L. ed. 1079; Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 508, 128 Pa. 217.

The common-law rule of decision in a federal court is that of the state in which the court is sitting. Lorman v. Clarke, 2 McLean, 568.

The common law is the rule of decision in the federal courts, even when sitting in a territory in the absence of statutes repealing or modifying it. Pyeatt v. Powell, 10 U. S. App. 200, 51 Fed. Rep. 551.

trustees. That on the 80th day of April, A. D. 1891, this plaintiff demanded of defendant that said defendant should convey to plaintiff, by deed, all his (the said defendant's) title to lot 11, in block 9, aforesaid, and then and there plaintiff tendered to said defendant the sum of ten dollars, in good and lawful money of the United States, in payment of the sum due from plaintiff to defendant as aforesaid; and the said defendant then and there refused to execute such conveyance, and refused to accept or receive the sum so tendered. The plaintiff at all times has been ready and willing to pay said sum of ten dollars, and now brings and pays into the court the said sum of ten dollars, in fulfillment of plaintiff's agreement, and for the use and benefit of the said defendant. That plaintiff has complied in every particular with, and fulfilled, all the provisions of the aforesaid agreement, where not prevented by said defendant as hereinbefore stated. That said defendant has wholly failed and refused, and now fails and refuses, to comply with and fulfill the provisions of the aforesaid agreement, to the great damage of this plaintiff. Wherefore, plaintiff prays that it be adjudged that the said defendant hold said lot number eleven, in block nine, in trust for the use and benefit of this plaintiff, and that the said defendant be decreed to convey said lot to this plaintiff, and that in the event said defendant refuses to convey said lot a commissioner be appointed by the court to execute such conveyance, and that plaintiff recover costs of this suit. Thus the common law will be applied to cases arising in the Indian territory, in the absence of any proof of the laws, rules, or customs obtaining in that territory, in the exercise of the jurisdiction given to the United States court created for that territory with the assent of the Indians although there can be no presumption of its adoption based on the character of the settlers. Ibid.

As federal courts have no common-law jurisdiction, in an equity suit brought in the original jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court, respecting a bridge over a navigable river, the same rules of action must govern as if the suit had been commenced in the lower federal court having jurisdiction over the place. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 54 U. S. 13 How. 518, 14 L. ed. 249.

The acquisition of California by the United States did not extend over it the common law which recognizes and sustains the doctrine of escheats. People v. Folsom, supra.

So it is held in Herr v. Johnson, 11 Colo. 306, that there was no common law there until adopted by the legislature.

In criminal matters.

There are no common-law offenses against the United States. United States v. Hudson, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 32, 3 L. ed. 259; United States v. Britton, 108 U. S. 199, 27 L. ed. 608; Re Greene, 53 Fed. Rep. 104; United States v. Eaton, 144 U. S. 877, 36 L. ed. 591; United States v. Lewis, 36 Fed. Rep. 449.

There was much uncertainty on this point in the early decisions. In United States v. Worrall, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 384, 1 L. ed. 426, the circuit court, although divided in opinion upon this point, passed sentence against the prisoner. In United States v. Coolidge, 1 Gall. 488, the judges were divided in opinion and certified the case to the supreme court where in 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 415, 4 L. ed. 124, the court doubted the authority of United States v. Hudson, supra, but followed it for the reason that no counsel appeared for the defendant and the attorney-general declined to argue the point.

But the common law may be looked to for the interpretation of terms in acts of congress adopting or creating common-law offenses if they are not clearly defined in the act. Re Greene, supra; United States v. Armstrong, 2 Curt. C. O. 448; United States v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. Rep. 198.

That the common law prevails in the District of Columbia is held in respect to theft in a Connecticut case. State v. Cummings, 33 Conn. 250, 39 Am. Dec. 208.

In Key v. Vattier, 1 Ohio, 132, it is said that it had been decided that the common law, although in 22 L. R. A.

force in that state in all civil cases, cannot be resorted to for the punishment of crimes.

So it is said in Re Lamphere, 61 Mich. 105, that there is no crime whatever punishable by the laws of Michigan except by virtue of a statutory provision, although there is a general statute resorting to the common law for all nonenumerated crimes, but that the punishment of all indefinite offenses is fixed within named limits and beyond the unregulated discretion of the courts.

The definition of murder and manslaughter not being given by statute in Massachusetts is to be sought in the common law, which was adopted by the first settlers by universal consent and afterwards formally confirmed by the Constitution. Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

The common-law rule as to the sufficiency of a blow as provocation which will reduce homicide to manslaughter is modified by the institution of slavery, so that such blow by master to slave will not mitigate the killing of the master by the slave. Jacob v. State, 3 Humph. 498.

The common-law rule that the killing of a human being by a slave with malice aforethought is murder is in force in Alabama. Burt v. State, 39 Ala. 837.

The common law of England as to crime is in force in Alabama, except as changed by statute, so far as it is consistent with the constitution. State v. Cawood, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 362.

The common law of conspiracy became a part of the law of Maryland. State v. Buchanan, 5 Harr. & J. 358, 9 Am. Dec. 584.

The common law as to the crime of kidnapping is in force in New Hampshire. State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550.

The common-law rule as to homicide without intent to kill is in force in Maine. State v. Smith, 22 Me. 399, 54 Am. Dec. 578.

The common-law rule as to the capacity to commit rape before the age of fourteen is not conclusive in this country. People v. Randolph, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 174.

The common law as to the presumed incapacity of an infant under fourteen years of age to commit rape is not in force in Ohio. The difference in climate, and the fact that the population in this country includes people of different races, prevents the common-law rule from being universally correct in this country. Williams v. State, 14 Ohio, 222, 45 Am. Dec. 538.

The common law in matters of practice as well as principle governs in criminal cases in Texas, in the absence of statutes to the contrary. Hyde v. State, 16 Tex. 445, 67 Am. Dec. 630.

The common-law practice denying any new trial in a capital felony does not govern in Delaware.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 21st day of January, 1892. [Signed] Will H. Clark, Clerk. By E. W. Sweeney, Deputy."

The first ground of demurrer is not well taken. The land was situated in Oklahoma county, and the defendant, so far as we know from the record, was a resident of said county. The town site had been entered by trustees under the law of the United States applicable thereto, and the lots in question by them conveyed to the appellee. The United States had no further interest in the land, and the interior department no further control as to its disposition.

The second ground for demurrer presents two questions: First, Can a parol contract for the conveyance of real estate, or an interest therein, made after the settlement of this country, and prior to the adoption of our organic act, be enforced? Second, Is a contract for the conveyance of real estate, entered into before title is acquired from the United States, and to be executed after title is acquired, void, as against public policy?

The first proposition seems to be settled by the adjudicated cases and text-writers in favor of the appellant. "Every contract, on whatever subject, may be in oral words, which will have the same effect as if written, where the common-law practice of respite pending appeal to the sovereign does not exist. State v. Williams, 24 Ohio L. J. 435.

In criminal matters the common law has been expressly adopted in the absence of statutory provisions on any particular question by Arkansas Mansf. Dig. § 508; Dakota Code Cr. Pr. § 610; Florida Rev. Stat. 1892, § 2309; Illinois Rev. Stat. Starr & C. § 349; Louisiana, Vorhees' Rev. Stat. 1876, § 976; Mississippi Gen. Stat. 1892, § 1452; New Jersey Rev. § 192.

Common-law crimes are recognized as existing in Connecticut Gen. Stat. 1888, § 1642; Idaho Rev. Stat. 1887, § 7232.

In Colorado Mills' Anno. Stat., § 1467, the common-law course of trial is adopted in criminal cases.

In Texas the Penal Code, § 4, declares that the principles of common law shall be the rule of construction when not in conflict with statutory provisions, and the Code of Criminal Procedure, §§ 27 and 725, made the rules of the common law as to procedure and evidence applicable.

Tennessee Milliken & Vertrees' Code, § 5648, provides that an indictment for a common-law offense may describe it according to the common law.

The Louisiana Act of 1805 adopting the common law in criminal cases, adopted it as it existed at that date, modified, explained, and perfected by statutory enactment so far as they are not found to be inconsistent with the peculiar character and genius of the government and institutions of that state. State v. McCoy, 8 Rob. (La.) 545, 41 Am. Dec. 301.

Adoption of British statutes.

In adopting the common law, the date at which it is to be deemed complete so as to be unaffected by subsequent English statutes is not uniformly established. In many states there is no express provision as to the adoption of any English statutes, but the general doctrine, even in those states, is that English statutes or acts of parliament in aid of, or to supply the defects of the common law prior to the time of its adoption in this country are to be taken as part of the common law thus adopted. In several states English statutes down to a period named are expressly adopted so far as they are general and not local to the kingdom of England, and are applicable to American institutions and conditions. In adopting these statutes this limitation is, with some variation of language, expressly named in nearly every instance.

The 4th of July, 1776, is fixed in several states as the date after which the enactment of British statutes should not affect the common law. Florida Rev. Stat. 1892, § 59; Maryland Const. 1867, Declaration of Rights, § 5; Rhode Island Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 259, § 1. So in Kentucky Rev. Stat. chap. 67, 22 L. R. A.

§ 1, that is the date fixed from which English decisions should not be binding.

In Pennsylvania the Act of January 28, 1777, adopts such statute laws of England as were theretofore in force in the province with certain specified exceptions.

But in a large number of states the 4th year of James I. is taken as the period at which English statutes cease to affect the common law. Arkansas Mansf. Dig. 1884, § 506; Colorado Mills' Anno. Stat., 1891, Illinois Starr & C. Anno. Stat. chap. 23, § 1; Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, § 236; Missouri Rev. Stat. 1892, § 6561; Virginia Code 1849, chap. 16, § 2 (Statute of 1776); Wyoming Rev. Stat. 1887, § 498.

But in Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, and Wyoming by the statutes above referred to express exception is made of the Statutes, 43 Eliz. chap. 6, § 2; 18 Eliz. chap. 8, and 37 Hen. VIII., chap. 9.

This statutory adoption is recited as to Illinois in McCool v. Smith, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 459, 17 L. ed. 218. And, as to Indiana, in Dawson v. Coffman, 23 Ind. 230.

And, as to Virginia, in Scott v. Lunt, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 598, 8 L. ed. 797.

And, as to Missouri, in Baker v. Crandall, 78 Mo. 597, 47 Am. Rep. 123.

And, as to Colorado, in Herr v. Johnson, 11 Colo. 393.

In Matthews v. Ansley, 81 Ala. 20, it seems to be held that English statutes are not in force unless passed before the settlement of this country.

The law of England, both common and statute, as it was at the organization of the provincial government, is the law of New Hampshire, so far as it consists with the institutions of that state, unless it be repugnant to the constitution, or altered or repealed by some statutory or legislative enactment. State v. Moore, 26 N. H. 448, 59 Am. Dec. 354.

Delaware Constitution 1776, art. 25, provides that the "common law of England as well as so much of the statute laws as has been heretofore adopted in practice in this state shall remain in force, unless they shall be altered by future law of the legislature, such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and privileges contained in this constitution and the declaration of rights agreed to by this convention." Del. Laws, Appendix, p. 89; Clawson v. Primrose, 4 Del. Ch. 643.

The Statute of 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34, § 1, giving the assignee of a reversion the legal title to the rent, being one of the English statutes adopted by the Illinois statute, the construction given to that Act by the British courts was also intended to be adopted. Fisher v. Deering, 60 Ill. 114.

By the adoption of the common law "as recognized in the United States" as a basis of jurisprudence by the New Mexico Act of 1876, no statutes except when some positive rule of the common or statutory law has provided otherwise." Bishop, Cont. § 158; Mallory v. Gillett, 21 N. Y. 412; Wyman v. Goodrich, 26 Wis. 21; Green v. Brookins, 28 Mich. 48, 9 Am. Rep. 74; White v. Maynard, 111 Mass. 250, 15 Am. Rep. 28. By the common law prior to the enactment of the statute of frauds (29 Car. II. chap. 8, A. D. 1676), contracts for the sale of real estate, or an interest therein, were not required to be in writing. Bishop, Cont. § 1281; 4 Kent, Com. p. 450. The English-speaking people brought the common law to America with them, in the first settlement of the colonies; and it has prevailed in all the states and territories, modified by legislative acts, local conditions, and such of the English statutes adopted prior to the settlement of our colonies as were of general application, and suited to our conditions, except in some portions where the French or civil law prevailed. At the time of the settlement and discovery of America the statute of frauds had not been adopted, and has only become the law of the United States, or of our several states and territories, by legislative enactment. This leads us to the inquiry, Did the common law prevail in the territory in April, 1889? It is contended that prior to the settlement of Oklahoma, and until the same was superseded by statutory laws, the Code Napoleon, or civil law, prevailed. Whatever may have been the laws of the country now known as Oklahoma, they ceased to operate in the region originally comprising the Indian territory when the territory ceased to be a part of the territory of Louisiana, and the laws were repealed but only such portions of the common law adopted as did not conflict with the existing laws. Bent v. Thompson (N. M.) Jan. 23, 1890.

The common law as it stood in 1775 was adopted in Tennessee. Porter v. State, Mart. & Y. (Tenn.) 226.

The common law brought to this country by our ancestors was the law as then modified by statutes. Sackett v. Sackett, 8 Pick. 309.

The common law adopted by the Ordinance of 1787 was the law as then understood and expounded by the courts in America. Penny v. Little, 4 Ill. 301.

In adopting the common law of England, it is adopted as amended or altered by the English statutes in force at the time of the migration of our colonial ancestors. Hamilton v. Kneeland, 1 Nev. 44.

The English statutes passed before the American Revolution are part of the common law in this country, so far as applicable to our condition and not abrogated. Coburn v. Harvey, 18 Wis. 148.

The statute law of the mother country when introduced into the colony of New York because it was applicable to the colonists in their new situation and not by legislative enactment, becomes a part of the common law of the province. Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 178, 3 L. ed. 394.

The early English statutes enacted before the settlement of New York such as the Statute of Merton, are part of the common law of New York. Miller v. Miller, 18 Hun, 512.

That many statutes were practiced under nearly a century in the province of Pennsylvania which were never adopted by the legislature is stated in Republica v. Masca, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 75, 1 L. ed. 43.

The common law of England has always been in force in Pennsylvania, but British statutes before the settlement of Pennsylvania have no force there, unless they are convenient and adapted to the circumstances of the country, and statutes made since the settlement of Pennsylvania have no force there, unless the colonies are particularly named. Morris v. Vanderen, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 67, 1 L. ed. 40.

In the Pennsylvania Act of January 28, 1777, it is provided that the common law and such of the statute laws of England as have been heretofore in force in the said province shall be in force except as therein excepted. The exception relates to the oath of allegiance to the king, the acknowledgment of authority in the heirs of William Penn, the laws as to members of assembly and elections, and as to treason, and "anything inconsistent with the then existing constitution." Report of Judges, 3 Binn. 565.

The report of the judges as to what English statutes are in force in Pennsylvania, says it has always been held that many of the English laws relating both to property and to felonies would have been improper for the state of things in an infant colony, and accordingly they were never practically extended here. It is said also that with respect to English statutes enacted since the settlement of Pennsylvania, "it has been assumed, as a principle, that they do not extend here unless they have been recognized by our acts of assembly or adopted by long-continued practice in courts of justice." Ibid.

Where the English statutes contravene or change the common law and are not so incorporated into it as to become part and parcel of the system, it is supposed that they have no force in Ohio independent of legislative enactment adopting them. Crawford v. Chapman, 17 Ohio, 452.

The right to distrain for rent, without any express provision therefor in a lease, is recognized in Illinois under the Act of February 4, 1819, adopting the common law and statutes, or acts of parliament in aid of it prior to the fourth year of James I., although the right to distrain in such a case in England did not exist until the fourth year of Geo. II. The legislation adopting the common law had reference to that law as it then existed. Penny v. Little, 4 Ill. 301.

Michigan having never been a common-law colony, the common law recognized in the jurisprudence of that state is the English common law unaffected by statute. Re Lamphere, 61 Mich. 105.

It should be noted in reference to the above statement that the English statutes have been expressly repealed in Michigan, although that fact is not expressly made the basis of the declaration. It is, however, referred to in the same connection and probably should be regarded as the ground of the declaration which otherwise would be in conflict with the doctrine of nearly all other courts. See also, in this connection, the cases concerning repeal of English statutes, infra.

Particular Illustrations.

The Statute of 6 Anne, chap. 31, § 8, denying liability to others for accidental fire started on one's own premises, is a part of the common law in Wisconsin. Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69.

That statute as re-enacted by 14 Geo. III., is also a part of the common law in force in New York. Lansing v. Stone, 14 Abb. Pr. 202, 37 Barb. 15.

The statute of Anne as to the negotiability of paper is not in force in Indiana. As the fourth year of James I. is fixed by statute as the time when such statutes ceased to be part of the of the territory of Indiana and the territory of Missouri, which may have once prevailed in said region, became inoperative in—ceased to have any force or effect in—the Indian territory, when that territory ceased to be a part of said territories. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. O'Loughlin, 4 U. S. App. 283, 49 Fed. Rep. 440. There was no law in the Indian territory regulating the making of contracts at the time of the approval of the act of congress establishing a United States district court in said territory by the Act of March 1, 1889. 25 Stat. at L. 783. Congress, with the assent of the Indians, created the court for the whole of the Indian territory, which included Oklahoma, and conferred on it jurisdiction in all civil cases between citizens of the United States who are residents of the territory, or between citizens of the United States or of any state or territory, and any citizen of, or person residing or found in, the Indian territory. It gave the court authority, and imposed upon it the duty, to apply the established rules and principles of the common law to the adjudication of those cases of which it was given jurisdiction. Pyeatt v. Powell, 10 U. S. App. 200, 51 Fed. Rep. 551. But if it be held that the establishment of a United States court in the Indian territory did not put the common law in force in said territory, except in so far as was necessary to execute the powers of said court, and for the adjudication of such cases as actually went into that forum, then there was no law in Oklahoma, at the date of its settlement, regulating the making of contracts. If this should be conceded, then it necessarily follows, on principle, that when common law adopted. Holloway v. Porter, 46 Ind. 62.

The Statute of 4 & 5 Anne, chap. 16. § 9, dispensing with attornment to create privity and enabling an assignee to sue for rent, is not in force in Illinois for the same reason. Fisher v. Deering, 60 Ill. 114.

The court here seems to adopt a rule that has not been followed elsewhere.

The English Statutes of 30 Charles II., chap. 7, and 4 and 5 William & Mary, chap. 24, concerning the liability of executors and administrators, became a part of the law of Maryland. Sibley v. Williams, 3 Gill & J. 62.

The 45th chapter of 13 Edw. I. giving the writ of scire facias is in force in Florida by virtue of the Act of November 6, 1820, adopting the common and statute laws of England which are of a general and not of a local nature, with certain exceptions and provisos. Union Bank of Florida v. Powell, 3 Fla. 175, 52 Am. Dec. 367.

The Act of 23 Edw. The Statute of Elizabeth concerning charitable uses is presumed to have been in force in the colony of New York. Yates v. Yates, 9 Barb. 337.

In Reformed Prot. Dutch Church v. Mott, 7 Paige, 77, 4 L. ed. 77, 32 Am. Dec. 613, it was said that the Statute of Elizabeth relative to charitable uses was never acted upon in this state, but the court held that the law of charities existed before that statute.

The Statute of 43 Eliz., chap. 4, in regard to charitable uses, became a part of the law of Massachusetts. Goling v. Emery, 16 Pick. 107, 28 Am. Dec. 645.

The English Statute of Uses constitutes a part of the common law of Alabama. Horton v. Sledge, 29 Ala. 478.

In Pennsylvania, it is held that the Statute 43 Eliz. chap. 4, was not adopted there. Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 88, 17 Am. Dec. 644.

But the Statute of Elizabeth as to charitable uses is held to be in force in Vermont. Burr v. Smith, 7 Vt. 241, 29 Am. Dec. 154.

The Statutes of Elizabeth restraining alienation of real estate by charitable corporations were a part of the common law of New York. Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Oliver St. Baptist Church, 46 N. Y. 141.

In De Ruyter v. St. Peter's Church, 3 Barb. Ch. 124, 5 L. ed. 843, it is said that they were probably a part of the law of the colonies.

In Kentucky, it is held that none of the mortmain acts of England were ever in force on the ground that those acts were local and not applicable to the British colonies. Lathrop v. Commercial Bank of Scioto, 8 Dana, 114, 33 Am. Dec. 481.

The English Statute of 9 Geo. I., commonly called the "Black Act," being made to protect the forest and parks, although containing provisions also against the malicious shooting of persons, cannot be regarded as a part of the common law people from all parts of the United States, on the 22d day of April 1889, settled the country known as Oklahoma, built cities, towns, and villages, and began to carry on trade and commerce in all its various branches, they brought into Oklahoma, with them, the established principles and rules of the common law, as recognized and promulgated by the American courts, and as it existed when imported into this country by our early settlers, and unmodified by American or English statutes. So that, in any event, the common law prevailed in Oklahoma at the time the contract between the appellant and appellee was entered into; and as, at common law, contracts for the sale or conveyance of real estate were not required to be in writing, the contract mentioned in the complaint may be enforced, unless void for other reasons.

It is contended that the contract is one for the sale of an interest in public lands, made before the title had passed from the United States, and hence is void as against public policy. We are aware that some of our courts have adopted this rule, and there are many strong reasons in support of it; but the Supreme Court of the United States, in Lamb v. Davenport, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 807, 21 L. ed. 759, said: "Unless forbidden by positive law, contracts made by actual settlers on lands, concerning their possessory rights, and concerning the title to be acquired in future from the United States, are valid, as between the parties to the contracts, though there be at the time no act of congress by which title of Georgia. State v. Campbell, T. U. P. Charlt. 167.

The Statutes of Limitation of 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 2, and 21 James I., chap. 16, are a part of the law of the colony of New York. Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 178, 3 L. ed. 304.

The Statute of 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 2, was held in 1767 to be in force in Pennsylvania. Boehm v. Engle, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 15, 1 L. ed. 17; Morris v. Vanden, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 67, 1 L. ed. 40.

But the Statute 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 2, against embezzlement, is not in force in Pennsylvania, neither is the Act of 21 Jac. I., chap. 16. Morris v. Vanden, supra.

The ground of decision in respect to these statutes is not stated.

The ancient common-law rule that an assignee of rent and reversion could only maintain an action of debt and not an action of covenant, having been changed by Statute 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 34, is not a part of the common law of Connecticut. Baldwin v. Walker, 21 Conn. 181.

The Statute of 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 34, which permits grantees of reversions and privies in estate to take advantage of a breach of a condition, is a part of the common law adopted in this country. Hamilton v. Kneeland, 1 Nev. 40. See Fisher v. Deering, 60 Ill. 114.

The Statute of 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 34, giving grantees of reversions the right to enforce real covenants, has not become incorporated into the law of Ohio. Crawford v. Chapman, 17 Ohio. 452.

The alteration of the common law by Statute 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 23, which gives a wife and her heirs a right of entry after her husband's death notwithstanding a deed of her premises by him, is a part of the common law of Massachusetts. Bruce v. Wood, 1 Met. 542, 35 Am. Dec. 330.

The Statute of 21 Jac. I., chap. 12, as to the locality of actions against officers seems to have been in force in Massachusetts before the Revolution, but was subsequently repealed by implication. Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 354.

The Statute of James passed in 1623 is said never to have had any existence in Delaware, but the Act of 15 Geo. II., was the first statute of limitations known to have been in force in that colony. Hulley v. Security Trust & S. D. Co. 5 Del. Ch. 578.

The Statutes 8 & 9 Wm. III., chap. 11, § 7, as to abatement of suits on the death of one of the plaintiffs or defendants, seem to have been adopted in Massachusetts. Boynton v. Rees, 9 Pick. 532.

The Statute of William & Mary, chap. 5, as to distress and sale for rent is not in force in North Carolina, being held utterly irreconcilable to the spirit of a free republican government. Dalglish v. Grandy, Taylor & C. 161.

The Statute of William & Mary, chap. 5, which gives the right to distrain for rent, being expressly recognized in Wisconsin by the Statute of 1839, must be regarded as a part of the common law which was perpetuated by the constitution. Coburn v. Harvey, 18 Wis. 148.

But the right of the landlord to distrain for rent in the absence of an express agreement therefor, not existing in England prior to the fourth year of James I., cannot be regarded as a part of the common law adopted in Colorado. Herr v. Johnson, 11 Colo. 333. See also Penny v. Little, 4 Ill. 301.

The English statutes as to benefit of clergy were local and not a part of the common law. Fuller v. State, 1 Blackf. 63.

In Girard v. Philadelphia, 4 Rawle, 333, 26 Am. Dec. 145, it is said that it is practically clear that the English statutes of wills were originally in force in Pennsylvania.

Repeal of English statutes.

An express repeal of English statutes was made by the Michigan Act of 1810, by the Iowa Act of 1840, and by the New York Laws of 1823, chap. 21, § 1, which declare that no English statute should be regarded as in force in New York since May 1, 1783.

In Helfenstine v. Garrard, 7 Ohio, 276, it is held that the English Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. VIII., chap. 10, is not in force in Ohio, and that if it ever was in force there, it became so by statute and was repealed by the Acts of 1805 and 1806.

An Ohio statute in 1873, adopted from Virginia, made the English statutes up to the fourth year of James I. in force so far as they aided the common law and were not inapplicable, but this act was repealed and re-enacted in 1805 and again repealed in 1806. Therefore British statutes contravening or changing the common law are not in force in Ohio except as they are made so by re-enactment, unless they are so incorporated into the common law as to be part and parcel of it. Crawford v. Chapman, 17 Ohio, 452.

An interesting question arises as to whether such repeal of English statutes is to be regarded as excluding from consideration those English statutes which had become a part of the common law of the colonies; that is to say whether the adoption of the common laws is to be regarded, notwithstanding this general repeal of English statutes, to be the adoption of the common law unaffected by any English statutes, or as modified and perfected by English legislation as well as decision down to the time of this adoption.

In Lansing v. Stone, 37 Barb. 15, the latter is held to be the correct rule, and that English statutes which were a part of the common law of the col-may be acquired." This case is decisive of the question at issue, and is supported by the ruling of the same court in the case of Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, 25 L. ed. 814. There was no positive law, at the time this contract was entered into, forbidding the sale of town lots by settlers, and the contract was binding in law, and may be enforced by a proper proceeding.

The complaint states a cause of action, and the demurrer thereto should have been overruled. The court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, and for that error the judgment is reversed, at costs of appellee. The cause is remanded to the court below, with instructions to overrule the demurrer, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

any of New York continued, notwithstanding such repealing act, to be a part of the common law.

So, in Miller v. Miller, 18 Hun, 512, it is declared that early English statutes such as the Statute of Merton are part of the common law of New York but no mention is made of the repealing acts.

To similar effect it is held in O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 361, that the Statute of Merton is not abrogated in Iowa by the Act of 1840, declaring that none of the statutes of Great Britain shall be considered as laws of that territory, but the statutes intended will be held to be those of Great Britain after the Union with Scotland in 1707.

But to the contrary it was held in Levy v. McCarter, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 102, 8 L. ed. 384, that the words "common law" used in the New York Constitution of 1777 and the Statute of Descents of 1786 adopting the common law, were used to mean the unwritten law as distinguished from statutes, even those antecedent to the American Revolution, and especially after the Act of 1788, declaring that none of the statutes of England or Great Britain shall be considered laws of the state, the Statutes of 11 & 12 Wm. III., chap. 6, in respect to descents, cannot be regarded as in force in New York.

In Wisconsin the Michigan Act of 1810, which became a part of the law of Wisconsin, was repealed by Wis. Rev. Stat. 1849, p. 750, but by p. 757, chap. 157, § 5, all statutes abrogated by any law repealed were deemed abrogated, therefore English statutes are repealed in Wisconsin. In several cases English statutes have been held to be a part of the common law of that state, without considering the effect of such repealing act. In Webster v. Morris, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 273, it was held that the English Statute of Mortmain and the Statute of 43 Eliz. chap. 14, were not in force in that state, but here again there is no discussion of the effect of the repealing act.

The repeal by the Iowa Act of 1840 of the Statute of Michigan and Wisconsin did not repeal the Ordinance of 1787, as applied to that territory. O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 361.

In repealing the Statute of Elizabeth and the Statute of Mortmain, the New York legislature did not intend to ratify and reintroduce the system of pious and charitable uses which prevailed in England before the reformation. Ayers v. Methodist Episcopal Church Trustees, 3 Sandf. 398; Downing v. Marshall, 23 How. Pr. 39.

The question of the repeal or abrogation of the common law in any particular is not here entered upon, but the subject of repeal considered only in respect to British statutes. B. A. E.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

E. P. MOUNT, Respnt.

(.....Wis.....)

Representations that a horse is safe for a lady to drive, by which she is induced to drive the horse on trial and is thrown out and injured by the plunging and kicking of the horse, which is in fact an ugly, vicious, and tricky animal, create a liability in the nature of a tort for breach of a warranty of the safety of the horse, although the person making the representations did not know that they were false.

(November 22, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Walworth County granting a new trial after verdict in her favor in a proceeding brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon her by the viciousness of a horse which defendant was trying to sell to her husband, and which she undertook to try, upon defendant's statement that the horse was safe for her to drive. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ryan & Merton, for appellant:

Plaintiff drove this horse at the special solicitation and request of the defendant, and it was so driven by the plaintiff relying upon the representation that it was kind, gentle, and fit for a lady to drive. Such representation amounted to a warranty.

Smith v. Justice, 13 Wis. 601; Barnes v. Burns, 81 Wis. 235.

A warranty of the fitness of an animal for family use for the trial trip, made under the circumstances of the one in this case, can be upheld.

A valuable consideration, in the sense of the law, may consist in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility given over or undertaken by the other. Consideration may either be the doing of the act or the giving of the promise.

Mr. Warham Parks, for respondent:

There can be no doubt but that this action as originally brought was an action in tort, for a willful misrepresentation of the character of the horse, whereby the plaintiff was induced to use him and was injured in consequence thereof, and alleged a scienter. After a trial which resulted in a disagreement of the jury, the plaintiff amended his former complaint and since said time it has been an open question unsolved and hardly solvable whether the action was then changed by said amendment from an action ex delicto to an action ex contractu. No amendment could be allowed changing the action from one on contract to one in tort, or from one in tort to one on contract.

But it possibly might be in this case under the rule in Pierce v. Carey, 87 Wis. 282; but see also Western Assur. Co. v. Towle, 65 Wis. 254.

There can be no warranty that is not a contract. A warranty must be upon sale, one of the terms of the contract of sale; must be upon consideration; there can be no warranty that is not a contract; it must be entered into and accepted by both parties as an agreement between them.

In order to create a warranty there must be a contract and assertions or affirmations of quality, made by the owner during the negotiation for the sale, which may be supposed was intended to cause the sale and operated in causing it. If such affirmation was made in good faith it is still a warranty, and if made with a knowledge of its falsity is a warranty and also a fraud.

A warranty in order to become a part of the contract and to be a warranty, must be made at the time of the sale and be one of the terms of the contract of sale.

In all cases where an action is brought for injury done to person or property by another, by domestic animals, such as horses, oxen, etc., the owner must be shown to have had notice of their viciousness before he can be charged, because such animals are not by nature fierce or dangerous, and such notice must be alleged in the pleadings and proven upon trial as a condition of recovery.

Orton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint states the following case: The plaintiff's husband, Claude N. Cameron, wished to buy a kind and gentle road horse for his wife to drive. The defendant called upon the said Claude N. Cameron, and told him that he had been informed he wished to buy a horse for his wife, and that he had with him a kind, gentle, and safe horse, to sell; whereupon the said Claude called his wife, the plaintiff, to look at the horse, and she came and looked at him, and asked the defendant if the horse was kind and gentle, and free from any bad tricks and habits. The defendant then and there represented and warranted to the plaintiff that said horse was kind and gentle, and free from any tricks and bad habits, and that he was perfectly safe and well calculated for a lady to drive, and invited her to get in his buggy and drive the horse herself. The plaintiff, relying on said representations and warranty, got into the buggy to drive the horse, to try him, and, after driving a short distance, she attempted to turn around, and the horse made a sudden plunge, reared up, and kicked and upset the buggy, and the plaintiff was thrown violently to the ground, and permanently injured in her spine, and bruised and injured in other places on her body, to her damage of $3,000. In truth and fact the horse was an ugly, vicious, and tricky animal, and not a safe driving horse, and entirely unsuitable for a lady to drive or manage. On the trial of the action the facts stated in the complaint were substantially established by the testimony of the plaintiff and her witnesses, and the jury found a special verdict in her favor, and her damages at $3,000. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, based on several grounds, and especially on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action. The court granted the motion, but without stating any grounds therefor, and without terms. The plaintiff has appealed from this order. The briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides go to the question of the sufficiency of the complaint, it not being alleged therein that the defendant knew at the time he made the said representation and warranty that they were untrue. There was no scintilla alleged in the complaint. The learned counsel seem to be of the opinion that this deficiency of the complaint was the real ground for the granting of a new trial. The jury found specially that the defendant knew that the representations and warranty were false, but it is conceded that there was no evidence to sustain such a finding. The learned counsel of the appellant contend that this was not a good ground for ordering a new trial of the action, and, on the other hand, the learned counsel of the respondent contend that this reason was not only sufficient for ordering a new trial, but that the plaintiff cannot recover without such an averment and proof of a scintilla. There seemed to be great doubt on the trial, as well as here, whether the action is in tort or on contract. We are inclined to hold that such an averment and proof are not necessary to sustain the action, and that the action is in tort. The representations and warranty set out in the complaint are not strictly and technically a "warranty," as in sales of personal property. If they were, no one would contend that it would be necessary to prove that the defendant knew that the facts or conditions embraced therein did not exist or were not true, and the action would be on contract. On such a warranty the law is well settled; but, nevertheless, they do constitute a warranty of the facts and conditions embraced therein as effectually, and are an assurance and engagement just as positive and absolute, as a technical warranty. To sustain an action on such a warranty there is no more necessity of proof that the defendant knew that his statement was false than in the other case of a warranty. The action on a warranty in the sale of personal property is on contract. The action on a warranty relating to other matters or transactions is in tort, and the warranty is a constructive fraud, like a false representation. The learned counsel of the respondent contends that no warranty, as such, can exist except in relation to sales. To show that a warranty may exist in its strictness so far as to dispense with proof that the defendant knew its falsity with respect to other matters than sales, and to illustrate the principle, the case of Kuehn v. Wilson, 13 Wis. 105, may be referred to. The defendant, as a farrier, treated the plaintiff's colt, and "warranted the colt would get well and do well," and it died within a short time thereafter without any fault of the plaintiff. Mr. Justice Cole said in the opinion: "An express warranty that the colt would get well would be an absolute engagement to make good the loss if the colt died. The warrantor would take the chances and hazards," etc. Here there is a warranty that the horse was perfectly safe and well calculated for a lady to drive, and that he was kind and gentle, and had no tricks or bad habits, and the same "absolute engagement to make good the loss" or damage if the horse was not perfectly safe and well calculated for a lady to drive, and "the warrantor took the chances and hazards" of the experiment. Such warranties constitute a class of frauds, exceptional to the common cases of mere false representations, where an intent to defraud and a knowledge that they were false must be proved. It is an absolute and unconditional engagement to make good the loss.

The following is a terse and yet comprehensive statement of the law governing this kind of warranty, taken from Gregory v. Schoenell, 55 Ind. 101, found in a note to 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 793: "The law holds a contracting party liable as for a fraud on his express representations concerning facts material to the treaty, the truth of which he assumes to know, and the truth of which is not known to the other contracting party, where the representations were false, and the other party, relying upon them, has been misled to his injury. In such a case the law holds a party bound to know the truth of his representations." "Whoever pretends to positive knowledge of a particular fact, when he does not know it, and represent such fact to be true, in order that another may rely upon it and act upon it, and does rely and act upon it, and damages flow from the false representation, the person making it is guilty of willful deception and fraud." "If he affirms that to be true within his own knowledge which he does not know to be true, this falls within the notion of legal fraud." "If a man having no knowledge whatever on the subject takes upon himself to represent a certain state of facts to exist, he does so at his peril; and if it is done to procure some benefit to himself, or to deceive a third person, he is in law guilty of a fraud, for he takes upon himself to warrant his own belief of the truth of that which he asserts." "A reckless statement, made without caring whether it is true or false, is actionable." "In such cases it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew that the representation was not true." These extracts are taken from the following cases, in which it is held that it is immaterial whether the defendant knew the falsity of the express and positive statement which he has made, and upon which another has relied and acted to his injury. Taylor v. Ashton, 11 Mees. & W. 415; Smout v. Ilbery, 10 Mees. & W. 10; Parson v. Watson, Cowp. 788; Pulsford v. Richards, 17 Beav. 94; Haycraft v. Creasy, 2 East. 108; Evans v. Edmonds, 18 C. B. 786; Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. Jr. 470; Pasley v. Freeman, 8 T. R. 51; Milne v. Marwood, 15 C. B. 778; Addison, Torts, 738, 739.

It has been the doctrine of the English courts a long time that when the representation is so positive and absolute as to have the force of an express warranty it is immaterial whether the defendant knew it to be false or not. The representations and warranty in this case have all the accompanying ingredients to make it an actionable fraud. The defendant invited and induced the plaintiff to drive the horse, and she did so, relying upon his representation and warranty that it was perfectly safe for her to do so, and his other assurances of the gentle character of the animal. The defendant was interested in inducing the plaintiff to drive the horse, so that, if it should happen in this instance that the horse should not exhibit any of his unruly and dangerous habits, he might sell him to the plaintiff's husband; and the plaintiff was also interested in the trial, so that she might have a gentle and safe horse to drive. The defendant assumed all the risks and hazards of the trial, and the plaintiff staked her personal safety on the truth of his representations and warranty, and her severe and permanent injuries were the proximate consequences. This is a very strong case for the application of the principle of the law of warranty. The defendant made his statements as his own actual knowledge, and the plaintiff had no knowledge of the horse or his habits. There is nothing wanting in the case to make the defendant liable, according to the authorities, if the complaint is sustained by the evidence. The case should be tried on the true theory of what the action is and on a correct view of the law that governs it; and there seems to have been great doubt upon the subject at the former trial. Not knowing from the order granting a new trial the grounds of it, this court cannot say that it was an abuse of the discretion of the circuit court to grant it. It would seem to be very proper, under the circumstances, that the action should be tried again. The order is erroneous in not having been made on the terms of the defendant paying all the taxable costs of the former trial. In the absence of any stated grounds for the order, the presumption is that it was made on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, or on the merits; and in such case the order should have been made on such terms. Garny v. Katz (Wis.) 56 N. W. Rep. 912 (on the present calendar, not yet officially reported); Pound v. Roan, 45 Wis. 129; Smith v. Lander, 48 Wis. 587; Schraer v. Stefn, 80 Wis. 653.

The order of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to grant a new trial therein, on the terms of the defendant paying all the taxable costs of the former trial.

The action of county commissioners on petition under Acts 1893, p. 741, which says the board "may fix and allow a certain sum" within prescribed limits and that any such allowance and the proceedings of the board in relation thereto, "if in conformity with the provisions of this Act, shall be final and conclusive," is an exercise of the discretion of the board and is not a judicial act from which any appeal can be taken.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vigo County in favor of plaintiffs upon appeal from a decision of the Board of Commissioners refusing to authorize additional compensation to certain judges. Appeal from the commissioner's decision dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel R. Hamill for appellant.

Messrs. Isaac N. Pierce and Sidney B. Davis, in propria persona, for appellees.

Hackney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees, twenty-one in number, proceeding under the Act of the General Assembly approved March 4, 1893, Acts 1893, p. 341, petitioned the appellant, representing that the salaries, as provided by law, of the Honorable David N. Taylor, judge of the circuit court of Vigo county, and Honorable Cyrus F. McNutt, judge of the superior court of said county, were inadequate compensation for their services as such judges, and that such salaries should be increased as to each of said judges in the sum of $1,500. The petitioners prayed a hearing as provided in said act, and that said salaries be so increased.

Such proceedings were had before said appellant that, after hearing evidence, the prayer of the petition was denied. From this ruling of the board, the petitioners appealed to the superior court, where the petition was heard by a special judge and the prayer thereof was granted. From the judgment of the superior court this appeal is prosecuted and several errors are assigned, one of which alleged errors is the action of said superior court in overruling the motion of the appellant to dismiss said appeal from the action of the board. The alleged reason for the dismissal of said appeal was that no appeal would lie from the said action of the commissioners.

The character and effect of the action of the commissioners is also presented by the appellee's motion to dismiss this appeal, and we find it our duty at the threshold of this controversy to determine this question, for upon it depends the jurisdiction of this court. It is manifest that if no appeal could lie from the action of the commissioners, the superior court had no jurisdiction, and its proceedings cannot be reviewed here.

Where the duty of the commissioners involves judicial action, an appeal lies from its judgment unless the right of appeal is denied expressly, or by necessary implication from the statute creating the duty. Where that duty does not involve judicial action, but consists in the performance of administrative, ministerial or discretionary powers, no appeal lies from such action unless it is expressly authorized by statute. Bunnell v. White County Comrs. 124 Ind. 1; Farley v. Hamilton County Comrs. 126 Ind. 468; Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs. 103 Ind. 860; Waller v. Wood, 101 Ind. 138; Jackson County Comrs. v. State, 106 Ind. 270; Padgett v. State, 98 Ind. 896; O'Boyle v. Shannon, 80 Ind. 159; Grusenmeyer v. Logansport, 78 Ind. 549; *Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v. To which class the case in hand belongs must be determined from the act of the legislature under which these proceedings were had, and to that end we set out the act which is as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Indiana that the salaries of the judges of the circuit and superior courts of the state shall be twenty-five hundred dollars annually, payable quarterly out of the state treasury. Provided, that in all judicial circuits of this state containing any city which had a population of more than thirty thousand as shown by the last preceding United States census, whenever twenty or more resident freeholders of the county in which such city is situated shall, by their petition filed with the board of commissioners of such county, represent that the annual salary of the judge of said circuit or superior court, as otherwise provided by law, is not an adequate compensation for the services of such judge, and should be increased in a sum to be specified in such petition, then it shall be the duty of the board of commissioners of such county, in open session, without delay, and at either a regular or special term of such board, to consider such petition and hear evidence thereon, and thereupon, within the limits of such evidence, but in no event in excess of the sum of fifteen hundred dollars or in excess of the sum specified in such petition, such board of commissioners may by entry of record fix and allow a certain sum as an addition to or increase of the annual salary of the judge of such circuit or superior court.

"Sec. 2. Upon such allowance being made by such board of commissioners, the sum so allowed shall be payable only out of the treasury of the county in which such petition is required to be filed, and shall be payable quarterly upon warrants drawn by the auditor of such county upon the treasurer thereof, and from and after the date of such allowance by such board, the same shall be held as an addition to the annual salary of such judge, as otherwise fixed and provided by law, and shall not be diminished during the term of office of such judge, and any such allowance and the proceedings of any board of commissioners in relation thereto, if in compliance with the provisions of this act, shall be final and conclusive."

The 3d section declares an emergency.

Several features of the act indicate to our minds the intention of the legislature to commit to the board of commissioners a discretionary power as to the increasing of judges' salaries and not as conferring a power the exercise of which could be held mandatory. The language of the act is permissive in that it entrusts to the board a discretion as to the amount to be fixed as representing the increase of salary. The language is that "such board . . . may fix and allow a certain sum." The word "may" has in some instances been construed as the equivalent of the word "shall," but in no instance to which our attention has been called, where it was evident that the act, from other points of view, conferred discretionary powers nor where it was not evident from the whole act that the legislative direction was mandatory.

The application of the rule that "may" is to be interpreted for "shall" depends on what appears to be the true intent of the statute, and the ordinary meaning of the language must be presumed to be intended unless it would manifestly defeat the object of the provision. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. p. 377; Minor v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 46, 7 L. ed. 47.

It is earnestly contended by counsel for the appellees that the act does not contemplate adversary parties or proceedings in the sense that claims against counties are prosecuted. If it were conceded that this construction is correct, it but argues that the legislature did not intend to deprive the commissioners of discretion in the matter of granting an increase of salary in any sum. The legislative grant of power to increase salaries certainly involved the duty of judging of the wisdom and propriety not only of the amount to be added, but as to whether any addition should be made. If this duty was not placed upon the commissioners, it had but one other place to rest, and that was upon the twenty petitioners. We cannot bring ourselves to the belief that the legislature intended to place the authority with the petitioners of judging conclusively that an increase of salary was proper and that the only duty or power of the commissioners was to adjudge the will of the petitioners with the incidental right to fix the amount of the additional salary.

Another indicium of the legislative intent to bestow a discretionary power upon the commissioners is found in the last clause of the second section in these words: "Any such allowance, and the proceedings of the board of commissioners in relation thereto, if in compliance with the provisions of this act, shall be final and conclusive." What shall be final and conclusive? Nor only the sum fixed, but the proceedings of the board in relation thereto.

But, it is said, such provision must be held not to imply a discretionary power, but as guarding the proceedings and the result from collateral attack, or from being questioned except by direct proceeding, such as an appeal. To this contention is cited the case of Grusenmeyer v. Logansport, 76 Ind. 549, and while we observe that the reasoning of the learned and able judge who wrote the opinion in that case would support the contention here, yet such question was not before the court in that case, and of course the value of the case as authority depends upon the question decided, and not upon the argument, illustrations, or reasoning of the judge when not directed to the point in dispute. See State v. Hyde, 18 L. R. A. 79, 139 Ind. 306.

In that case, the language of the statute standing in the place of the clause here quoted, was that the "order shall be conclusive in all suits by or against such incorporation." It was there said that such provisions "should not be regarded as an implied denial of the right of appeal," and with the conclusion reached we fully concur. We think it manifest that the expression there employed was designed to protect the incorporation proceedings from collateral attack. The order was made "conclusive in all suits by or against such incorporation," and it could not be implied that the order of incorporation was one of the suits concluded. The statute under investigation in this case is of a widely different character. The allowance, if any, is "final and conclusive," and the proceedings in relation thereto, regardless of the function involved, whether judicial, administrative, or ministerial, are "final and conclusive." This provision is not confined to other suits, but is sweeping in its effect so far as the particular proceeding is concerned. None of the force of this construction is lost by considering the words, "if in compliance with this act," for the reason that if not in compliance with the act, such proceedings would be as vulnerable to collateral attack without such words. Nor could this provision, as to the conclusive character of the proceedings, have been intended to create an obstruction to such litigation as might reduce the allowance made, since by another provision of the act such a contingency is provided for. It is equally true that the provision was not intended to operate as a former adjudication against granting an increase within the limits of the maximum sum, because the intention of the act is to provide compensation at any time in proportion to the service performed. To construe the clause as denying the right of appeal and as entrusting the power of fixing salaries, within such limits, leads to the rational conclusion that the legislature would not deem it necessary or even prudent to guard the proceedings against collateral attack when the law is firmly settled and no longer in question that such proceedings could not be the subject of collateral attack if conducted according to the provisions of the act. In view of the now generally accepted doctrine that mere irregularities furnish no ground for collateral attack, and that where jurisdiction exists it will be presumed in all other proceedings to have been properly exercised, we cannot agree with the contention that the legislature ignored this doctrine as existing independent of the act, and then unnecessarily re-established it for the purposes of this special proceeding.

The appellees urge, as we have said, that the statute does not create an adversary proceeding, and this conclusion is obvious. The petitioners, not parties in immediate interest, invoke the power of the board. The power is not so exercised as to constitute an allowance in favor of any party to the record. A definite sum is not directed to be allowed, but a limitation is placed upon the sum which may be allowed. The board is the financial agent of the county, its power being supervisory as to the expenditure of the county, as to the levying of taxes and as to provision to meet the county's obligations. Such is the effect of our form of local government, and the legislature will be presumed to have acted with reference to this rule, unless it is expressly or by necessary implication provided that an exception shall exist. The act under consideration does not create an exception to the general rule.

If the obligations and the resources of the county were to form no part of the consideration of the question of increasing salaries, there was no occasion to have delegated the legislative power to the board to fix such salaries.

The statute under consideration confers the power upon the board to bind the county as by contract, and should be strictly construed. Robinson, County & Township Officers, § 38, and authorities there cited.

Rules of construction applicable to legislation in which the public at large are interested require liberality, while with reference to legislation granting powers or privileges to individuals for their own advantage, they require strict construction as against such individuals. Ryan v. Vanlandingham, 7 In. 416, 423; Bradley v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 21 Conn. 294.

As granting the prayer of the petition without discretion on the part of the board, the act would require liberal construction in favor of the individual rights and strict construction as against the public rights. But it is insisted that the action of the board in the hearing of evidence, as required by the legislature, is in its nature judicial, and that therefore an appeal lies from such action. While it would appear anomalous to grant the right of appeal to the petitioners, where they fail, and to permit no adversary party, not even the board, with the right of appeal where the petition is granted, yet such is the effect of this contention. While not denying the power of the legislature to so enact, we must observe that such unusual and extraordinary purpose should clearly appear, and should not result from a strained construction. But, for the purpose of the question urged, let us concede that the action of the board is judicial in its character, and then, if we are correct in our conclusion that the clause of the second section making its action final and conclusive precludes an appeal, we have the exercise by the legislature of a power certainly possessed, whereby the right of appeal is cut off, even in a proceeding judicial in its character. But we do not hold that the hearing so provided involves judicial action.

In Flournoy v. Jeffersonville, 17 Ind. 169, 79 Am. Dec. 468, it is said: "A judicial act, then, must be an act performed by a court, touching the rights of parties or property, brought before it by voluntary appearance, or by the prior action of ministerial officers."

This definition has been accepted and followed by this court many times and under it there would seem to be no judicial action where the parties whose rights are to be affected are not before the court. Pennington v. Straight, 54 Ind. 376.

In considering the effect of conferring the power to hear and examine, and as to whether such power was necessarily judicial in its character, it was said in Wilkins v. State, 118 Ind. 518: "If the appellant were correct in his assumption, then every school examiner who examines an applicant for license, every clerk who accepts and acts upon an affidavit, every auditor who accepts an abstract of title when he loans school funds, and every officer when he approves a report, would exercise judicial functions. That they do in some degree act judicially is true, and so does every officer, from the governor to constable, who is invested with discretionary powers; for the governor when he issues a requisition for a fugitive from justice decides many things; and the constable when he executes a writ or warrant, exercises a discretion, but no one of these officers exercises judicial judgment in the sense that a court or judge does," and it is there further said, in quoting from Flournoy v. Jeffersonville, supra: "An act is none the less ministerial because the person performing it may have to satisfy himself that the state of facts exists under which it is his right and duty to perform the act." See also State v. Johnson, 105 Ind. 463.

By sections 2637, 2638, Rev. Stat. 1881, the boards of commissioners of the different counties are charged with the duty of directing, by order of record, what classes of animals may run at large and pasture upon the unenclosed lands and public commons. The parties interested are not required to appear before the board, and the rights of individuals are affected by a compliance with the duty so charged, but this court held that in the performance of such duty, the boards acted in their administrative, and not in their judicial, character. Farley v. Hamilton County Comrs. 126 Ind. 468.

The case nearest in parallel with this question that we have been able to find is where the county board, by statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, sec. 4993,) is constituted a board of health, and is charged with the duty of choosing a secretary and fixing the compensation for his service. The performance of that duty is held to involve no judicial action, but to consist in the exercise of discretionary powers, and that no appeal lies in the absence of special statutory provision. Waller v. Wood, supra. It is there said: "The amount of compensation is a mere matter of discretion with the board of health, and from a decision made in matters of discretion no appeal lies. Sims v. Monroe County Comrs. 39 Ind. 40; Moffit v. State, 40 Ind. 217; Grusenmeyer v. Loganport, 76 Ind. 549."

But, as stated, it is unnecessary to our conclusion that we should find the action of the board did not involve judicial action. The fixing of the amount of increase in the case before us is, as we have already stated, discretionary. The object of hearing testimony is not to require an allowance, but to enable the board to exercise its discretion with a knowledge of the value of the service of the judges, a knowledge which it could not be presumed the board possessed.

Believing, as we do, that the judiciary of the state is not sufficiently compensated, and that the state is less liberal with her judges than states of like character, we regret that our duty requires us to disagree with the position of the counsel for the appellees which would secure for two able, diligent, and conscientious judges a better reward for their labors. As we view the question before us, we are constrained to hold that no appeal lies under the statute under consideration.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

McCabe, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached in the foregoing opinion. It is contended that there is no right of appeal from the action of the board of commissioners to the superior court, and therefore that there was no jurisdiction in the latter court, and hence none in this court, and so I understand the prevailing opinion to hold. This contention is based on the concluding clause of section 2 of the Act which, referring to the allowance and proceedings of the board, provides that, "if such proceedings are in compliance with the provisions of this act," they "shall be final and conclusive." The words "final and conclusive" either have reference to the right of appeal, or they do not. Let us suppose that they do have reference to the right of appeal. If that is the real meaning the legislature intended the words to have, then it follows that it was intended thereby to deny the right of appeal from the action of the board of commissioners to some extent. To what extent? The only reasonable answer is that the appeal is denied to the extent that the allowance, and the proceedings of the board in relation thereto, are in compliance with the provisions of the act. Because the language of the whole clause reads thus: "And any such allowance, and the proceedings of any board of commissioners in relation thereto, if in compliance with the provisions of this act shall be final and conclusive," so that the final and conclusive character of the allowance and proceedings is conditional and so if the words as we have supposed were intended to deny the right of appeal, then that denial is only conditional, and the condition upon which the denial operates is that the allowance and the proceedings of the board in relation thereto are in compliance with the provisions of the act. In such case the appeal is denied, if our supposition is true, only where the allowance and the proceedings are in compliance with the provisions of the act. Where such allowance and proceedings are not in compliance with the provisions of the act, the right of appeal is not denied. And the right of appeal not being denied by that act, where the allowance and proceedings are not in compliance with the provisions thereof in such cases, the general law applicable to appeals from boards of commissioners would apply. It provides that: "From any decision of such commissioners, there shall be allowed an appeal to the circuit court by any person aggrieved." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5772.

Now let us inquire what the result of this construction is. The manifest result is that the class of cases in which an appeal is not denied, and which therefore may be prosecuted, are left undefined and unascertained. Whether in a given case the appeal has been denied by this statute does not depend upon the statute alone, but upon the statute and evidence alunde. Whether the appeal has been denied, and therefore whether any appeal lies in a given case, if our supposition is true, must depend not so much upon the statute as it does upon the acts of the board and their proceedings; not their proceedings that appear of record only, but all their proceedings, both those appearing of record and those not so appearing. It will not do to say that the reference is to such proceedings as appear of record only, because about the only thing that could appear on the face of the record showing that the proceedings were not in compliance with the act would be where the petition was not signed by the requisite twenty freeholders on which an allowance had been made, or that the allowance was for a sum in excess of the statutory limit of $1,500. In either event, the allowance would be void for want of jurisdiction. An appeal in such a case is wholly unnecessary to afford relief against such void judgment. Therefore it is unreasonable to suppose that the legislature would make no provision for the correction of errors and irregularities, however gross, and against which no relief can be had without appeal, and at the same time provide for relief by appeal where it was wholly unnecessary to secure that relief. So, therefore, I hold that relief is provided against errors and irregularities. Who, then, is to tell, and who is to determine the preliminary question whether the allowance and proceedings are not in compliance with the act in order to secure the right of appeal? It cannot be left to the complaining party to decide, because that would be to allow a party to sit in judgment in his own case, and it cannot be supposed that the legislature ever intended to authorize any such anomalous proceeding. There is no one, then, to whom it can be supposed the legislature intended to delegate such power, except the judge of the court to which the appeal is taken. And this leads me to inquire into the theory of the appellees that, as they contend the legislature meant by this statute to authorize a special right of appeal by the party aggrieved making a showing either by affidavit or oral proof of extraneous facts to show that the proceedings of the board had not been in compliance with the provisions of the act. When is that showing to be made? If made before the transcript is filed, the court cannot act on it, because there is no case before the court; there is no jurisdiction, and no judicial action can be taken until the transcript is filed, to give the court jurisdiction to take any judicial step in the case. In other words, according to general principles, the appeal from the board to the superior court must be perfected before the superior court can acquire jurisdiction to take any step in the case. Otherwise, the superior court must proceed to solemnly adjudicate and determine the rights of parties not before it, and judicially determine the right of appeal in favor of one of the parties and against the other on an ex parte affidavit, or a mere oral statement under oath, without a complaint, writ, or record. To suppose the legislature intended to authorize such an unheard-of proceeding is to suppose that they were bereft of reason and intelligence. The only escape from such a result in upholding appellee's contention, is to assume that the legislature meant to authorize the court to which the appeal is taken to entertain the inquiry as to whether the proceedings before the board had been in compliance with the act after the transcript had been filed in the superior court. That, however, would not help matters any, unless the appeal had been perfected, and perfecting the appeal would still not clothe the superior court with jurisdiction, unless the appeal was authorized by law. But suppose I am wrong in this, and that the transcript may be filed, and that then the superior court can enter upon inquiry whether the proceedings had been in compliance with the provisions of the act or not. When and how is the trial of that question to take place? According to appellee's con-tion, the inquiry may extend to the question whether the board had proceeded in compliance with the act in deciding in accordance with, or contrary to the evidence, as well as to determine whether they had complied with the law in other respects. And I think this is true. Because, if the statute intended to authorize an inquiry as to whether the proceedings of the board were in compliance with the act, then as the scope of that inquiry is left wholly unlimited by the language of the act, it necessarily follows that the inquiry extends to the question whether the decision of the board on the evidence was in compliance with the provisions of the act or not. The query then arises, How and when is that question to be tried? Is it to be preliminary to a trial on the merits, that is to be in advance and previous to the trial on the merits? If so, then the merits will have to be tried twice before the superior court, because if it must be determined first that the board did not comply with the provisions of the act in their decisions on the facts, then the facts must be tried twice on the appeal, once to determine whether an appeal lies, and if it is found that the board did not comply with the act in the decision on the evidence, and therefore that the appeal lies, then it must be tried again by the superior court to determine the case on the merits. The first trial of course would necessarily be confined to the evidence that was adduced before the board, because no other or additional evidence than such as was before the board could be adduced on the first inquiry; and on the second trial, if it was found that the appeal would lie, additional evidence might be introduced. If this is not true, then it necessarily follows that the court must proceed to try the merits and the jurisdictional question both at one and the same time, that is, the court must proceed to try the merits before its jurisdiction is established. Such is the result of the construction of the act which holds that it was intended thereby to deny the right of appeal. To say that such a result is absurd is to very mildly characterize it. To say that the framers of the act, and the legislature in passing it, intended such a result is to honor them with an originality of thought that never before entered the mind of a law-maker. And that is the inevitable and only result that can logically follow the construction contended for by appellees in support of their theory of a special right of appeal. It is the only result that can logically follow the construction that the right of appeal is denied by the act at all. If the words "final and conclusive" have reference to the right of appeal then the words, "if in compliance with the provisions of this act," found in the same clause, immediately preceding and closely connected therewith, must necessarily have reference to the same thing.

Sutherland, Statutory Construction, §§ 222, 223, says: "A proviso is something engrafted on a preceding enactment, and is legitimately used for the purpose of taking special cases out of a general class. . . . The nature and appropriate office of the proviso being to restrain or qualify some preceding matter, it should be confined to what precedes it, unless it clearly appears to have been intended to apply to some other matter. It is to be construed in connection with the section of which it forms a part, and to which it is substantially an exception. If it be a proviso to a particular section, it does not apply to others unless plainly so intended. It should be construed with reference to the immediately preceding parts of the clause to which it is attached. In other words, the proviso will be restricted to the subject it deals with, in the absence of anything in its terms evincing an intention to give it a broader effect." The proviso here is not arranged as provisos are generally arranged, by being placed at the end of the clause in which it is found, but it is placed in the middle of the clause upon which it is to operate. It would have been more orderly to have placed it at the end of the clause. But for the purposes of the question whether its application shall be limited to the clause wherein it is found, the reason for so limiting it is fully as strong, if not stronger, than if it had been placed at the end of the clause. But I need not resort to the rules of construction to confirm the construction I put upon this clause of the act, because, as was said in Storms v. Stevens, 104 Ind. 60, by this court: "In the construction of statutes, the prime object is to ascertain and carry out the purpose and intent of the legislature. To do this, the words used in the statute should be first considered in their literal and ordinary signification. . . . The canons of construction require that every word, phrase, and clause of a statute shall be given effect, if possible." "But," says Sutherland on Statutory Construction, at section 287: "First of all, . . . if the words are free from ambiguity and doubt, and express plainly, clearly, and distinctly the sense of the framers of the instrument, there is no occasion to resort to other means of interpretation. It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation. The statute itself furnishes the best means of its own exposition." To the same effect is Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, § 4. The same author, at section 265, says: "That every clause and word of a statute is presumed to have been intended to have some force and effect." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 28.

Says Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 215: "Exceptions, provisos, interpretation, repealing, and saving clauses are often introduced to restrict or qualify the effect of general language." So, then, according to these settled rules of construction, we must presume that the legislature intended the language, "if in compliance with the provisions of this act," to have some meaning, force, and effect. And when the clause is put together, its meaning is so plain that interpretation is wholly unnecessary. That is, if the words "final and conclusive" have reference to the right of appeal at all, then the condition or proviso restricts and qualifies the effect of these words, or if the words "final and conclusive" have reference to something else than the right of appeal, then the condition or proviso likewise restricts and qualifies the force and effect of the words, no matter what it is that they have reference to. So, therefore, if the words "final and conclusive" have reference to the right of appeal, and it was intended thereby to deny such right, then the condition or proviso, "if in compliance with the provisions of this act," was intended to qualify and restrict such denial of the right of appeal to such cases only as those wherein the allowance and the proceedings in relation thereto had been in compliance with the provisions of the act. It is therefore very clear, both upon reason and authority, that if the words "final and conclusive" have reference to the right of appeal, and deny such right, the conclusion follows irresistibly that such denial is restricted by the proviso, so that the appeal is only denied in such cases as fall within the proviso or condition. If this is not so, then what does the condition or proviso mean? If it does not refer to the right of appeal and restrict the denial thereof, then it can refer to nothing else, unless the words "final and conclusive" have no reference to the right of appeal at all. Whatever the latter words have reference to, the condition or proviso refers to the same. If we were even to concede that the language denies the right of appeal in all cases falling within its terms, it could not cut off the right of appeal in this case. What is it that is made "final and conclusive"? It is "any such allowance and the proceedings of any board of commissioners in relation thereto," and nothing else.

In this case, there was no such allowance, and there were no proceedings of the board of commissioners in relation thereto. Why, then, say the right of appeal in this case is denied by the act? Admitting to the fullest extent that the language employed in the statute was intended to deny the right of appeal in all cases falling within its terms, yet it would be such a broad stretch of that language to hold that the right of appeal is denied where there is no allowance, and where there are no proceedings in relation to such allowance, with all due respect and deference for the opinion of my brethren, seems to me little less than judicial legislation. Such a holding can only be justified by interpolating words into the statute that are not there, or by striking out words that are there. I am not unmindful of the rule so well expressed by Mr. Sutherland in his work already referred to, that "not only may the meaning of words be restricted by the subject-matter of an act, or to avoid repugnance with other parts, but for like reasons they may be expanded." Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 219.

There is nothing in the subject-matter of the act as to its general scope, purpose or intention, nor is there any repugnance of the language under immediate mention with other parts of the act, requiring the words under consideration to be restricted or expanded to conform to the general intent, or to avoid repugnance. Says the same author, section 288: "When the meaning of a statute is clear and its provisions are susceptible of but one interpretation, that sense must be accepted as the law; its consequences, if evil," 22 L. R. A.

can only be avoided by a change of the law itself, to be effected by the legislature itself, and not by judicial construction. But an interpretation of a statute which must lead to consequences which are mischievous and absurd is inadmissible if the statute is susceptible of another interpretation by which such consequences can be avoided. For this purpose, all parts of a statute are to be read and compared. Still, when the words of a provision are plainly expressive of an intent, not rendered dubious by the context, no interpretation can be permitted to thwart that intent; the interpretation must declare it and it must be carried into effect as the sense of the law." Nor can I concur with the prevailing opinion that a strict construction should be adopted concerning the right of appeal. In Houk v. Barthold, 78 Ind. 25, involving the right of appeal from the county board, Elliott, J., speaking for the court said: "The right of appeal from final judgments of inferior tribunals is one which ought not to be abridged by strict construction; but on the contrary, should rather be extended for the provisions of the statute conferring it are clearly remedial." To the same effect are Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 108, and Sutherland, Stat. Constr., §§ 207, 248, 348. But if we even concede that the words of the act already quoted have reference to the right of appeal, and adopt a strict construction of the entire clause as laid down in the prevailing opinion and adhere to the strict letter of the statute, then the right of appeal from the board of commissioners in this case is not denied by the statute, because there was no allowance in this case made by the board. The language is: "And any such allowance, and the proceedings of any such board of commissioners in relation thereto, if in compliance with the provisions of this act, shall be final and conclusive." It is the allowance, and the proceedings in relation to such allowance, that are made final and conclusive, and not the disallowance and the proceedings in relation thereto. A strict adherence to the letter of the act cannot result in the denial of the right of appeal to the superior court; because there is no language in it that can be tortured into meaning that the action of the board shall be final and conclusive where, as here, no allowance has been made, and there are no proceedings of such board in relation to such an allowance. I concede that such a result is both absurd and unjust; absurd because an appeal is denied by the act where the allowance is made, and where no allowance is made there is no denial of an appeal, and by the general statute already referred to, an appeal is authorized. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5772.

Such result is unjust, because an appeal will lie and is authorized where no allowance has been made, but where an allowance has been made, the heaviest taxpayer in the county cannot appeal. There might have been an allowance in this case of $3000 saddled onto the taxpayers of the county, and all the taxpayers of the county combined could not have appealed from such allowance; and yet where no allowance is made, the petitioners may appeal. In other words, construing the words "final and conclusive" to have reference to the right of appeal, it results in the absurdity and injustice of allowing the right of appeal where no allowance is made, and denying such right where an allowance is made. What framer of the act with ordinary intelligence, and what legislator, could have conceived the thought of so many absurd results, and so many unjust results as I have pointed out above, and which inevitably must follow that construction which makes the words "final and conclusive" to mean a denial of the right of appeal? It puts the whole act out of joint and makes it incongruous with itself; it makes it impracticable, mysterious, and hard to understand, as any piece of work will generally be and any statute will be when the attempt is made to use or apply it in a mode never designed by its maker or author. Since the construction adopted by the prevailing opinion produces absurd and unjust consequences, the canons of construction require us to look for some other construction as the one probably in the mind of the legislature. The words "final and conclusive" do not necessarily, nor indeed ordinarily, have reference to the right of appeal in a statute like the one under consideration. The act provides that "whenever twenty or more resident freeholders of the county . . . shall, by their petition, filed with the board of commissioners of such county, represent that the annual salary of the judge of said circuit or superior court as otherwise provided by law is not adequate compensation for the services of such judge, and should be increased in a sum to be specified in such petition, then it shall be the duty of the board, etc., . . . to consider such petition and bear evidence thereon, and thereupon, within the limits of such evidence, but in no event in excess of the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars or in excess of the sum specified in such petition, such board, etc., . . . may by entry of record fix and allow a certain sum as an addition to, or increase of the annual salary of the judge of such circuit or superior court."

It will be observed that it is provided that the board shall take the action therein required whenever twenty or more freeholders of the county petition the board, etc. Now it would be very absurd indeed, if the legislature in this language meant literally just what they have said, without any qualification or restriction. If they have, then twenty freeholders can petition the board at this term to make such an order, and go through the trial and hearing of the evidence, which is followed by an entry of record of an allowance, or a refusal to make such an allowance. And at the next term, or, in the language of the act, "whenever" another twenty or more freeholders, who may be dissatisfied with the first order, can by a petition compel the commissioners to go through the same performance again, and so on to the end of the list of freeholders in the county. Because, as admirably stated by Sutherland on Statutory Construction, section 288, that "one who contends that a section of an act must not be read literally must be able to show one of two things, either that there is some other section which cuts down or expands its meaning, or else that the section itself is repugnant to the general purview." It will hardly be claimed by any one that the section last quoted is repugnant to the purview because itself constitutes the principal part of the act. We have already seen that it is one of the canons of construction that an absurd result flowing from a particular construction makes it the duty of the court to explore the act, and find if possible some other construction as the one more probably in mind by the law-maker. The absurd result which the literal reading of the section just quoted leads to is clearly and plainly counteracted and avoided by the clause of section two that we have quoted. In order to obviate the absurd and undesirable result of allowing a fresh petition by twenty new freeholders to be filed after one had been passed upon by the board, and thus compel a trial of the same question times without limit, it is provided that the proceedings shall be "final and conclusive." Now if these words were used by the legislature to cut off the right of appeal, then they were not used to restrain or cut down the full scope and meaning of the first section, allowing the question to be tried as many times as twenty new petitioners should move in the matter. It would not have been necessary to insert such a provision to make the proceedings final and conclusive against the twenty or more freeholders who were parties to the proceeding by having signed the petition. Because it is a general principle of law as declared by this court in State v. Page, 63 Ind. 212, that "in a former recovery to be a bar, it must appear that there is an identity between the present and previous cause of action, and that the parties in the present action are the same as in the previous one, or else that they claim under the parties to such previous action."

To the same effect is Bisland v. McManomy, 82 Ind. 139. While these general principles of law made it wholly unnecessary to provide in the act that the proceedings should be final and conclusive as to the petitioners that were parties, yet if it was desired to make it final and conclusive as to all others not parties, so as to avoid the absurd result of allowing the question to be tried every three months by new petitioners, it became necessary to provide that the proceedings should be final and conclusive, that is, final and conclusive against collateral or indirect attack in the re-opening of the question before the same tribunal, either many times, or one time. There is no reason, therefore, for saying that in applying the words final and conclusive to mean that the proceedings were intended thereby to be placed merely beyond collateral attack, that such a provision was wholly unnecessary. Section 289 of Sutherland on Statutory Construction, says: "The practical inquiry is usually what a particular provision clause or word means. To answer it, one must proceed as he would with any other composition, construe it with reference to the leading idea or purpose of the whole instrument. The whole and every part must be considered. . . . This survey and comparison are necessary to ascertain the purpose of the act and make all the parts harmonious. They are to be brought into accord if practicable, and thus if possible give a sensible and intelligible effect to each in furtherance of the general design. . . . It is said to be the most natural exposition of a statute to construe one part by another, for that expresses the meaning of the makers.

. . . . If the comparison of one clause with the rest of the statute makes a certain proposition clear and undoubted, the act must be construed accordingly, and ought to be so construed as to make it a consistent whole. If, after all, it turns out that that cannot be done, then the construction that produces the greatest harmony and the least inconsistency is that which ought to prevail." Now, if we follow these rules and construe the words "final and conclusive" in the second section to mean only that the proceedings were intended thereby to be placed beyond collateral attack if not appealed from, by preventing a retrial thereof by new petitioners, and that it was not intended thereby to restrict the right of appeal at all, we shall find that such construction assigns a meaning to those words that renders the act a consistent whole, and relieves it from inconsistency, and at the same time leads to no absurd or unjust results. It is no objection to this construction that it makes such proceedings final and conclusive as against persons who were not made parties, because it leaves all those whose rights may be affected on account of their being taxpayers the right to become parties under the general law authorizing appeals from all decisions by filing an affidavit setting forth an interest in the matter decided, and on such appeal, allows the whole question to be tried de novo; whereas, the other construction denies such right absolutely and unconditionally to those whose rights have been invaded and taken away by the proceedings.

I have been discussing the question as if it were an open one in this court, but it is not. The question was settled in this court twelve years ago, in a case where the whole subject was reviewed in an able opinion by Woods, J., speaking for the court in Grusenmeyer v. Logansport, 76 Ind. 549, wherein a large number of cases were overruled and where it was said: "A further consideration of the subject has brought us to the conclusion that the statement of the rule made in the last-named case is inaccurate in so far as it denies an appeal from an order or judgment in a proceeding wherein the determination of the board is by law declared conclusive merely. The 31st section of the Act for the organization of county boards, . . . (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5772) gives an appeal 'from all decisions of such commissioners.' The general law in which this provision is found, and which defines the powers and duties of county boards, and such special enactments as have been or may be passed in reference to special proceedings before these boards should be construed as being in pari materia; that is to say, as if all were contained in one act. It is only upon this principle that an appeal can be allowed in any such special proceeding, where the act authorizing it does not expressly give the right of appeal. If the 31st section of the General Law, and the provisions of the act for the incorporation of towns, were found in a single statute, there would hardly arise a suggestion of any inconsistency between the right of appeal given in the one section from all decisions and the conclusive character of the final order or judgment of the board in a particular proceeding, as declared in another section. The latter provision would not be deemed to affect the right of appeal, but would be construed to mean that, unless appealed from and vacated, the order should be held to be conclusive against indirect or collateral attack, and such, we think, is the proper construction of the provision, though found in a separate special act.

. . . . We therefore hold that, under section 31 of the General Law, there is a right of appeal from any decision of a judicial character made by a county board in any proceeding, unless the right is denied expressly or by necessary implication, and such implication does not arise from the fact that the judgment is declared to be conclusive."

I think the prevailing opinion greatly misconceives what was involved and decided in that case. The main and only question that was involved was the right of appeal from the board of commissioners. The appellants in that case presented a petition to the board of commissioners of Cass county for the incorporation of the town of Taberville. The city of Logansport appeared before the board and objected by answer saying the board should not take action in the matter because the territory described in the petition was and had been for nine years within the exclusive jurisdiction of the city of Logansport. Thereupon the board gave judgment rejecting the petition and refusing to order the incorporation of said town. The petitioners appealed to the circuit court, where on motion of the city, the appeal was dismissed. The petitioners appealed to this court from the judgment of dismissal in the circuit court. The dismissal was defended in this court on the ground that the statute authorizing the proceeding before the county board or the incorporation of towns by its terms denied the right of appeal from the action of the board to the circuit court and hence that court had correctly dismissed the appeal. That was the question presented to this court in that case, and that was the question decided. Two other questions incidental to that question were considered and also decided but in such a way as not to weaken the authority of the decision on the main question. One of these questions was whether the board had the right, and was in duty bound to take judicial notice of the incorporation of the city of Logansport under the statute in relation thereto, which provides that the order incorporating such city "shall be held in all courts as conclusive evidence of such incorporation in any suit pending therein." This provision was not urged in opposition to the right of appeal from the action of the board which had, by order previously entered in its record, incorporated the city of Logansport. The board was justified in taking judicial notice of such incorporation, and that the territory proposed to be incorporated as Taberville was within the corporate limits of the city of Logansport, and hence could not be incorporated into another municipal corporation. It was held in opposition to his contention that though judicial notice should have been taken of the incorporation of the city, yet that whether the territory proposed for incorporation as Taberville was within the corporate limits of the city of Logansport was a question of fact of which the courts could not take judicial knowledge. That holding did not and could not have any effect on the decision of the main question, namely, whether there was a right of appeal from the action of the board to the circuit court. Notwithstanding that holding, if the law gave no right of appeal, the action of the circuit court in dismissing the appeal from the board must have been affirmed, but it was reversed, and it was reversed on the ground that an appeal would lie in such a case. It is true, the learned judge who wrote the opinion incidentally remarks that "the language of the law is, that the order shall be conclusive in all suits by or against such incorporation. An appeal from the order establishing or refusing to establish the incorporation is not a suit by or against it. The reference is to subsequent suits in which it may be a party. We therefore hold that under section 81 of the General Law, there is a right of appeal from any decision of a judicial character made by a county board in any proceeding, unless it is denied expressly or by necessary implication, and such implication does not arise from the fact that the judgment is declared to be conclusive."

The statute quoted from in the above extract is the one for the incorporation of towns, and the one under which the proceedings in that case were instituted and prosecuted, and the one by which it was contended in that case the right of appeal from the order was denied and cut off. And it was attempted thereby to justify the action of the circuit court in dismissing the appeal. Now this court laid down and decided two propositions of law as the ground or foundation of its decision that the right of appeal existed in that case, and as a reason why the circuit court erred in dismissing the appeal. Either of the reasons was sufficient to justify the ruling and decision on the main question. One of these grounds for the conclusion reached was that notwithstanding the statute under which the proceeding was had, made the final order of incorporation conclusive, yet that an appeal would lie from such order. The other ground was that the statute only made the final order of incorporation conclusive in all suits by or against such incorporation, holding that the reference is to subsequent suits by or against the corporation. The question thus decided, that the reference was to subsequent suits by or against it, was not entirely clear from doubt. There was at least room for a difference of opinion on that point. But this court has settled that by deciding it as one of the grounds of the conclusion reached, it also decided the other proposition as one of the grounds, and the first ground of that conclusion. The prevailing opinion erroneously assumes in substance that only one of these grounds could be valid and binding as a decision and as authority. That is one only of the legal propositions announced and decided incidental to, and as one of the grounds of the conclusion reached can be valid and binding as authority because the other ground was unnecessary to the support of the conclusion reached, and hence not binding and authoritative. I concede that a question decided that is not before the court, and not involved in the case is obiter dictum, and not binding authority. But when the court decides incidental questions essential to the support of the conclusion reached, and happens to decide two such questions when one would have been sufficient to support the conclusion, one of such incidental decisions is just as binding a decision and as authoritative as the other. Had one only of those incidental decisions been announced as the only ground in support of the conclusion reached, and that one had been that the appeal would lie notwithstanding the statute under which the proceeding was had, provided the order should be conclusive no one would deny that it would in that case be authoritative, and not obiter dictum. It cannot be any the less so because another reason is given in support of the conclusion reached, because another incidental question is decided as an additional ground on which to rest the conclusion reached. To illustrate my meaning: The prevailing opinion is rested upon two grounds to support the conclusion reached. One is that the statute denies the right of appeal; the other is, that the statute called into exercise no judicial power or function, but merely the ministerial or administrative authority of the board. Either ground is sufficient to defeat the appeal, and either ground is amply sufficient to support the conclusion by my brethren. After the prevailing opinion is printed in the reports, a case arises in one of the trial courts involving the right of appeal from the board under a statute providing for a special proceeding before the county board regarding some other subject, with a provision that the order shall be final and conclusive. On a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that it is denied by the statute, the moving party reads the prevailing opinion. But the opposite party points to the fact that the decision in saying the statute denies the right of appeal is obiter dictum, and shows that the other ground on which the decision was rested, namely, that the question involved before the board was not judicial, but ministerial or administrative, was sufficient to support the conclusion reached, and therefore the point that the statute denies the appeal was wholly unnecessary and obiter dictum. He refers to the body of the prevailing opinion to prove that it itself says that the decision cannot be authority on both points. Another case arises involving whether the exercise of similar powers to those called into exercise by the county board are judicial, and if not, the appeal should be dismissed, and in support of a motion to dismiss the appeal, the prevailing opinion is read, but the attorney on the other side points out that there were two grounds on which the conclusion was rested, and that the other ground being that the statute denied the right of appeal was amply sufficient to support the conclusion, and all that was said about the power exercised being not judicial was unnecessary to the decision, the other ground being sufficient to support the conclusion reached; thus ending in well nigh overthrowing the prevailing opinion as authority on either point. It was said in Carter v. Dennison, 7 Gill, 157, that "general views expressed by the court as illustrative of, but not necessarily leading to, the opinion on the point intended to be decided, are not to be treated as conclusive, when similar topics come up directly for judgment. But we are not aware of the authority which will sustain the proposition assumed, . . . that the unanimous opinion of a state court of the highest appellate jurisdiction, directly on the point which is supposed by the court to be presented by the record, and which is elaborately discussed by counsel, and is investigated with care, and solemnly delivered by the court, can be disregarded as obiter dictum, merely because it is since discovered that some other point existed on which the judgment rendered might have been rested. If any such authority exists, it has not been referred to." See also 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 664; 17 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 1.

I therefore am of opinion, not only that my brethren have gravely misconceived the true force of the Grusenmeyer Case, but they have made the decision herein self-destructive as authority. Another incidental question was decided, absolutely essential to the decision of the main question, and that was, whether a petition for the incorporation of a town presented to the board of commissioners a case invoking the exercise of judicial power and that therefore the appeal would lie. I do not claim that any of these cases involved a statute like the one involved in the Grusenmeyer Case or the one here involved. This holding in no way obviated the decision of the main question, but made the way clear for, and its decision essential to, the final determination of the case in this court. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the right of appeal from the board was directly involved, though the statute made the order appealed from conclusive in that case, and was squarely decided in favor of that right, and that such decision was unavoidable and absolutely essential to the determination of the case in this court. If that does not make it an authoritative decision, then there are no decisions of this court that are authority or binding on anybody. And the only way to avoid its binding force is to overrule it frankly, if it is wrong in principle. But it is too strongly entrenched in sound principle and reason for any one to be bold enough to propose its overthrow.

During the twelve years of its existence, it has not only never been questioned but it has been cited as authority on the point of 22 L. R. A.

the right of appeal by this court in the following and perhaps other cases, namely: Ricketts v. Spraker, 77 Ind. 379; Bryan v. Moore, 81 Ind. 13; Marion County Comrs. v. Pressley, 81 Ind. 366; Miller v. Embree, 88 Ind. 186; Burkam v. State, 88 Ind. 200; White County Comrs. v. Karp, 90 Ind. 238; Cicero v. Williamson, 91 Ind. 542; Padgett v. State, 93 Ind. 397; Terre Haute v. Beach, 96 Ind. 144; Logansport v. LaRose, 99 Ind. 127; Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs. 103 Ind. 374; Farley v. Hamilton County Comrs. 126 Ind. 469; State v. Tippecanoe County Comrs. 181 Ind. 94; Dayton Gravel Road Co. v. Tippecanoe County Comrs. 181 Ind. 590.

From an examination of these cases it will be found that during the twelve years that Grusenmeyer v. Logansport, supra, has not only been regarded as an authoritative decision on the right of appeal from the board of commissioners, but the long line of cases citing it on that point places it in the list of leading cases in this court on that question, and shows that it has been steadily growing in favor with the court. In Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs., supra, it was said by Elliott, J., speaking for the court, that: "The law as firmly established by our decisions, and they stand on sound principle, is that where the board of commissioners exercise judicial functions, . . . there is a right of appeal but that such a right does not exist where the board acts in a purely ministerial or administrative capacity. The case of Grusenmeyer v. Logansport, 76 Ind. 549, recognizes this doctrine, for the language employed by the court in that case, as well as the whole course of reasoning, shows with great clearness that the right of appeal exists only in cases where the board exercises judicial functions. In summing up the result of the review of the cases, the court there said: 'We therefore hold that under section 81 of the General Law, there is a right of appeal from any decision of a judicial character made by a county board in any proceeding.'"

I think it is now too late to say that the Grusenmeyer Case does not decide the law correctly, or that it is obiter dictum on the question of the right of appeal from a county board. And here I must digress a moment to say what perhaps might have been more properly said when I was discussing what meaning the legislature intended the words "final and conclusive" to have. It will be seen that a judicial interpretation had been given to such language when found in statutes of the kind here involved by the highest court of the state, and that such interpretation had been affirmed and reaffirmed by this court for twelve years when the statute here involved was enacted. It is a universal rule of construction, without an exception, that in enacting statutes, the legislature will be presumed to have acted with reference to the construction given to former statutes couched in substantially the same language, and that they used the words in that sense. State v. Scope, 7 Ind. 91; Wiggins v. Keizer, 6 Ind. 252; Broscoe v. State, 5 Ind. 75; Bowman v. Com. 3 Ind. 58; Carrigus v. Parke County Comrs. 39 Ind. 73; Indianapolis, B. & W. R.

Co. v. Fountain County Comrs. 89 Ind. 215; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, p. 12; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 424, p. 546.

The conclusion that the legislature meant by the words "final and conclusive" only that the proceedings should thereby be placed beyond indirect or collateral attack, and that they had no intention to deny the right of appeal by that language, seems to me to be overwhelmingly irresistible. But the prevailing opinion holds that the duty imposed upon the board was discretionary, and not judicial, and therefore no appeal would lie even admitting the full force of all the language used in the Grusenmeyer Case, supra. And that holding seems chiefly to rest on the use of the word "may" in the statute, instead of the word "shall." I am wholly unable to agree with this conclusion. The provision is that "then it shall be the duty of the board, etc. . . . to consider such petition, and hear evidence thereon, and thereupon, within specified limits, . . . may fix and allow a certain sum, etc." Now the word "shall" being confessedly imperative and mandatory applies to every duty imposed on the board but one, and that one is fixing and allowing the amount. The command is, shall consider such petition, shall hear evidence thereon, and shall keep within the limits of the evidence, and shall keep within the limits of the maximum amount prescribed in the statute, $1,500, and shall keep within the limits of the petition.

Now if the legislature did intend by the use of the word "may" to leave it discretionary with the board whether the last act, the object of all the other imperative mandates, should be left purely to the arbitrary will of the board, the inquiry naturally arises, Why are all the preceding acts made so imperative and mandatory? That would be a useless expenditure of force and authority, if the board was clothed with authority to render it all nugatory and idle. Such a construction renders the section contradictory and inconsistent with itself, and according to the authorities we have cited above, on interpretation such construction must be rejected unless in view of the whole act the language compels such a construction. But it does not. It is easy to see that the framers of the act, and the legislature in passing it had the one leading idea of compelling the increase of judges' salaries in counties falling within the purview of the act where the evidence made such increase just and right. It would be absurd in the extreme to hold that the legislature intended that though the evidence showed clearly and conclusively that the judges' salaries were not adequate compensation for their services, and that all the duties above specified were imperatively required of the board to leave it to the discretion, to the arbitrary will of the board whether they would follow and be governed by the evidence or not. We do not have to resort to the rules of interpretation to reject such a construction, because it is manifestly against the whole act taken together. It is settled law in this state and everywhere else, I believe, where our system of jurisprudence prevails, that the word "may" should be construed as meaning "shall" where public interests and rights are concerned, and where the public or third persons have a claim de jure that the power shall be exercised. Nave v. Nave, 7 Ind. 122; Bansemmer v. Mace, 18 Ind. 27; Newcastle & A. Twp. Co. v. Bell, 8 Blackf. 587; Madison v. Smith, 88 Ind. 502; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 810; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 461.

The petitioners, being freeholders of the county, were interested in the administration of justice in the county, and the whole population of the county are interested that faithful public servants should be adequately compensated.

I therefore conclude that the duty imposed by this statute is not discretionary and directory merely, but mandatory and imperative. It would follow from what I have said that the duty was therefore judicial in its character. The Grusenmeyer Case, supra, directly and necessarily decided that precise question in the affirmative. That was a petition to the board to incorporate a town under the statute providing that: "Sec. 5. The board of county commissioners in hearing such application shall first require proof, either by affidavit, or by oral examination of witnesses before them, that said survey, map and census were subject to examination in the manner and for the period required by section three of this act, and if said board be satisfied that the requirements of this act have been fully complied with they shall then make an order declaring that such territory shall, with the assent of the qualified voters thereof, as hereinafter provided, be an incorporated town, etc." This provision does not impose a judicial duty nearly as undoubted as the statute involved in this case, because the judicial inquiry is confined to an inquiry as to whether the preliminary steps had been taken, but here a trial of a question of fact, declared and alleged in the petition to exist, is required. If that does not require the exercise of judicial functions, then there is no such thing in this state. To the same effect is White County Comrs. v. Karp, 90 Ind. 236, both as to the judicial character of the inquiry and as to the right of appeal. In State v. Tippecanoe County Comrs., supra, there was a decision in the matter of a petition for the purchase of a toll road, the parties claiming to be aggrieved by the final action of the board, and it was held that such action was judicial and that the right of appeal existed. The action appealed from in the case at bar is a great deal more judicial in its character than the case just cited. The case of the Dayton Gravel Road Co. v. Tippecanoe County Comrs., supra, was exactly the same kind of a case as the last one, and from the same county, and involved the same question, and it was there held that the action of the board on the petition to purchase involved judicial action and that an appeal would lie therefrom.

And I might go on almost without end, citing similar cases in this court, where similar action by the board was adjudged to involve judicial action. There is a large class of cases, I admit, before county boards involving only the exercise of ministerial or administrative authority. Such is the character of Farley v. Hamilton County Comrs. 126 Ind. 468. That was a case involving the action of the board in directing that certain animals be allowed to pasture or run at large on the unenclosed lands or public commons within the county. It was there said: "The statute requires the board to act, and to direct by an order entered on their order books, what kind of animals shall be allowed to pasture or run at large on the unenclosed land or public commons within the bounds of any township in their respective counties. They act, however, upon their own motion. No petition is needed to invoke the exercise of the power, and they are entirely unrestricted as to the time and manner of exercising it. They may by such order permit all animals to run at large, or none, and they may at any time and in any manner, of their own motion, change, modify or revoke the order." An order for the sale of county property is a ministerial act, calling into exercise the discretionary powers of the board, from which no appeal lies. Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs. supra.

To the same effect is Sims v. Monroe County Comrs., 39 Ind. 40. So, too, it has been held that a sale of railroad stock belonging to the county, by the county board, is not a decision within the general statute authorizing an appeal, is the exercise of a discretionary power conferred on the commissioners, from which no appeal lies. O'Boyle v. Shannon, 80 Ind. 159.

I might extend this opinion, already too long, in citing numerous cases of the same class, where it has been held that the powers invoked and exercised were of a ministerial or administrative character and therefore resting within the discretion of the board, from which no appeal could be prosecuted. It is manifest that all that class of cases can have no application here whatever.

Before I can conclude in favor of an affirmance of the judgment below, one objection thereto remains to be considered. It is contended by the appellant that the act is in conflict with the 23d section of article 4, of the Constitution of the state, in that the act is local in its operation. The act applies to all counties in the state where there is a city of thirty thousand inhabitants. In cases like this, it has frequently been held that a statute is not in conflict with this section of the Constitution if "its operation should be the same in all parts of the state under the same circumstances and conditions." Groesch v. State, 42 Ind. 561; State v. Reitz, 62 Ind. 159; Combs v. State, 26 Ind. 98; Anderson v. State, 28 Ind. 22; Eitel v. State, 33 Ind. 201; Clem v. State, 33 Ind. 418.

It has been suggested that there are other counties in the state where the necessary services required of judges make them as much entitled to the increase as those counties to which this act applies by having a city of thirty thousand inhabitants, and that for that reason it is contended that the act before us is unconstitutional. That question was decided against appellant in State v. Reitz, supra.

Besides, that was a question that the legislature had the exclusive right to decide and their decision on that point is conclusive on the courts. Gentile v. State, 29 Ind. 409; State v. Tucker, 46 Ind. 355; Kelly v. State, 92 Ind. 236; Johnson v. Wells County Comrs. 107 Ind. 15; Wiley v. Bluffton, 111 Ind. 152; Evansville v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

William HAMILTON

v.

DWELLING HOUSE INSURANCE CO.,

Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A vendor in an existing contract of sale has not the "sole and unconditional ownership" of a building which is described as "his dwelling" within the meaning of an insurance policy.
2. Knowledge of an insurance agent that the insured had made a contract for the sale of the property estops a company from denying that he had the "sole and unconditional ownership" required by policy.

(January 23, 1894.)

NOTE.—The authorities on the question whether or not a vendor in a land contract can be held to be a "sole and unconditional owner" for the purpose of insurance seem to be all cited in the above case either in opinion or briefs. On the question 23 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Genesee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hanchett, Stark & Hanchett, for plaintiff in error:

Upon October 20, 1890, and thereafter John W. Shearer was in possession under a valid existing contract of purchase which he could enforce, and which was enforceable against him. Shearer could insure as the unconditional, absolute and sole owner, as the owner in fee simple, while Hamilton was only the holder of the legal title in trust for Shearer, having a lien thereon for an amount owing him. Hamilton's interest was not unconditional, it was a conditional ownership, not individual or sole, but fiduciary, or dual.

Very clearly then John W. Shearer was the party whose ownership and interest came within the description and condition in the policy.

Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & Lumber Mfg. Co. supra.

Hamilton, then, not being the unconditional and sole owner, cannot enforce this policy.

Messrs. Durand & Carton, for defendant in error:

Plaintiff was the owner in fee of this property. True, there was an outstanding contract for the sale of it to Mr. Shearer, but Mr. Shearer had defaulted in his payments and left the city. He had not paid nearly as much money as the rent of the property would have amounted to if he had rented it. Mr. Hamilton supposed he had abandoned it. The defendant's agent went to Mr. Hamilton to insure it and without asking a single question in relation to the title except as he says to see if Mr. Hamilton still had enough interest in the property to want to have it insured, without a single false statement or any attempt at fraud on the part of Mr. Hamilton, and for the purpose as he says of keeping the business and obtaining the insurance, he took the risk and issued the policy sued upon. The defendant enjoys the premium money and keeps it and when this loss occurred attempts to defeat the payment of the loss by these unmeritorious technicalities, which have been resorted to.

Unless inquired about an applicant for insurance is not bound to state the exact condition of his title and a mere equitable ownership will support a recital of ownership. The failure to mention incumbrances if not inquired about is immaterial where the application is oral and no deceit is practiced.

Co.* 94 Mich. 259, hold that the first and important question is, Did the insured have an insurable interest in the property upon which the policy was issued? If so, he is entitled to recover, no matter what may be the character of his interest, unless some fraud has been practiced or false statements made to inquiries as to the condition of the title, or unless the insurer specifically sets out in the policy the particular sort of title which must exist to render the policy valid. If this is not done the policy is valid. The duty rests upon the insurance agent to inquire about the character of the title if he wishes to know about it.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, being the owner in fee simple of lot 10, block B, a parcel of land in the city of Flint, contracted to sell the same to John W. Shearer by an instrument in writing dated June 16, 1888, for the sum of $450. Shearer took possession and made improvements, paid $75 of the contract price, besides interest, and occupied the premises at the time of a fire, which consumed the dwelling thereon. The plaintiff had previously contracted the premises to one Giles, who had procured insurance upon the building from defendant's agent, though in another company, which insurance was payable to the plaintiff as his interest might appear. This insurance being about to expire, Algoe, the agent, called upon Hamilton, the plaintiff, to see if he wanted to keep it insured. There was nothing to show that Algoe knew anything about the Shearer contract. Algoe testified that Hamilton told him that the property was his, that it had come back to him from Giles, and to insure it in his (Hamilton's) name. Hamilton testified that he thought that he told Algoe that he thought he had a contract out with some people, but they had not been in the place for a long time, and he thought that they had abandoned it, and he would have the policy made in his own name. The policy was dated October 20, 1890. One year's interest had been paid to him on June 18, 1890, and a like payment was made June 16, 1891, by Shearer, who was in possession all of the time after his purchase. The fire occurred October 19, 1891. The policy was a "Michigan Standard" policy, and contained the clause in relation to sole and unconditional ownership. This policy is in the form prescribed by the insurance policy commission under chapter 187, How. Stat. The eighth and ninth assignments of error are based upon the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, upon the ground that the policy was void, ab initio because plaintiff's interest in the premises was a conditional, and not a sole, ownership.

An elaborate and forcible argument is made by appellant's counsel, based upon the decision of this court in the case of Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & Lumber Mfg. Co., 31 Mich. 346. In this case the insurance company was sued upon a policy issued to the plaintiff. This policy described the property insured as "their one-story frame salt block," etc. It also contained the following, viz.: "If the assured is not the sole and unconditional owner of the property insured or (if said property be a building) of the land on which such building stands, by a sole, unconditional, and entire ownership and title, and if not so expressed in the written portion of the policy, then, and in every such case, the policy shall be void." The company defended upon the ground that when the policy was issued the plaintiff was not the entire, sole, and unconditional owner of the property insured; also that the interest of the plaintiff was not expressed in the written portion of the policy, whereby they claim the policy to be void ab initio. This was upon the claim that at the time the policy was issued the premises were occupied by a vendee, who was the equitable owner under a land contract from plaintiff, fully paid; and the plaintiff had no interest in the premises, except that of trustee of the naked legal title. Proof of these facts being excluded, the case was reversed by this court, which held that the clause describing the property conveyed no other idea than that of complete ownership by the insured, by a sole, unconditional, and entire ownership and title; that the proof offered would have shown Babcock (the vendee) to have had such a title as would have warranted the statement in the policy that the property belonged to him; and that the plaintiffs could not be said to hold by a sole, unconditional, and entire ownership and title when another has so complete a right and interest that he might be rightly considered an owner. The opinion adds: "The point appears too clear to justify elaborate discussion." It is further said that each could not have an absolute interest held by a sole, unconditional, and entire ownership and title. Counsel contends that this case lays down the doctrine that a vendee under a land contract may, under a policy similar to the Michigan policy, safely permit himself to be described as owner, so long as he makes no misrepresentations concerning the condition of the legal title, or of his interest. He strengthens his position by reference to several authorities which support the proposition that a vendor in a land contract cannot be said to be the sole and unconditional owner of the property contracted. Morris v. Hoyt, 11 Mich. 9; Converse v. Blumrich, 14 Mich. 109, 90 Am. Dec. 280; Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & Lumber Mfg. Co. 81 Mich. 357; Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. of St. Joseph County v. Fogelman, 85 Mich. 482; Dupreau v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 76 Mich. 615, 5 L. R. A. 671; Hough v. City F. Ins. Co. 29 Conn. 10, 76 Am. Dec. 581.

In Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fogelman, supra, it was held that a vendee had such an interest, though the contract was only in part performed by him, as would support a policy issued to him upon the express representation that he was owner. He made no misrepresentation as to the condition of the title, and the agent did not inquire. The court said that "he was the owner by equitable title, and the destruction was his risk. Nobody was under obligation to rebuild for him, and he could protect himself only by insurance." It does not appear whether the clause involved here was a part of the policy or not. But in Dupreau v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 76 Mich. 615, 5 L. R. A. 671, the case arose upon the standard Michigan policy, which does contain it. The case was in other respects similar to the Fogelman Case, and the court said: "He was in actual possession at the time of taking the policy and equitably the owner in fee; and we think he may be said at that time to have been the entire, unconditional, and sole owner, within the meaning of the policy." We may therefore agree with counsel that a vendee is, by these decisions, an owner under this clause, though the vendor may hold the legal title to insure performance of the contract. And it would seem to logically follow that the vendor is not such owner, and our attention is not called to any case where the vendor has been held to be such.

There are, however, two decisions not cited by counsel for either party which should be discussed in connection with this case. The first is the case of Hoose v. Prescott Ins. Co. of Boston, 84 Mich. 809, 11 L. R. A. 840. Margaret Hoose, the owner, conveyed the land by deed to Morgan, to secure $2,000, taking back a contract whereby he agreed to reconvey on payment of that sum with interest. Two years later she insured it as her property. Subsequently she surrendered her contract to Morgan, who at the same time executed a similar one to her daughter, Maggie Hoose, who at the same time took an assignment of the policy of insurance from her mother, with the consent of the agent of the company. It was claimed by the company that the policy was void, because Margaret Hoose was not the sole and unconditional owner of the building, at the time she procured the insurance. The policy read as follows, viz.: "Insure Mrs. Margaret Hoose to the amount of one thousand dollars on the two-story building," etc. The court held that in construing the clause referred to the whole policy should be taken together; that the object sought by the insured was to obtain indemnity against loss of her interest. If the company, which made the policy upon a verbal application, desired to know what interest it was insuring, it should have stated it in that part of the policy pertaining to the risk. It was the intention of the parties to issue a valid and binding contract of insurance, valid and binding from the time of acceptance of the same by the assured, and the court said that, "to give any reasonable force and effect to this clause of the policy, it can only be held to apply to such changes as arise after the policy has been delivered and accepted, in the ownership of the property, and not to an existing state or condition of the property at the time the policy was issued. It looks to the future for protection of the insurer, and not to the present, only so far as the preceding portion of the policy is violated by a misstatement or concealment of any fact material to the risk." The court remarks upon the fact that the policy was issued without stating in the policy what her interest was, and holds that under the policy, construed with the proofs in the case, the defendant must have understood the condition of the title, and intended to insure whatever interest Mrs. Hoose had. It may be suggested in passing that Mrs. Hoose was at the time of insuring either a mortgagor or a vendee under the land contract and, in either event, under the decisions hereinbefore cited, might have been held to be the owner of the premises. The other case referred to is Hall v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 98 Mich. 184, 18 L. R. A. 135. The policy was issued to "J. C. Hough on his two-story frame dwelling. It was a Michigan standard policy, made upon an oral application. At the time it was issued, Hough held as purchaser under a land contract, the price being partly paid. Soon after, Hough contracted in writing to sell the building insured, with a part of the premises upon which it stood, to Stevens, giving him possession. Still later, Hough assigned his interest and the policy to Hall, and the agent of the company assented to the indorsement that the policy should be paid to Hall. In July, 1890, a few months after the assignment mentioned, Stevens was given notice to quit the premises, and that the contract was declared void, and the court finds that Stevens' contract was void, and that he was a tenant holding over without permission. So that in this case, like the other, the plaintiff's assignor was, not only when the policy was issued, but at the time the action was brought, a vendee under a land contract, who, as the court expressly states (page 189, 98 Mich. and, page 189, 8 L. R. A.) had such an interest in the property insured as would support the recitation in the policy that it covered "his two-story frame dwelling." This clearly was within the rule of the cases cited.

The differences between the Hoose Case and the present one are: (1) That in the former the premises were described as "the dwelling;" in this case, "his dwelling." (2) That in the Hoose Case the policy issued to the owner, i. e. the mortgagor or vendee, while in this case it issued to the vendor in an existing contract of sale. The Hall Case differed from this in the latter particular only. It follows that the Hall Case differed from the Hoose Case in the first particular. The Hoose Case, then, has not gone so far as to hold that the clause in question must necessarily have the construction given in all cases, but only where the circumstances show that the parties mutually intended to insure the interest of the applicant, whatever it may be; and, if the Hall Case seems to go further, it is upon the authority of the Hoose Case, which was supposed to involve "precisely the same question." But we think the Hall Case does not go to the extent contended for here, for it lays stress upon the fact that the insured had such an insurable interest as warranted the statement that it was his dwelling. By the express terms of this policy the company undertook to insure, not "the dwelling," but "his dwelling." At the time it was issued the plaintiff was not such owner as would support the statement that it was his, under a policy that was to be void if he was not the sole and unconditional owner. The circumstances in the light of which the policy was to be construed do not justify us in saying that it was the intention of the insurer to insure such interest as the applicant might have. Under such a clause an insurer would have a right to understand that it was insuring the one who was the owner, not of an interest of some sort or other, such as that of a mortgage, but of the sole and unconditional title; and in such case it is a reasonable construction to say that the clause in question would refer to the existing condition of the title, and not alone to subsequent changes. But under the proofs it was a question for the jury to determine whether the agent of the company insured the property understanding that the plaintiff "had a land contract out," as testified by him. There is no reason why his interest was not insurable, and if it was done understandingly by the company it is estopped from denying its liability, under the settled law of this state.

The judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The other Justices concurred.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

NORFOLK & WESTERN R. CO., Plff. in Err.,
v.

ADAMS, CLEMENT & CO.

(.....Va.....)

1. A charge to a consignee of $1 per day after three days for every car remaining unloaded after notice of arrival is not unreasonable.

2. A reasonable charge for improper delay in unloading cars is not one for transportation, storage, or delivery of freight within Va. Code 1887, §§ 1202, 1203, which provide that no charge other than that provided by law shall be made.

(Lacy and Hinton, JJ., dissent.)

NOTE.—Right of a railroad company to make a charge for detention of its cars by consignees—"demurrage."

This important question has rarely been considered in the state courts of last resort, and has never been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States. In England maritime demurrage has been held only to be chargeable where the bill of lading or other contract provides for such a charge. The reason for such a rule is not apparent, for the charge (whether by a marine or land carrier) is made for an unreasonable detention of the carrier's vehicle not contemplated by the parties at the time of making the contract, and arising entirely from the neglect of the consignee to unload the vehicle. Recognizing the want of soundness of the English rule with regard to marine demurrage the courts of the United States have repeatedly declined to 22 L. R. A.

follow the English rule and have enunciated the doctrine that marine demurrage may be collected even though not provided for in the contract. Huntley v. Dows, 55 Barb. 510; Hawgood v. 1210 Tons of Coal, 21 Fed. Rep. 581; The M. S. Bacon v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 3 Fed. Rep. 344.

In some jurisdictions, however, the English rule has been adopted, as in Massachusetts, by the decision of Gage v. Morse, 12 Allen, 410, 90 Am. Dec. 155. But when the same court in Miller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 280, came to consider the right of a railroad carrier to make such a charge of $2 per day after twenty-four hours the difficulties of the situation arising from the ruling in Gage v. Morse, supra, may have been seen by the court, for in Miller v. Mansfield, the court enforced the charge, although there was no mention of such a charge in the bill of lading. The court reached this conclu-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Roanoke County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover back money which had been paid to defendant, in accordance with a charge made for the detention of railroad cars beyond the period allowed by the rules of the company. Reversed.

The company had made a rule, of which plaintiffs had notice, that a charge of $1 per car per day would be made for every detention of a car for the purpose of loading or unloading beyond seventy-two hours from the time that the car was placed at the disposal of the shipper or consignee, as the case might be. Plaintiffs paid the charges and then sued to recover back the money so paid on the ground that the charges were void under the Virginia Code of 1887, sections 1202, 1203. Section 1202 related to rates of toll on railroads and fixed the maximum charges for certain specified classes of freight and provided that for the weighing, storage, and delivery of articles at any depot or warehouse of the company, a charge may also be made not exceeding the ordinary warehouse rates charged in the city or town in which, or nearest to which, the depot or warehouse is situated. Section 1203 was as follows: "What charges are prohibited. It shall not be lawful for any railroad company, or its agent, to charge or receive any fee or commissions other than the regular transportation fees, storage, and other charges authorized by law, for manifesting, receiving, or shipping goods or other articles for transportation on such railroad. Any railroad company, or its agent, violating this section shall forfeit $100. Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent any railroad company from charging such fees and commissions other than the regular transportation fees for manifesting, receiving, or shipping goods or other articles for transportation on such roads, at tion by reading into the contract a general rule of the railroad company known to the consignee.

It would seem probable that the English rule of permitting maritime demurrage only where the contract so provides has caused all the confusion which has arisen in the United States with regard to the subject of similar charges by railroad carriers. One of the early cases is Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 108 Ill. 588, in which it was held that a lien for demurrage did not attach in the case of railroad carriers, unless by contract. A careful examination of this decision will show that the extent of the decision is limited to the proposition that no lien exists upon the goods for the amount of such charges. Another early case is Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Chicago Lumber Co., 15 Neb. 380, in which the Illinois case just referred to is followed as authority without any attempt whatever at argument on the question of demurrage. The Illinois and Nebraska cases therefore hold that no lien for demurrage charges can be created in favor of a railroad carrier unless by a contract, and to that extent these cases are in conflict with the later decisions.

The case of Crommelin v. New York & H. R. Co., 4 Keyes, 90, is another case where the question is considered whether a lien is created for demurrage charges; but this case only decides that there is no lien and does not decide the question of the right to demurrage.

Coming now to the recent cases, we find the following decisions:

In Miller v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. (88 Ga. 563, 18 L. R. A. 828), decided by the supreme court of Georgia, December 7, 1891, the right of a railroad company to adopt and enforce a rule making a charge of $1 per day for car after forty-eight hours was affirmed where such rule was known to the carriers' customers before the shipments were made. In that case Simmons, J., said: "The need of regulations of the kind in question is well illustrated by the evidence in this case. The general manager of the plaintiff testified that, before this rule was adopted, consignees were often dilatory in removing freight from the cars in which it was shipped, and the cars were detained day after day, and days lengthened into weeks, until our transportation work was subjected to immeasurable embarrassment. The transportation of the company was well-nigh paralyzed,—not for lack of cars, for we had plenty, but because our cars were converted into warehouses. The trouble grew, and finally culminated in a threatened blockage 22 L. R. A.

throughout the country. It has been a part of our experience to be threatened with suit by the shipper for not moving the freight promptly. We are supposed to always have cars ready to transport any freight that is offered. We endeavor to make proper arrangements to do so; but the trouble was that, when A had freight to ship, B had our cars, and we could not get them."

In Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 11 Ky. & Corp. L. J. 49, decided by Judge Toney in the Louisville law and equity court, December 20, 1891, a rule was upheld as reasonable making a charge of $1 per day per car after the lapse of forty-eight hours. In the course of his able opinion Judge Toney said: "Promptness, uniformity, and safety in the railroad traffic business of the country can only be secured by the adoption and strict enforcement by railroad companies of uniform and reasonable rules and regulations, which shall be binding upon all shippers and consignees alike with reference to the reception, transportation, and delivery of freight."

Several unreported cases are to the same effect. Thus:—

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Pioneer Fuel Co., the district court of Woodbury county, Iowa, decided by opinion of Judge Van Wagenen January, 1892, that a general rule making demurrage charges may be adopted and enforced by a railroad carrier.

In Union Pacific, D. & C. R. Co. v. Cooke, March 25, 1892, the district court of Arapahoe county, Colorado, by Judge Amos J. Rising, held:

1. That the railroad companies have the right to adopt and enforce any reasonable rule.
2. That a rule allowing forty-eight hours in which to unload is not unreasonable.
3. That $2 per car per day is a reasonable charge.
4. That it is not perceived upon what principle the reasonableness of the rule can be affected from the fact that the defendant was not consulted in framing these rules.
5. That the evidence shows that the regulation complained of was well known to the defendant beforehand, and it was immaterial whether the consignee had notice or not; and
6. That the regulation is operative whether indicated upon bills of lading or not.

In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Bannon (June 20, 1892, in the Common Pleas Court of Louisville, Ky.) Judge Emmet Field held that a rule of the railway company making a charge for the detention of cars by consignees after forty-eight hours is reasonable, and the rule was accordingly enforced.

intermediate points thereon, between what are known as the regular depots, as may be agreed on between the shipper and such company."

Mr. Thomas J. Kirkpatrick, for plaintiff in error:

It is well recognized now that these are not demurrage charges in the maritime sense, but are charges for the use and detention of cars which have been loaded by the shipper under a contract that they should be unloaded by the consignee, a reasonable time being allowed to the shipper for loading and to the consignee for unloading. The railroad company claims the right to make a reasonable charge for the use of its property, cars, and tracks, beyond such reasonable time.

Miller v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 18 L. R. A. 323, 88 Ga. 563, 50 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 80.

Unless such rules and regulations as these are adopted and enforced the railroad companies will be unable at the busy seasons of the year to furnish transportation to the public as freely and promptly as the public demands. Railroad companies have a right to adopt such rules and regulations as are reasonable and necessary for the convenient transaction of business between the railroad companies and those dealing with them either as passengers or shippers.

Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Irvine, 84 Va. 554; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Wyser, 83 Va. 250.

Sections 1203 and 1208 of the Code do not apply to the case in hand.

Messrs. Watts, Robertson & Robertson, also for plaintiff in error:

A common carrier may make reasonable rules and regulations for the convenient transaction of business between himself and those dealing with him, either as passengers or shippers.

Wheeler, Modern Law of Carriers, 180; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Irvine, 84 Va. 553; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Wyser, 83 Va. 250; Stephen v. Smith, 29 Vt. 160; State v. Gould, 53 Me. 379; Orocker v. New London, W. & P. R. Co. 24 Conn. 249; State v. Chovin, 7 Iowa, 204; Sidman v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 766; Swan v. Manchester & L. Railroad, 153 Mass. 116, 43 Am. Rep. 432.

In Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. v. Lynch (October 15, 1892, in the circuit court of Oneida county, Wisconsin, and unreported), a demurrage charge after a certain time limit of $23 for ten days was held reasonable and enforced.

In Goff v. Old Colony R. Co. (January 19, 1893, in the sixth district court of Rhode Island), the court affirmed the railroad company's right to hold the freight for demurrage charges and gave judgment for the railroad company accordingly.

It will be seen that the recent course of decision has been uniform in enforcing a reasonable regulation of the railroad carrier making a reasonable charge for the unreasonable detention of its cars by consignees, when by custom or contract the consignees were to unload the goods. That such a rule or regulation is not only manifest justice to the railroad carriers, but is of the highest public importance, can be denied neither upon principle nor authority.

Even the railroad commissioners of some of the states where the trend of legislation is very hostile to railroad companies have repeatedly recognized the importance to the public of the rule laid down in the recent cases on the subject of demurrage. For instance in the case of Davis v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co., Kansas Railroad Commissioners' Report for 1891, p. 21, the railroad commissioners of Kansas declined to interfere by recommendation with a demurrage charge of $1 per day per car on every car detained by a consignee in excess of three days.

And in Rothschild v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., Iowa Railroad Commissioners' report for 1887, p. 783, the railroad commissioners of Iowa decided that under the great demand for cars then existing, a rule making charge of $3 per day per car after twenty-four hours was reasonable. In the course of the opinion the commissioners said: "The demand for cars upon the Chicago & North Western Railroad Company is unprecedented and many of their customers are facing financial dishonor, simply because this company is unable to furnish them cars. This affects business men, farmers, and all classes seriously. In view of the situation, the determination of the question of demurrage by this board occurs under circumstances that are not especially favorable to the complainants. It is a matter of judgment how long a consignee should be allowed the use of a car without payment. As stated before, the demand for cars should be an element in 22 L. R. A.

its determination. The case before them is probably extreme. Under conditions stated they believe that twenty-four hours after the car has been placed in an accessible position and the consignee notified is a reasonable time for unloading. They are of the opinion that payment for the use of the car (they do not like the term 'demurrage'), should begin after that time. The amount charged, $3 per day, is not one third they would have earned could they have been in service."

The railroad commissioners of Kansas issued a circular dated July 7, 1891, to the general managers of the Kansas railroads (see Kansas Railroad Commissioners' Report 1891, p. 22), in which appears the following recommendation:

"Distribution and Apportionment of Cars among Shippers.

"Circular No. 5.

"Topeka, Kan. July 7, 1891.

"To General Managers:—

"In view of the present flattering prospect for abundant crops of farm produce in Kansas, and as a means to avoid the possibility of a shortage in transportation facilities, the commission desires to respectfully impress upon you the importance of a thorough and uniform system for the apportionment and distribution of cars among the several stations and shippers along the line of your road. As a means to this end we beg leave to submit the following suggestions, and ask if they meet with your approval, that instructions be issued to your agents accordingly, viz:

"Seventh:—A demurrage charge should be rigidly collected when cars are held an unreasonable time for loading."

When it is remembered that the railroad commissions have been created with a view to regulating railroad carriers in the interests of the public, the force of the opinions of the railroad commissioners as sustaining the rules of car service associations in regard to demurrage will be readily acknowledged. Undoubtedly an expeditious and economical public service by the railroad carriers renders the charging of demurrage absolutely necessary on the ground of public policy alone. The theory of the principal case is sustained by logic, authority, and common sense.

F. M. L.

On the same principle a railroad company may make a reasonable charge for the detention of a car beyond a reasonable time after its arrival at its destination, where such detention is due to the negligence or delay of the consignee. A railroad company may make a contract charging demurrage for the unreasonable delay of cars, and by contract may make such charge a lien on goods transported in the cars.

Mr. Arthur B. Pugh, for defendants in error:

By section 1202 of the Code (1887) the rates of toll which may be charged by a railroad company for the transportation of persons and property over its lines in this state are minutely prescribed; and provision is made with like minuteness for such further charges as may be lawfully made by such company.

This statute covers the whole subject of transportation, terminal, and storage charges. If there were no other statutory provision on the subject, we think it perfectly clear that any charge other than the charges thus authorized would be unlawful. But by section 1203, the legislature has positively prohibited any railroad company, under the penalty of the forfeiture of $100 for every violation of such regulation, from making any charges, either as a public carrier, or as a warehouseman, other than the regular transportation fees, storage, and "other charges authorized by law."

The state has the right to make reasonable regulations, prescribing or limiting the 22 L. R. A.

charges that may be made by a railroad company operating within its jurisdiction, except as it may be restrained by some contract in the company's charter, or by the law of interstate commerce.

The Norfolk & Western Railroad Company is subject to the statute of this state.

Under the law of this state the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company had no right to make and collect the demurrage charges, which form the subject of this controversy.

Demurrage is an extended freight or reward in compensation for lost earnings, which as a legal right, exists only as to carriers by sea-going vessels.

5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 542.

Technically speaking it is confined to the maritime law. The right to it does not attach to carriers by railroads.

Wherever a charge in the nature of demurrage has been made by a railroad company, and the amount of such charge has been allowed by the courts, it has been so allowed, not as demurrage, but as storage, and has been allowed to the company in its character, not as a carrier, but as a warehouseman.

Miller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 260; Miller v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 18 L. R. A. 323, 88 Ga. 563, 50 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 79.

Various reports and conclusions of certain railroad commissioners of the states of Alabama, Illinois, and Texas are referred to in the company's petition. These rulings, in view of our statute, have no bearing upon the question here, and would certainly not be considered as authority, even if they had.

Fauntleroy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition of the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company complains of a judgment of the circuit court of Roanoke county, rendered therein at the April term, 1893, in favor of Adams, Clement & Co. against the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for the sum of $488, with interest thereon from September 1, 1891, until paid, in which suit the said Adams, Clement & Co. are plaintiffs and the petitioner is defendant. The suit is an action of assumpsit against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company to recover back certain sums of money alleged to have been illegally exacted from and paid by the said Adams, Clement & Co. to the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, and a verdict was rendered and a judgment entered for the full amount of the plaintiff's claim. The case is here upon a writ of error obtained by the defendant company.

The Norfolk & Western Railroad is a common carrier, owning and operating a line of railroad in the state of Virginia, and the town of Salem is upon the said line. The plaintiffs are lumber dealers, doing business at the said town of Salem; and between February 16 and August 31, 1891, they received a large number of shipments of lumber in carload lots, consigned to them from points on the line of the said Norfolk & Western Railroad, and from points in the state of Virginia, and other points in other states. These shipments were made with the understanding and agreement that the lumber was to be unloaded by the consignee at Salem depot upon the arrival of the shipments at that point. The railroads of Virginia and of the other states, for their own protection as well as for the protection and benefit of the public, have a car service set of rules, designed and enforced to secure the prompt movement of freight cars; and under the rules of this car service association the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company have a charge of $1 per car per day for the use of their cars and their side or switch tracks for every day that the cars remain unloaded after notice of their arrival to the consignee and the lapse of three days. Under the abuses that prevailed previous to the establishment of this rule, serious loss and inconvenience were caused both to the shipping public and the railroad company by the unreasonable and protracted delay of consignees in unloading the cars; the railroad company being unable thereby to furnish cars when called upon by shippers of freight, and their side tracks being incumbered, and the movement of freight impeded, causing heavy expense, and a demand for more track room to accommodate idle cars standing unloaded upon their tracks, and the company being unable, therefore, when called upon, to furnish cars for the shipping public. The railroad company, as a common carrier, is bound to furnish cars for transportation of freight; and they must have control over their cars in order to perform their duties to the public. A car in motion is a useful thing, but a car standing idle and unloaded on the track is useless, and an incumbrance. If A. be allowed to hold a car unloaded at his pleasure or convenience, without cost or charge, and thus deprive the railroad company of the use of its vehicles for transportation of the freight of B. it is evident that both the railroad company and the shipping public will suffer injury. The plaintiffs in this suit had notice of the existence and operation of these rules, and they had paid the charges for the detention of cars long before the commencement of the account sued upon; and they knew and agreed when the shipments were made that such a charge would be made, unless they unloaded their cars in compliance with the rule of the company which gave to them seventy-two hours in which to unload their freight after notice of the arrival of the cars which they had stipulated to unload. It is well settled in this state and in other states that a common carrier may make reasonable rules and regulations for the convenient transaction of business between itself and those dealing with it, either as passengers or as shippers. See Nor- folk & W. R. Co. v. Wisor, 82 Va. 250; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Irvine, 84 Va. 553. That this rule is reasonable and proper, and that the railroad company can make such a charge, has been decided in a number of states; the question never having arisen before in this state. See Müller v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 88 Ga. 563, 18 L. R. A. 823; Müller v. Mansfield, 112 Mass. 260; Union Pacific, D. & G. R. Co. v. Cooke, 50 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 89, note; Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 50 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 90, note; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Pioneer Fuel Co. [Woodbury county, Iowa, District Court, Jan. 1892]; Beach, Law of Railways, § 924, and cases there cited; Jones, Liens, § 284, and cases cited; 4 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. p. 8146, §§ 1881, 1832; Wood, Railway Law, pp. 1592, 1593, 1600; 2 Waterman, Corp. pp. 245, 246; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 878-881, and note; Redf. Railways, 6th ed. pp. 67-83.

In addition to this long line of authorities holding the right of a railroad company to make such charge, and the reasonableness of such charge, there have been numerous investigations and rulings upon the point by the railroad commissioners of the various states. In Texas, the railroad commissioner, Judge Reagan, after full investigation, made an order fixing $3 per day per car as a reasonable charge for delay in unloading after forty-eight hours' notice. The railroad commissioner of Illinois, and those of other states, after full investigations, have decided in favor of the right and reasonableness of such a charge; and when it is considered that these railroad commissioners are appointed for the express purpose of regulating railroads in the interest of the public, the weight of their decisions as to the reasonableness of such charge is apparent. It is contended, however, that the sections of the Code of Virginia of 1887, 1202 and 1203, make such a charge illegal; and the judge of the trial court took the view of the plaintiff, and instructed the jury that, under the law of Virginia, such charge is unlawful, whether it be reasonable or not. We think that the trial court erred in so holding, and in so instructing the jury. The charge made by the railroad company for the detention of its cars, and the occupation of its tracks after due notice, and the allowance of three days to the consignee to unload the cars and disincumber the track, is not within the purview, purpose, or prescription of the statute, and is not of the character of weighing, storage, and delivery of articles of freight contemplated by the makers of the statute. The charge is not for transportation, storage, or delivery of freight, and it is not a device or a pretext for exacting of the shipper or the consignee more than the rate prescribed by law and fixed by schedule; but it is for the use and occupation of the cars, and the obstruction of their tracks by the consignee, for weeks and months after the contract for transporting and delivering the freight had been fulfilled and ended. It is neither a transportation charge, nor a storage charge, nor a terminal charge, nor a subterfuge for adding to the cost of transportation in excess of the rates prescribed. After arrival at the place of consignment, and notice to the consignee of the arrival, and the allowance of a reasonable time for the unloading of the cars by the consignee, according to his contract obligation to unload, the duties and the liabilities of the carrier cease, and the carrier becomes simply a bailee for hire, and can make reasonable rules and regulations and charges for such service as bailee, as it may see fit. Such charges are not carrier charges in the meaning, intentment, or prescription of the statute. Under the head of "Carriers," the American & English Encyclopædia of Law (page 880, vol. 2) : "A carrier fulfilling the duties of a warehouseman is not obliged to accept the goods subject to his ordinary liability. He may impose such terms as he pleases; and the consignor (consignee), with notice thereof, will be bound. Whether such terms are or are not reasonable is an irrelevant inquiry." In a note to this section is the following: "We can see no reason why a railroad company, as a common carrier, cannot stipulate, by a contract express or implied, that their liability as carrier shall terminate with delivery at a particular point, and they will assume no liability at all in such case as warehousemen. If the consignee is fully advised at the time of the shipment that the company has no agent at a particular station, or the place to which the consignment is made, and the failure to employ such agent is not shown to be unreasonable in view of the condition of the company's business, there is, in the absence of rebutting circumstances, an implied consent that the carrier's responsibility shall be dissolved, when he has done all that the nature of the case permits him to do, according to the reasonable and proper usages of his business." Hutchinson on Carriers (sec. 378) says: "The custody and protection of the goods in his new character as warehouseman is a distinct service from that of their transportation, which entitles him to additional compensation, in consideration for which he continues liable for their safe-keeping as the hired bailee of the owner."

The record in this case shows that at the time of the shipments of this lumber the plaintiffs knew that there was a depot at Salem for the ordinary business of the company, but not for the accommodation of carloads of lumber; and that, if they did not unload the cars according to the contemplation of the contract, within seventy-two hours (exclusive of Sunday and holidays) after one day for placing the cars and notice, they would have to pay $1 per car, per day, thereafter; not for transportation and delivery, but for the detention of cars, and use and occupation of the tracks of the railroad company. The statute provides solely for the transportation, storage, and delivery of freight to the carrier, to be shipped by it, and delivered at the other end of the journey to the consignee; but it makes no provision or regulation for the hiring of cars to be loaded and unloaded by the customer, according to such contract as the carrier and the customer may make, express or implied. "A railroad company is not required by law to keep a warehouse or depot at every station along its route or line, and it may stipulate, either expressly or by implication, that it will assume no liability as warehouseman at a flag station where it has no depot or agent; and when the consignee is fully advised, at the time of the shipment, that the company has no depot or agent at such station, and it is not shown that the exigencies of its business required that it should have an agent at the place, the liability as common carrier terminates with the safe delivery of the goods on the side track at that point, and it assumes no liability as a warehouseman." It is shown in evidence that this rule and charge of $1 a day for the unreasonable, and even long-continued, detention of the car, and obstruction of the tracks and business of the railroad, is not made for compensation to the company, but for the benefit of the public, and a stimulus to the consignee to unload the car, and disencumber the track and the business of the road. The evidence in the record is that the car is much more valuable to the company than the charge of $1 per day; and it is manifest that, if cars can be delayed and held by shippers or consignees for months (as the record shows was done in this case, in some instances), without any regulation that would be operative, the business of the railroad and the public service must necessarily suffer. In view of the authorities and the facts of this case, we are of opinion the money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant company was properly charged by the said company, and was due to it by the plaintiffs, Adams, Clement & Co., and that they had no right to recover it back; and that the circuit court of Roanoke county erred in the law as applicable to the facts of the case, and erred in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury; that the judgment complained of is erroneous, and the same is reversed and annulled; and this court, proceeding to enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have entered upon the pleadings, will dismiss the plaintiffs' suit.

Reversed.

Lacy and Hinton, JJ., dissent.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

James B. CASE et al., Appts.,

v.

William MINOT, Jr., et al., Trustees of Boston Real Estate Trust.

(158 Mass. 577.)

1. The right of a tenant of upper floors to light and air from a well or open space which is not accessible to the street cannot be obstructed, where it is necessary to the enjoyment of the demised premises.
2. A landlord is liable to a tenant of upper floors for wrongful obstruction of light and air from a well or open space in a building by a chimney constructed by another tenant under the landlord's express authority to erect such chimney for the use of boilers in the basement.
3. The objection of want of parties, when taken by plea or answer, should give the names of the necessary parties when this can be done, and especially where it is peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants.
4. Other tenants who caused the damages are not necessary parties to an action by tenants against a landlord for interference with the enjoyment of the premises, where the time for injunction has passed and the only relief that can be granted is by way of damages.
5. That the tenant's right to an injunction against the landlord's interference with his enjoyment of the premises terminates pending suit by the expiration of the term will not prevent equity from retaining the suit to assess damages.

(April 4, 1893.)

tion against the landlord's interference with his enjoyment of the premises terminates pending suit by the expiration of the term will not prevent equity from retaining the suit to assess damages.

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from permitting the erection of a chimney so as to interfere with the light coming to plaintiffs' windows, and to recover damages. Reversed.

From the report of the facts made by the trial court it appeared that:

Defendants own certain premises in Boston bounded southerly on Bedford street and northerly on Avon street. The easterly property line is a straight line, and is coincident with the outer face of the wall of the defendants' building, except along part of the line about the middle of the building where the wall makes a set back from the line for a rectangular air or window space which is wholly on defendants' land. This rectangular space is about 6½ feet by 27½ feet and the entire distance across to the wall of the opposite building as it now stands is about 17 feet.

The plaintiffs are lessees of the defendants of a portion of the defendants' building under written lease expiring December 31, 1892.

NOTE.—American law as to easements of light, air, and prospect.

The doctrine that an easement of light or air can be acquired by prescription is almost universally rejected in this country.

In Delaware the doctrine of ancient lights was held in the case of Clawson v. Primrose, 4 Del. Ch. 643, to be adopted as part of the common law by force of the constitutional adoption of the common law, and subject to alteration only by the legislature.

But the case of Clawson v. Primrose is commented on and distinguished on the facts in Hulley v. Security Trust & S. D. Co., 5 Del. Ch. 573, which seems to regard the question of ancient lights as not entirely settled by that case, although it was the opinion of the able chancellor, as the question had not been passed upon by the court of appeals. It is remarked further that the decision in Clawson v. Primrose is the only one rendered in that state on the subject during the whole period of nearly one hundred years after the adoption of the constitution.

In Illinois the early case of Gerber v. Grabel, 16 Ill. 217, declared that the doctrine of ancient lights existed in that state, but that to be ancient the use of the light must have existed from a period beyond memory, and that the rule of twenty years' use under the later English statutes, which could not be traced beyond the Statute of 21 James I., did not apply in that state, as the English statutes after the fourth year of James I., were not adopted in that state.

But the doctrine is expressly rejected in later cases. Guest v. Reynolds, 68 Ill. 478, 18 Am. Rep. 570; Tinker v. Forbes, 136 Ill. 221; Dexter v. Tree, 117 Ill. 582.

The doctrine of ancient lights is recited as if it 22 L. R. A.

were the law in Manier v. Myers, 4 R. Mon. 514, but the case did not involve the question, and it was subsequently decided that an easement of light and air cannot be acquired by prescription in Kentucky. Ray v. Sweeney, 14 Bush, 1, 29 Am. Rep. 388.

In Maryland there was an obiter recital of the doctrine in Wright v. Freeman, 5 Harr. & J. 477.

But the doctrine was expressly repudiated in Cherry v. Stein, 11 Md. 1.

The doctrine that an easement of lights can be acquired by prescription was approved in Robeson v. Pittenger, 2 N. J. Eq. 57, 23 Am. Dec. 412.

But in this case the building whose lights were in question had been erected by the owner of the lot which they overlooked. Ibid.

And later cases establish the law that an easement in light and air cannot be acquired by adverse user in New Jersey. Hayden v. Dutcher, 21 N. J. Eq. 217; King v. Miller, 8 N. J. Eq. 559, 55 Am. Dec. 246.

In Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. 261, 23 Am. Dec. 461, it was assumed that the doctrine of ancient lights prevailed in New York, although the court declares that the case involved was not one of ancient lights.

But later cases expressly decide that the doctrine of ancient lights does not obtain in New York. Parker v. Foots, 19 Wend. 309; Knabe v. Levalle, 23 N. Y. Supp. 518.

In the early Pennsylvania case of Biddle v. Ash, 2 Ashm. 211, it was conceded for the purpose of the case that an easement of light might be presumed as a presumption of fact after twenty years' use, but it was held that the facts in that case did not establish any easement.

But there was an obiter disapproval or caution as to the doctrine in Hoy v. Sterrett, 2 Watts, 327, 27 Am. Dec. 313, and in Haverstick v. Sipe, 33 Pa. 363, it is expressly decided that mere enjoyment of light

At the time of the lease, the rooms on the different floors leased to the plaintiffs were lighted by windows at each end of the rooms overlooking Bedford and Avon streets respectively, and also on the east side opening upon the light and air space above referred to.

There is one floor and a basement underneath the premises leased to the plaintiffs, which had been leased by the defendants to and occupied by Bradford and Thomas, who also had a lease of the other part of said building, which lease had not expired May 20, 1892, but had been modified by agreement of that date.

The plaintiffs are commission merchants doing an extensive business in the sale of goods consigned to them by various manufacturers. Said second floor was used by the plaintiffs not only as a store-room but as a sales-room of the goods consigned to them, and in making such sales it is necessary to have a well-lighted place for customers to examine goods, and the plaintiffs used that part of said second floor directly in front of said side windows for the exhibition of such goods.

For the plaintiffs to have the full enjoyment of the premises as they were when leased to them, it is necessary for them to have the full and undisturbed use of said side windows for light and air, and of said space for opening and shutting said window shutters.

May 20, 1892, the defendants executed an unrecorded lease to Eben D. Jordan and another of the estate owned by them in the locality described, including said building occupied in part by plaintiffs, subject to the lease of the plaintiffs and subject to the lease to and subsequent agreement with Bradford and Thomas. Said agreement with Bradford and Thomas was made by the defendants to enable them to make said lease to Jordan and another and give said Jordan and another, as lessees, possession of said basement.

Said defendants have not been since the date of the lease to Jordan and another in the occupancy or control of said premises except as landlord under said lease, and have not employed any one to do any work upon said premises as complained of, and have not directed or authorized the doing of any of said work unless the contrary shall be held constructively and as a matter of law on the facts; all of the acts complained of having been done as a matter of fact by said Jordan or by persons employed, paid, directed, and controlled by them.

Eben D. Jordan and another went into possession, under their said lease, on the first of June, 1892.

On and after the said first of June, 1892, the said Jordan and Jordan commenced, by their servants and agents, to place in said basement, boilers and other apparatus designed for an electric light plant, of a capacity of 250 arc lights, as specified in their said lease, and to erect wrought iron pipes or chimneys, and said pipes are now entirely finished.

By the construction of said electric plant, with its said chimneys, the plaintiffs have been greatly annoyed and injured in their said and air over another's premises for any length of time cannot ripen into an adverse right.

The earlier South Carolina case of McCready v. Thomson, 1 Dnd. L. 181, approved the English doctrine, but in Napier v. Bulwinkle, 5 Rich. L. 812, it is said that the facts of the earlier case were such that the jury might have found evidence of assent to the claim of right in such easement and the doctrine is expressly repudiated by the later case.

Some other early cases discussed the doctrine of ancient lights in cases to which it was applicable only by way of analogy, and in some instances assumed that this doctrine was the law in this country, but these obiter dicta on the subject are so entirely obsolete in view of the numerous decisions to the contrary that they have not been generally referred to in this note.

A comparatively recent case of this sort is Berkeley v. Smith, 27 Gratt. 898, in which there is an obiter recital of this doctrine as if it were law, and there does not seem to be any decision in that state on the subject.

In other states the decisions have uniformly rejected the doctrine of ancient lights.

Thus in Alabama. Ward v. Neal, 37 Ala. 500.

In Connecticut the doctrine of ancient lights was disapproved in Ingraham v. Hutchinson, 2 Conn. 584, but the case did not call for any decision as to lights.

In Georgia the doctrine is rejected. Turner v. Thompson, 58 Ga. 288, 34 Am. Rep. 497.

Likewise in Indiana. Keiper v. Klein, 51 Ind. 816; Stein v. Hauck, 56 Ind. 65, 26 Am. Rep. 10.

And in Kansas. Lapere v. Luckey, 23 Kan. 534, 38 Am. Rep. 198.

In Louisiana also it is held that a prescriptive right to light and air for windows cannot be acquired without an express grant or covenant. Oldstein v. Firemen's Building Assn. 44 La. Ann. 462.

The doctrine is also rejected in Maine. Pierre v. Fernald, 36 Me. 436, 46 Am. Dec. 573.

The English doctrine of an easement of light and air, based on prescription, is denied in Massachusetts, irrespective of the Statute of 1862, chapter 144, which expressly denied this right. Rogers v. Sawin, 10 Gray, 376.

Other Massachusetts cases denying the doctrine are: Fifty Associates v. Tudor, 6 Gray, 269; Carrig v. Dee, 14 Gray, 683; Richardson v. Pond, 15 Gray, 387; Christ Church v. Lavezziolo, 156 Mass. 89.

And the court declares that no right to an easement of light and air can exist over the premises of an adjoining owner except by actual grant. Paine v. Boston, 4 Allen, 168.

The doctrine of ancient lights is also rejected in Texas. Klein v. Gehrung, 25 Tex. Supp. 232, 78 Am. Dec. 565.

And in Vermont. Hubbard v. Town, 38 Vt. 205.

And also in West Virginia. Powell v. Sims, 5 W. Va. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 629.

The mere fact that a private alley has remained unenclosed and that a person has built a house with doors and windows opening upon it and enjoyed the benefit of the light and ventilation which it afforded so long as the owners chose to leave it open confers no easement which will prevent the owners from closing it. Dexter v. Tree, 117 Ill. 532.

No amount of assertion of a right to an easement of light and air can constitute the basis of an adverse right or easement of that kind, so long as the owner of the adjoining premises has had no occasion to make use of his premises in such a way as to conflict with the alleged easement. Tinker v. Forbes, 136 Ill. 221.

The reason for the almost unanimous repudiation of the doctrine in this country is suggested in the preceding sentence. It is in nearly all the leading cases on the subject declared in substance that the law of prescription or adverse user is not fairly to be applied to the enjoyment of light and air since there is in its continuance nothing of which the owner of the vacant premises can complain. It is business and in the quiet enjoyment of said premises leased to them, by reason of the noise and dust caused by said work; and the light at said side windows has been, by said pipes, substantially obstructed, so as to materially interfere with the plaintiffs' said business.

Complainants brought said bill in good faith believing it to be their proper remedy.

Messrs. Charles H. Hanson and William H. Leonard, for appellants:

A covenant for quiet enjoyment is implied in the terms of an ordinary lease.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 304; Wood, Land. & T. 2d ed. § 359; Leech v. Schroeder, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 463; Burnett v. Lynch, 5 Barn. & C. 609.

To constitute a breach of the covenant, it is sufficient that the lessee's ordinary and lawful enjoyment be substantially interfered with by the acts of the lessor or those claiming under him, though neither the title nor possession of the land be otherwise affected.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 305.

The plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of an implied grant, and of an easement in the well or jog, and to a right to light and air therefrom.

Phillips v. Low [1892] 1 Ch. 47; Brande v. Grace, 154 Mass. 210; Salisbury v. Andrews, 19 Pick. 250, 128 Mass. 836; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632; McNeil v. Kendall, 128 Mass. 251, 85 Am. Rep. 373; Brown v. Holyoke Water Power Co. 152 Mass. 463; Dexter v. Manley, 4 Cush. 14; Sherman v. Williams, 113 Mass. 485, 18 Am. Rep. 522; Edmison v. Lowry (S. Dak.) 17 L. R. A. 275, and cases; Thayer v. Payne, 2 Cush. 327.

And the erection of pipes or chimneys in the well or jog was the erection of a permanent structure upon the premises leased to the plaintiffs, materially changing the character and beneficial enjoyment thereof.

therefore putting upon him an unreasonable burden to compel him to build on his own premises in order to prevent the imposition of a servitude upon them.

If an easement of this sort cannot be acquired by prescription, it is clear that no right to light and air over the premises of another can exist in the absence of some covenant, grant, or express creation of the right; so in Ray v. Lyness, 10 Ala. 63, an obstruction of light was held not actionable, where there was no claim of ancient lights or grant of easement in the case.

Implied grants.

There is some conflict on the question of implied grants of these easements.

In Story v. Odin, 12 Mass. 157, 7 Am. Dec. 48, it was held that the grantor of premises on which a building stands with windows overlooking another lot which he still owns cannot erect any structure which will darken those windows, in the absence of any exception or reservation of a right to do so.

But in a later case this was distinguished and it was held that where the owner of two lots, one of which has a building upon it, sells them both by auction on the same day with the privileges and appurtenances belonging to each, there is no implied easement of light and air belonging to the building, although the sale and conveyance of that tract is made first. Collier v. Pierce, 7 Gray, 18, 66 Am. Dec. 453.

And again that an easement of light and air is not granted by implication on a conveyance of a building, where on the same day and as part of the same transaction the grantees and grantors united in a conveyance of the adjoining premises, with a covenant that they are free of all incumbrances, especially where the windows for which the easement was claimed were not necessary to the estate granted. Randall v. Sanderson, 111 Mass. 114.

Finally, in Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 206, 15 Am. Rep. 30, it is held, on a full review of earlier cases, that no grant of any right of light or air from adjoining lands is to be implied from the conveyance of a house.

It is said in this case that the same doctrine is assumed to be the law of Massachusetts in Brooks v. Reynolds, 106 Mass. 81, and Royce v. Guggenheim, 106 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322.

The case of Story v. Odin, supra, therefore, which has been a leading one on the doctrine it declared, is no longer authority in Massachusetts.

The rule that an implied easement of light for windows is created by the grant of premises, the windows of a structure on which overlook land retained by the grantor, was approved arguendo in

The ordinary remedy for the violation of an easement for a nuisance, or for the breach of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, is by bill in equity and an injunction, which in such cases is granted almost as of course.

But the New York doctrine is to the contrary and holds that the grant of an easement of light and air is not implied from the grant of a house having windows overlooking land retained by the grantor. Shipman v. Beers, 2 Abb. N. C. 425.

In New Jersey the case of Robeson v. Pittenger, 3 N. J. Eq. 57, 32 Am. Dec. 412, which declared in favor of ancient lights, has been limited by subsequent cases to the doctrine of an implied easement on the sale of a building overlooking other land of the grantor. This doctrine is adopted in Sutphen v. Therkelson, 38 N. J. Eq. 318, in which an easement of light and air for windows of a building (in this case a hotel) is held to be implied on a conveyance of the hotel premises while the grantor retains land overlooked by the windows of the building, if the light and air through these windows is necessary to the enjoyment of the building.

In Pennsylvania it was decided in Maynard v. Esber, 17 Pa. 222, that no implied easement of light and air is created on the simultaneous sale of two parcels of land, on one of which is a building with windows overlooking the other,—especially where the sales are made clear of incumbrances.

In a later Pennsylvania case it is held that no implied easement of light or air arises on the sale of part of grantor's land with a building thereon having windows overlooking his other land, unless the use of those windows is a matter of necessity for the enjoyment of the part sold. Rennysen's App. 94 Pa. 147, 30 Am. Rep. 777.

The limitation of the implied easement to cases of necessity is made in several states.

Thus in Georgia an implied grant of an easement of light for a building on premises conveyed will be sustained only in cases of real necessity and not when other lights to the building sold can be substituted at a reasonable cost. Turner v. Thompson, 58 Ga. 268, 24 Am. Rep. 497.

This is the doctrine also in West Virginia. Powell v. Sims, 5 W. Va. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 629.

But in Ohio as no implied easement of light and air is made on a conveyance of premises with windows overlooking adjoining land of the grantor, even if the use of the windows is necessary to the convenient enjoyment of the property. Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 185, 2 Am. Rep. 379.

So in Indiana and Iowa there is no implied grant of light on a conveyance of part of the grantor's premises with a building thereon having windows overlooking the remainder of his land. Keiper v. Klein, 61 Ind. 316; Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 35, 22 Am. Dec. 444.

In Maryland the main question has not been expressly decided but it is held that there is no implied easement of light on the sale of different tracts not owned by the same person, because the sale of both was made by the same agent. Cherry v. Stein, 11 Md. 1.

In Louisiana where the civil law prevails, servitudes of light and air are recognized by the Code, and it is held that, under arts. 763 and 765, a servitude of light and sight is created where the owner of two lots lays out on one of them an alley on which the other lot fronts. Cleris v. Tieman, 15 La. Ann. 316.

And likewise the owner of lots on both sides of a division wall by making a window therein creates a "destination du père de famille," which results in a servitude as soon as the title to the lots is severed. Lavillebeuvre v. Coeogrove, 13 La. Ann. 323.

A sale by an administrator of a dwelling house to one person, with windows opening into a passage 3 feet 9 inches wide on an adjoining lot, which is sold by him to another person, and on which there is another dwelling, implies an easement of light as well as of passage over this way, since the easement was apparent at the time of the sale; but it would be otherwise if the purchaser did not know of the easement. *Durel v. Messrs. Francis V. Balch and Felix Rackemann for appellees.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court ruled that, on the pleadings and facts reported, the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief, either by way of injunction or damages, against the defendants, and therefore dismissed the bill. The particular ground is not stated, but from the terms of the report and the course of the argument we are led to infer that it was thought that the plaintiffs should have sought their remedy against the Jordans alone, through whose immediate agency the acts complained of were done, and that the present defendants are not responsible therefor. However, we have to consider the whole case.

1. It could not properly be held on the facts reported that as matter of law the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief against anybody. It is true that the description of the premises demised to the plaintiffs contained no express mention of the well or open space for light and air, and the lease contained no express covenants on the part of the lessors; but the situation and habitual use of the demised premises were such as to warrant, if not to require, the finding of an implied grant of a right to light and air from the open space, or at least from that portion of it owned by the defendants. It is true that the doctrine of implied grants of easements or privileges connected with real estate is applied with some strictness in this commonwealth, but in this case it might well be found, as it was found, that the right to light and air was necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the demised premises. The open space was not accessible from the street. Its sole use, so far as the lessors were concerned, was for the benefit of the occupants of their building, and it must have been intended that the plaintiffs should have the benefit of it. There is no other reasonable view to be taken of the facts. The case of Doyle v. Lord, 64 N. Y. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 629, much resembles the present, and fully sustains the plaintiffs' contention on this point; and the general doctrine that there is an implied grant of whatever is necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the thing granted is familiar. Salisbury v. Andrews, 19 Pick. 250; Thayer v. Payne, 2 Cush. 327, 831; Pettingill v. Porter, 8 Allen, 1, 6, 7, 85 Am. Dec. 871; White v. Chapin, 12 Allen, 516, 518; Oliver v. Pitman, 98 Mass. 46, 50; Buss v. Dyer, 125 Mass. 287; Hooper v. Farnsworth, 128 Mass. 487; Johnson v. Knapp, 146 Mass. 70, 150 Mass. 267; Brande v. Grace, 151 Mass. 210; Taylor, Land. & T. § 161; 2

Implied easement of tenant.

An implied grant in a lease of the right to light and air from an open space or well adjoining the rooms leased may arise without any express reference in the lease to the subject, where the situation and habitual use of the premises is such that the right to light and air is necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the premises leased. See the main case above, CASE v. MINOT, with which most of the authorities agree.

KEATING v. SPRINGER, post, 544, denies in general terms that such an implied easement can exist in favor of a tenant, but the authorities cited in support of the statement consist of one case as to an implied easement of a vendee, and the New York cases, Palmer v. Wetmore and Myers v. Gemmel, infra, which are limited by Doyle v. Lord, infra, establishing the doctrine in New York, in agreement with CASE v. MINOT. So that the language of KEATING v. SPRINGER, if it is to be upheld to its full extent in Illinois, which seems unnecessary for the purpose of that case, is not in agreement with the law elsewhere.

A lessee of a building can enjoin a grantee of the lessor from erecting a structure which will obstruct light and air which are necessary to the enjoyment of the leased building, unless the lessee has by estoppel lost his right. Ware v. Chew, 43 N. J. Eq. 493.

The erection of a party wall by an adjoining owner, darkening the windows of a leased building, does not constitute an eviction, in the absence of any covenant, agreement, or representations by the lessor as to the light, and where the lessor did not own the adjoining land at the time of the lease. If he had owned the land at that time, an implied easement might have existed for the continuance of light to the leased building. Hazlett v. Powell, 80 Pa. 238.

In Royce v. Guggenheim, 106 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322, the effect of a landlord's erection of a structure adjoining leased premises, darkening the lessee's windows, is to some extent discussed, but it appears in that case that the structure was on a part of the leased premises and was therefore clearly an invasion of the tenant's rights.

A tenant of the lower story of a building used for a store, the rear windows of which were the only means of light, except artificial light, in that part of the store, has an easement in the unobstructed entrance of light through those windows. Doyle v. Lord, 64 N. Y. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 629.

But if the use of the windows is not necessary to the enjoyment of the leased premises a landlord is not precluded from building on vacant premises by the fact that he has leased a building with windows overlooking them. Palmer v. Wetmore, 2 Sandf. 318; Myers v. Gemmel, 10 Barb. 537.

The tenant of a portion of a building acquires a right to light from skylights over his rooms, and where floor lights are placed under a skylight to light a basement under the room over which the skylight is placed, the tenant of the room over the basement has no right to cover the floor lights with carpets or matting to exclude the light from passing down in the basement, which is occupied by a different tenant. O'Neill v. Breese, 8 Misc. 213.

A skylight constructed for the use of a leased store is an appurtenance, the right to enjoy the use of which passes under the lease, and the light therefrom cannot be obstructed by tenants of the upper part of the building. Morgan v. Smith, 5 Hun. 220.

The tenant of a basement of a building may restrain the occupant of the story above from covering the iron grating in front of the building which protects the windows in the basement. Spies v. Damm, 54 How. Pr. 293.

It makes no difference in such case whether the Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 818, 819, 828-381. Without undertaking to define what may in all cases be included as necessary, it is enough to say, that, on the facts reported, light and air from this open space might well be found to be necessary. That being so, the facts reported are sufficient to show or at least to warrant a finding of a nuisance, or a substantial interruption of the plaintiffs' right to quiet enjoyment of the premises (Fuller v. Ruby, 10 Gray, 285, 290; Sanderson v. Berwick-upon-Tweed, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 547; Jenkins v. Jackson, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 71; Robinson v. Kilvert, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 88, 97; Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 305, 309, 380), though perhaps not of an eviction, as to which see Royce v. Guggenheim, 106 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322; Bartlett v. Far-ington, 120 Mass. 284; Brown v. Holyoke Water-Power Co. 152 Mass. 463; Brande v. Grace, supra; Upton v. Townsend, 17 O. B. 30.

2. Assuming that the plaintiffs had a right to relief against somebody, it could not properly be held on the facts reported that they were not so entitled as against these defendants. This is the point on which most stress has been laid in the argument for the defendants. A brief recital of facts may be made. The plaintiffs' lease would not expire till December 31, 1893. In it they covenanted to make no use of the premises that should be injurious to any person or property, or liable to affect any insurance on the premises, or to increase the premium thereof, and to conform to such rules and regulations as might from time to time be established by the lessors for the general convenience and safety of the tenants in the building; but the lessors entered into no express covenants. At the time the plaintiffs took their lease, which covered the 2d, 8d, 4th, and 5th stories of the east half of the building, Bradford & Thomas held a lease of the store and basement, under the plaintiffs, which would run for a year longer than the lease to the plaintiffs, and which contained provisions identical with or similar to those in the plaintiffs' lease; and they covenanted not to make any alterations or additions during their term without the written consent of the lessors. On the 20th of May, 1892, the defendants, in order to enable themselves to make another lease, which should include said basement, to the Jordans, and to give possession thereof to the Jordans, bargained with Bradford & Thomas to vacate the same, and to accept other rooms in place thereof, and to permit the enlargement of the chimney then serving the engine room; the expressed consideration therefore being $10,000 to be paid to Bradford & Thomas in cash, besides certain other considerations connected with the use of the premises. On the same day the defendants executed a lease to the Jordans of the whole premises then occupied in part by Bradford & Thomas, and in part by the plaintiffs, with these provisions, among others: "The lessees take subject to the lease to Case, Dudley & Battelle [the plaintiffs]; and to the landlord owns to the center of the street or not, or whether the iron grating is or is not in what is commonly denominated the stoop line. Ibid.

Express grant or reservation of such easements.

A grantor of land may expressly reserve the free flow of light and air over it for benefit of other property. Gay v. Walker, 36 Me. 54, 58 Am. Dec. 784; Hagerty v. Lee, 20 L. R. A. 631, 54 N. J. L. 590.

The right to have land unbuild upon for the benefit of the light, air, etc., of neighboring land may be made an easement within reasonable limits by deed. Ladd v. Boston, 151 Mass. 535.

An easement to have land remain unbuild upon is created by a clause in a deed saying: "Said grantors agree that no buildings shall be erected," etc., the word "agree" being equivalent to "grant," Hogan v. Barry, 143 Mass. 538.

A bond executed by a vendor simultaneously with a deed to the effect that a certain piece of land still owned by the grantor should never be built upon is effective to create an easement of light and air in favor of the premises conveyed. Hills v. Miller, 8 Paige, 264, 3 L. ed. 141, 24 Am. Dec. 218.

A statement equivalent to a promise or engagement made to the court and the adverse party in a suit, that the latter might have the light and air from an open space; and that this was for the mutual accommodation of both parties, was regarded in Banks v. American Tract Soc. & Sanf. Ch. 438, 7 L. ed. 1163, as a contract with the court which was binding.

A covenant that a certain space should always lay open for a passageway and court for the common use of the parties to the covenant and their respective estates was construed to create not merely a right of way but the right to an open court for light and air, where the parties, while owning the premises in common, had built adjoining the court not only a single dwelling house but a 23 L. R. A.

brick block of four dwelling houses, and their purpose was to make the same use of the remaining land adjoining the court. Salisbury v. Andrews, 128 Mass. 536.

One who accepts a deed which reserves an easement of light and air does not thereby make the easement applicable to land which he previously owned. Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Met. 395, 43 Am. Dec. 399.

The condition and reservation in a deed of a strip of land one foot in width along the dividing line of adjoining owners that the grantor shall have certain windows "looking out on said lot" in a building to be erected free from any hindrance or obstruction to any other or greater extent than they would be by an existing structure on the grantee's premises, applies only to the strip granted and not to the land previously owned by the grantee. Cooper v. Louanstein, 37 N. J. Eq. 284.

A reservation in a deed that the grantee should not erect any building more than one story high in a certain space, reciting the object to be to preserve the right to light for the grantor's premises does not restrict the grantee to the exact height of a one-story building already standing on the space mentioned, and is not violated by raising the height of such building two feet so as to give the same height of ceiling that existed in a room adjoining. Hobson v. Cartwright, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 290.

A reservation and covenant in a deed to the effect that nothing shall be built or erected on the lot conveyed to obstruct the light from a certain hall was held to give an easement of light and air to the windows of the whole building and not merely to a certain room therein, the question being the construction of the language as to what was intended by the word "hall." Pope v. Bell, 37 N. J. Eq. 495.

The right of way to a stable does not include the lease to Bradford & Thomas, and to the agreement dated this day between the lessors and said Bradford & Thomas." "Permission is granted for the lessees to put into the basement of the building boilers, dynamos, and other appurtenances sufficient to supply power, light, heat, etc., to the neighboring buildings occupied by them, and to build a chimney of adequate size in connection therewith." The Jordans went into possession June 1, 1892, and proceeded to put in electrical works, under the permission contained in their lease. There is nothing in the facts reported to show that in putting in these works the Jordans made any more disturbance of or interference with the plaintiffs than was necessarily incident to the doing of such work, or that in any respect they exceeded the permission granted to them by the defendants. The contrary is to be assumed. Mr. Minot, one of the defendants, and their active trustee, testified that he could do nothing to stop the work except to say to the Jordans that he would be glad to have anything done to prevent annoyance. The defendants objected to his being asked if the Jordans were doing anything other or different than they were authorized to do under the lease, and the question was excluded. Moreover, in their answer the defendants aver that the Jordans "are regarding the terms and provisions" of their lease. Upon these facts it might well have been found that the defendants sanctioned and authorized whatever the Jordans did, and were answerable for it. They gave express permission, and they did it for a consideration. They bought off Bradford & Thomas for the very purpose of letting the premises to the Jordans, with this permission. The effect was to injure the plaintiffs. This result was the natural and probable consequence of what the defendants permitted to be done. It was a result which they must have contemplated from the outset. A jury, upon these facts, would not only be well warranted in finding that the defendants were responsible to the plaintiffs, but that view seems to be most in accordance with the facts. The decision in the well-considered case of Upton v. Townsend is closely applicable on this point. 17 C. B. 80, 60, 66, 71, 72. See also, Lufkin v. Zane, 157 Mass. 117, 17 L. R. A. 251; Fish v. Dodge, 4 Denio, 811, 817, 47 Am. Dec. 254.

3. The defendants raise the further objection that the Jordans are not parties to the suit, and that it became apparent during the trial that they were the persons actually causing, and doing the things complained of by the plaintiffs. So far as this ground of defense is set up in the answer, it is found in the averment that the defendants made a lease "to one Jordan and another, which lease was expressly made subject to all the rights of the plaintiffs in the premises, and which lease gave to the lessees therein named, subject as aforesaid, certain rights of repair, renewal, and remodeling; that said lease is now in full force; that, as defendants are advised, their lessees are regarding the terms and provisions thereof; and that the defendants are directing, controlling, or doing no work in or about the premises whatever." This ground of defense seems to be stated in the answer rather by way of exoneration of the defendants than as pleading the want of parties. When the defendants say that they made a lease "to one Jordan and another" it cannot be supposed that they thereby meant to suggest that the plaintiffs must make "one Jordan and another" parties defendant. The right to light and air for the stable, but only such as may be necessary for the use of the right of way. Grafton v. Moir, 130 N. Y. 465. As to the right of building over a right of way, see note to Hollins v. Demorest (N. Y.) 15 L. R. A. 487.

The grant of a five-foot passageway, evidently intended as a narrow foot-way, does not necessarily imply a right to have the way kept open to the sky for light, or air, or prospect. Burnham v. Nevins, 144 Mass. 88, 50 Am. Rep. 61.

A reservation in a deed of a certain space, "to remain open forever for the benefit of light and air is held to be merely for light and air and not for a right of way. Oliver v. Pitman, 98 Mass. 46.

But a clause in a deed expressly stipulating for a passageway of a certain width for light and air grants the right to the open and unobstructed passage of light and air from the ground upward throughout the length of the passageway. Brooks v. Reynolds, 106 Mass. 81.

An express reservation in a deed of a right to light and air for a window created by a prior deed precludes one who is privy in estate with the later grantee from setting up a supposed abandonment of the easement by parol before the making of the later deed. Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Met. 386, 43 Am. Dec. 399.

An easement of lights granted by covenant in a lease for the renewable term of ninety-nine years passes to the grantee of the reversion with all privileges and appurtenances, but its existence does not constitute a violation of a special warranty in a subsequent deed of the adjoining lot against the 22 L. R. A.

claims and demands of the grantor and all persons claiming by, through, and under him. James v. Jenkins, 81 Md. 1, 6 Am. Rep. 300.

An easement for light and air to windows reserved on conveyance of land subject to a mortgage, which is assumed by the grantee, is lost on a foreclosure of the mortgage and its purchase by the wife of the grantee, to whom the land was conveyed through a third person, but who did not assume the mortgage. Christ Prot. Episcopal Church v. Maack, 98 N. Y. 488.

An easement of air, light, and vision created by covenant in a deed for the benefit of other lots by the grantor is extinguished if the owner of the easement has made or permitted permanent erections which substantially intercept the air, light, and vision; and, so far as the easement is interfered with by such erections, to that extent it is destroyed. Lattimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174.

Enforcement of right.

On a lease for ninety-nine years renewable forever of the undivided one-fourth part of a vacant lot adjoining a hotel owned by the lessor, with a restriction against building above a certain height made for the benefit of the hotel, the lessor has a right to enforce the restriction for the benefit of his hotel, notwithstanding his subsequent conveyance of the reversion of the leased premises. Thurston v. Minke, 22 Md. 487.

An injunction against the erection of a building by a lessee darkening the windows of the leased building was denied, where the lease reserved to objection of want of parties, when taken by plea or answer, should give the names of the necessary parties where this can be done, and especially where it is peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 236, 238, 543. But, waiving the discussion of technicalities, let it be assumed that no injunction could properly be granted without making the Jordans parties; the only result is that the court would, even in the absence of proper pleadings, take notice of the fact, and direct the cause to stand over, in order that the new parties might be added. Schwoerer v. Boylston Market Asso. 99 Mass. 285, 295; Story, Eq. Pl. 236, 238; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 4th Am. ed. 292. The bill was not dismissed upon this ground, but upon the ground that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief, either by way of injunction or damages, against the defendants. The Jordans might have been made parties by an amendment, and might now if an injunction were still sought; but the time has passed when an injunction could properly be issued, and the only question remaining is whether relief by way of damages should be given. So far as this form of relief is concerned, the Jordans are not necessary parties. They have entered into no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment with the plaintiffs. If in any respect the plaintiffs could maintain a claim for damages against them, certainly they are not joint contractors with the defendants; and, if the defendants are liable in damages, there is no rule requiring the Jordans to be joined in a suit to recover such damages. The objection of want of parties is therefore unavailing in the present posture of the case.

4. The only remaining question is whether relief should be granted against the defendants by way of damages. It was held in Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 232, that where a plaintiff in good faith brings a suit seeking equitable relief, supposing and having reason to suppose himself entitled to such equitable relief, even though at the time when the bill was brought he had no right to relief purely equitable, yet the court will afford relief by awarding compensation; a fortiori, if the reason for denying the purely equitable relief occurs pending the suit. In the present case, provided in other respects the plaintiffs make out their case, the only reason for not granting an injunction is that, pending the suit, the plaintiffs' lease has expired. The plaintiffs should not for this reason be turned out of court, but the bill should be retained for the assessment of damages. Woodbury v. Marblehead Water Co. 145 Mass. 509; Brande v. Grace, 154 Mass. 210; Stat. 1887, chap. 383.

Knowlton and Morton, JJ., dissent from that part of the foregoing opinion which holds the defendants legally responsible for the erection of the chimney by Jordan & Jordan, for these reasons: In their view, the defendants are not shown to have had to do with the changes near the plaintiffs' premises, except as appears by their written contracts in regard to the property. They arranged with Bradford & Thomas so as to let Jordan & Jordan into possession much sooner than could have been done without the arrangement. They made a lease to Jordan & Jordan for eight years and seven months, and in the lease they gave permission to make the changes; but they expressly stated in the lease that "the lessees take subject to the lease to Case, Dudley & Battelle, the plaintiffs." Without such permission, Jordan & Jordan would have had no right as against the lessor the right to build on the adjoining premises, then owned by a third party, but the lessee had himself acquired a lease of the adjoining premises and was proceeding to build thereon. The ground of the decision seems to be that the lessor was not damaged while the lease was existing and that the lessee might remove the building before reversion to the lessor. Atkins v. Chilson, 7 Met. 398.

A preliminary injunction against obstruction of light and air in violation of an easement reserved will be denied, unless it is shown that the obstruction will affect anything but unnecessary windows, and where the right to maintain windows has not been established at law. Hagerty v. Lee, 45 N. J. Eq. 1, affirmed in Id. 265.

No injunction against interference with an easement of light will be granted, unless the interference is material. Biddle v. Ash, 2 Ashm. 311; Ray v. Lynes, 10 Ala. 63.

The easement of an abutting owner to light and air from a street must be upheld, whether his rights depend on the common law or the civil law. Hine v. New York Elev. R. Co. 54 Hun, 425.

The doctrine of all the cases above cited on this question, we believe without exception so far as they have touched it, is that these easements are independent of the question of ownership of the fee.

In Holloway v. Southmayd, 139 N. Y. 390, three of the seven judges concurred in holding that abutting owners on the old Bloomingdale road in New York city had private easements, including those for the free flow of light and air, independent of ownership of the fee of the road, of which easement they could not be deprived without compensation in closing the road, but the fourth judge, who was needed to make a majority of the court, concurred on the ground that the abutting owners owned the fee of the road, while the other three judges dissented.

Likewise the owner of land adjacent to a canal, which constitutes a public highway, who erects a building with windows facing the canal close to the line, may restrain the erection of a building over the canal which would shut up his windows. Barnett v. Johnson, 15 N. J. Eq. 481. B. A. R.

the defendants to make the changes. With it they had and have a right as against the defendants. It cannot fairly be construed as authorizing the Jordans to create a nuisance, or to do anything that would interfere with the plaintiffs' rights as lessees. It amounted to a declaration on the part of the defendants that they gave no right as against the plaintiffs, and that Jordan & Jordan might make the changes after the expiration of the plaintiffs' lease (which then had less than eight months to run), but not before unless they did it with the consent of the plaintiffs, or in such a way as not to affect the plaintiffs' legal rights. It seems to the dissenting justices that with this construction full effect is given to the language of the contracts, in accordance with the intention of the parties, and that it is unjust to the defendants to charge them as having authorized the work to be done against the rights of the plaintiffs, and to make them pay damages for which, on the plaintiffs' theory, they can have no recovery against the real wrongdoers. Case remanded for further proceedings.

Warren SPRINGER.

(146 Ill. 481.)

1. A landlord will not be liable for obstructing his tenant's windows by building on the adjoining close, in the absence of any covenant or agreement in the lease forbidding him to do so.
2. The right to have the light and air enter the windows of a building from an adjoining lot may exist by express grant, or by virtue of express covenant or agreement.
3. Provision in a lease that the lessee shall not build at the rear of the premises nearer than twenty-five feet is not violated by building on one side of the premises, extending beyond the rear wall of the old building but not extending in the rear of the leased premises.
4. A lease providing that the lessee "shall not build at the rear of said premises nearer than twenty-five feet and no obstruction higher than six feet shall be placed in such manner as to obstruct light to said premises," prohibits any obstruction higher than six feet in any direction from said premises which would obstruct light to them.
5. A tenant must pay rent while he remains in possession, notwithstanding such interference with the enjoyment of the premises as would constitute an eviction for which he might abandon them.
6. A tenant may recoup damages for interference with his possession by the landlord in reduction of the recovery for rent, although he has remained in possession instead of abandoning, when he would have been entitled to abandon.
7. A lessee may recover damages by action for breach of covenant by his landlord, even if this does not amount to an eviction or operate as a bar to the claim for rent.
8. A judgment in forcible entry and detainer is conclusive only as to the right of possession and not conclusive as to the lessee's right to recovery or recoupment for breach of covenant in the lease.

NOTE.—The laws as to easements of light and air, whether created expressly or by implication, is fully reviewed in the note to the preceding case of Case v. Minot (Maas), ante, 536. The denial in the present case of any implied easement of light for windows on leased premises is not supported to

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover for the use and occupation of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

On March 15, 1884, appellee executed a written lease of certain premises to appellant for the period, extending from April 1, 1884, to April 1, 1894, for $30,000, payable in monthly installments of $250 each. The premises are described in the lease as follows: "All those premises situated . . . in the city of Chicago. . . . known and described as follows, to wit: 'The basement of the building known as Nos. 201, 203, and 205 So. Canal street, Chicago, being a space 50 feet by 70 feet, more or less; also the store floor of part of said building, and known as Nos. 201 and 203 So. Canal street, being a space 50 feet by 50 feet, more or less; also a space in the yard at the rear of said building, commencing at the N. W. quarter of said building, then west 25 feet, then south 25 feet, then east 25 feet, to building,—together with steam power not to exceed ten-horse power, said steam power to be furnished ten hours per day, Sundays and holidays excepted. Said premises hereby leased to be used and occupied as a marble works and kindred business, and in no manner as to damage or interfere with tenants of adjoining property.'" The lease contained, among others, the following provisions, to wit: "Party of the first part [Springer] shall not build at the rear of said premises nearer than twenty-five feet, and no obstruction higher than six feet shall be placed in such manner as to obstruct light to said premises, and party of the second part shall at all times have the use and free access through all now existing alleys leading to rear of said premises." Appellant occupied the premises under the lease from its date until July 17, its full extent by the prior authorities, which substantially agree with Case v. Minot in allowing such an implied easement so far as it is necessary for the enjoyment of the leased premises. See note above referred to under heading "Implied easements of tenant."

1888, when he left them. The building was a two-story and basement frame building, fronting east on Canal street, between Van Buren street, on the south, and Jackson street, on the north, and having a depth of 50 feet. It had windows in the front and rear, and on the north and south sides. The territory around it was practically vacant at the date of the lease. There was then no building to the south of it nearer than 40 or 50 feet, except, perhaps a small shed; none in the rear or to the west of it nearer than about 60 feet; and none to the north nearer than 30 feet, or more. There were some sheds and platforms to the north, and some rubbish to the west, but nothing to obstruct the light needed for cutting and polishing marble. In the space on the south there was an alley running west from Canal street to Clinton street, connecting with which was another alley running north and south in the rear of the premises in question. In 1885 appellee erected a large brick building, called the "Springer Building," having five stories above the basement, fronting 26 feet on Canal Street, and having a depth of 75 feet. Its north wall was immediately against the south wall of appellant's building, called the "Keating Building;" and it extended 25 feet further west than the Keating building, the extension of 25 feet being on the south line of the space in the rear of the Keating building, as described in the lease. The proof tends to show that appellee dug excavations on the lines of the alleys, and built boiler and machine shops in the rear of the Keating building, and placed obstructions of various kinds in the alleys and in the space to the rear of the Keating building. From the differences growing out of these transactions various suits have resulted. Appellee brought against appellant a suit in assumpsit for the use and occupation of said premises, to which nonassumpsit was pleaded; a suit upon a note alleged to have been given for rent, to which pleas of nonassumpsit and set-off were filed; three proceedings of distress for rent, in which the general issue and certain special pleas of set-off and general replications to the latter were filed. And appellant brought an action in case against appellee to recover damages for cutting off his light by the erection of the Springer building and other obstructions, to which the plea of not guilty was filed. The said special pleas set up violations of the covenants of the lease by alleging: that the light was shut off on the south and in the rear of the Springer building, and its extension to the west, and by the erection of shafting and machinery and other obstructions more than 15 feet high; and that the alleys were closed up by the placing therein of iron boilers, castings, engines, building materials, etc.; and that steam power was not furnished, etc. The suit for use and occupation was begun in the circuit court of Cook county. Of the other suits, one was begun in said circuit court, one in the superior court of said county, and three in the county court of said county. The four suits last named were transferred by proper order to the circuit court, and an order was entered by the latter court in the 22 L. R. A.

suit for use and occupation consolidating the other suits with it. A stipulation was entered into between counsel that there should be one trial, which should determine the matters in controversy in all the suits. A jury was waived, and by agreement the consolidation cause was submitted for trial before one of the judges of the circuit court, without a jury. Upon the trial, the plaintiff, Springer, introduced the written lease, and proved the amount of unpaid rent due thereon from October, 1887, to July 17, 1888. A large mass of evidence was introduced by the defendant, Keating, principally in support of the contentions that buildings and obstructions were erected in the rear of the premises nearer than 25 feet, and that the use of the alleys and free access through the same were interfered with and cut off. In contradiction of this evidence a large number of witnesses were examined by the plaintiff. At the close of his testimony thus introduced, the plaintiff offered in evidence, and the court received, over defendant's objection and exception, the proceedings in a forcible entry and detainer suit begun by Springer against Keating before a justice of the peace on April 25, 1888, wherein the complainant alleges that Springer was entitled to the possession of said premises, and that Keating unlawfully withholds the same, wherein judgment was rendered in favor of Springer on May 8, 1888, and an appeal was taken and perfected to the superior court, which appeal was dismissed on July 9, 1888, and a further appeal was taken and allowed to the appellate court upon filing bond and bill of exceptions within twenty days. On October 8, 1891, judgment was entered by the circuit court in favor of Springer for $2,907.50 against Keating, and in the suit of Keating against Springer the latter was found not guilty. This judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court (44 Ill. App. 547), and the case is brought here by appeal.

Messrs. Haney & Merrick for appellant.

Mr. Allan C. Story for appellee.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case many questions of fact and law are discussed by counsel in their briefs, but the record is not in such shape as to authorize us to consider any of these questions, except that which arises out of the refusal of the trial court to admit certain offered evidence, as hereinafter stated. The trial was, by agreement before the court, without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, which has been affirmed by the appellate court. The judgment of the latter court is conclusive as to the findings of fact. No "written propositions to be held as law in the decision of the case" were submitted to the court on the trial below by either side, in accordance with section 43 of the Practice Act; and hence no question of law is presented for our determination, unless the errors assigned as to the admission or exclusion of evidence necessarily involve the consideration of such a question. First Nat. Bank of Michigan City v. Haskell, 124 Ill. 587; Myers v. Union Nat. Bank, 128 Ill. 478; Hall v. Cox, 144 Ill. 532.

The evidence tends to show that a strong light is necessary for such business of manufacturing and polishing marble, as appellant was engaged in, and that the demised premises were selected by the appellant for that business mainly because of their freedom from surrounding obstructions to the supply of light. Accordingly, the defendant below offered to prove that the erection of the Springer building on the south side of the Keating building prevented the entry of light into the latter from the south and west. Upon objection by the plaintiff, the court refused to receive the testimony, and an exception was taken to its rulings by the defendant. The action of the trial court was correct, if there is no express covenant or agreement in the lease obligating the landlord to permit the light to pass over the south lot into the leased premises. The English doctrine is that, "if one who has a house with windows looking upon his own vacant land sell the same, he may not erect upon his vacant land a structure which shall essentially deprive such house of the light through its windows." Washb. Easem. *492, par. 5. This doctrine, however, does not prevail in the majority of the American states. It is held to be inapplicable in a country like this, where the use, value, and ownership of land are constantly changing. Air and light are the common property of all. The owner of a lot cannot be presumed to have assented to an encroachment thereon if he has permitted the light and air to pass over it into the windows of his neighbor's house, situated upon the adjoining lot. The actual enjoyment of the air and light by the latter is upon his own premises only. The prevalent rule in the United States is that an easement in the unobstructed passage of light over an adjoining close cannot be acquired by prescription. 2 Woodfall, Land. & T. *703, and notes; 1 Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 239, 330, and notes; Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 204, 15 Am. Rep. 80; Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 135, 2 Am. Rep. 379. In the early case of Gerber v. Grabel, 16 Ill. 217, this court held that such a right might be so acquired; but in the later case of Guest v. Reynolds, 68 Ill. 478, 18 Am. Rep. 570, the Gerber Case was, in effect, overruled, and it was held that "prescription right, springing up under the narrow limitation in the English law, to prevent obstructions to window lights," "cannot be applied to the growing cities and villages of this country without working the most mischievous consequences, and has never been deemed a part of our law." It is established by the weight of American authority that a grant of the right to the use of light and air will not be implied from the conveyance of a house with windows overlooking the land of the grantor; and that, where the owner of two adjacent lots conveys one of them, a grant of an easement for light and air will not be implied from the nature or use of the structure existing on the lot at the time of the conveyance, or from the necessity of such easement to the convenient enjoyment of the property. Keats v. Hugo, and Mullen v. Stricker, supra; 1 Wood, Land. & T. § 209, pp. 422-424, and note; Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 35, 92 Am. Dec. 444. "A grant by the owner of two adjoining lots of one of them does not imply the right of an unobstructed passage of light and air over the other." 2 Woodfall, Land. & T. *703, and note. "The law of implied grants and implied reservations, based upon necessity or use alone, should not be applied to easements for light and air over the premises of another." Mullen v. Stricker, supra; Haverstick v. Sipe, 33 Pa. 368; Keiper v. Klein, 51 Ind. 316. It follows that a landlord will not be liable for obstructing his tenant's windows by building on the adjoining close, in the absence of any covenant or agreement in the lease forbidding him to do so. Myers v. Gemmel, 10 Barb. 537; Palmer v. Wetmore, 2 Sandf. 316; Keiper v. Klein, supra; 2 Woodfall, Land. & T. *703, and note.

But the authorities all agree that the right to have the light and air enter the windows of a building over an adjoining lot may exist by express grant, or by virtue of an express covenant or agreement. Hilliard v. New York & O. Gas Coal Co. 41 Ohio St. 662, 52 Am. Rep. 99; Brooks v. Reynolds, 106 Mass. 31; Keats v. Hugo and Morrison v. Marquardt, supra. The question then arises whether the erection of the Springer building could have been regarded as a violation of the express terms of the lease, if proof had been admitted showing that it obstructed the light necessary to carry on the business. The lease contains the following provision: "Party of the first part shall not build at the rear of said premises nearer than 25 feet, and no obstruction higher than six feet shall be placed in such manner as to obstruct light to said premises." The meaning of the word "premises," as here used, is not to be restricted to the Keating building alone, but embraces also the space in the rear thereof. The lease speaks of "all those premises . . . described as follows;" and then mentions, as constituting those premises—First, the basement; second, the store floor; "also a space in the yard in the rear," 25 feet deep. The space in the rear is as much a part of the premises demised as the basement and the store floor. Therefore the appellee agreed that he would not build nearer than 25 feet to the west line of the demised space west of the Keating building, which space was 25 feet wide from east to west. The Springer building was 75 feet deep, while the Keating building was only 50 feet deep. It follows that the extension of the former west of the rear of the latter was along the south line of said space in the yard at the rear. The north wall of the Springer building did not extend further west than the west line of said space in the yard, and consequently the whole of the Springer building was south of the demised premises; hence we think counsel for appellee is right in the contention that no part of that building can be considered as an obstruction placed in the rear or to the west of the premises leased to appellant. But we cannot agree with counsel in so construing the language of the provision as to limit it to obstructions placed in the rear. The landlord does not agree that no obstruction higher than six feet shall be placed in the rear in such manner as to obstruct light to said premises. His agreement is that no obstruction higher than six feet shall be placed, whether to the north or to the west or to the south, in such manner as to obstruct light to said building; that is, to said space in the rear, as well as to said building. The Springer building—a brick structure, five stories high—was so constructed that its north wall joined the south wall of the Keating building, and the south line of the space in the yard at the rear thereof. In view of the express provision in the lease, as above quoted and construed, we are of the opinion that the defendant below was entitled to prove, if he could, that the Springer building was an obstruction placed in such manner as to obstruct light to said premises, and that the trial court should have admitted the proof upon that subject when offered.

It is claimed, however, that the offered evidence was properly rejected, because this suit is for rent accruing during a period while the tenant was in possession. In order to constitute an eviction, it is not necessary that there should be an actual physical expulsion. Acts of a grave and permanent character, which amount to a clear indication of intention on the landlord's part to deprive the tenants of the enjoyment of the demised premises, will constitute an eviction. Hayner v. Smith, 63 Ill. 480, 14 Am. Rep. 124. If the acts of the landlord are such as merely tend to diminish the beneficial enjoyment of the premises, the tenant is still bound for the rent, if he continues to occupy the premises. Unless he abandons the premises, his obligation to pay the rent remains. Skally v. Shute, 132 Mass. 367. We said in Chicago Legal News Co. v. Browne, 103 Ill. 317: "The rule is well settled that the wrongful act of the landlord does not bar him from a recovery of rent, unless the tenant by such act has been deprived in whole or in part of the possession, either actually or constructively, or the premises rendered useless. Edgerton v. Page, 20 N. Y. 284; Halligan v. Wade, 21 Ill. 470, 74 Am. Dec. 108; Leadbeater v. Roth, 25 Ill. 587." To "evict" a tenant, according to the original signification of the word, is to deprive him of the possession of the land. But the landlord, without being guilty of an actual physical disturbance of the tenant's possession, may yet do such acts as will justify or warrant the tenant in leaving the premises. The latter may abandon the premises in consequence of such acts, or he may continue to occupy them. If he abandons them, then the circumstances which justify such abandonment, taken in connection with the act of abandonment itself, will support a plea of eviction, as against an action for rent. If, however, the tenant makes no surrender of the possession, but continues to occupy the premises after the commission of the acts which would justify him in abandoning them, he will be deemed to have waived his right to abandon, and he cannot sustain a plea of eviction by showing that there were circumstances which would have justified him in leaving the premises; hence it has been held that there cannot be a constructive eviction without a surrender of possession. It would be unjust to permit the tenant to remain in possession, and then escape the payment of rent by pleading a state of facts which, though conferring a right to abandon, had been unaccompanied by the exercise of that right. Edgerton v. Page, supra; Boreel v. Lawton, 90 N. Y. 293, 48 Am. Rep. 170; De Witt v. Pierson, 112 Mass. 8, 17 Am. Rep. 58; Warren v. Wagener, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446; Wright v. Lattin, 38 Ill. 293; 1 Taylor, Land. & T. 8th ed. §§ 880, 881, and notes; Wood, Land. & T. 2d ed. § 477, pp. 1104-1106; Alger v. Kennedy, 49 Vt. 109, 24 Am. Rep. 117; Scott v. Simons, 54 N. H. 426; Jackson v. Eddy, 12 Mo. 209. But though the tenant will not be allowed to plead eviction as a bar to the recovery of rent where he has remained in possession after the performance of the acts which would have justified him in leaving the premises, yet he is not for that reason without remedy. In those states where the doctrine of recoupment is recognized, he may recoup such damages as he may have sustained by reason of the acts of the landlord, against the rent sought to be recovered. 1 Taylor, Land. & T. § 374; 2 Taylor, Land. & T. § 681; 2 Wood, Land. & T. § 477, p. 1107; Edgerton v. Page, and Warren v. Wagener, supra. Taylor, in his work on Landlord and Tenant (sec. 681), says: "By the law of recoupment, as now established in many of the United States, the tenant can avail himself, as a defense pro tanto to an action of debt for rent, of the landlord's breach of his covenants." The doctrine of recoupment is recognized in this state, and has been applied in proceedings begun by the issuance of distress warrants, and in actions for rent. Wright v. Lattin, supra; Lindley v. Miller, 87 Ill. 244; Lynch v. Baldwin, 69 Ill. 210; Pepper v. Rowley, 78 Ill. 262. In Lynch v. Baldwin, supra, where the landlord had issued a distress warrant, we said: "As to recouping damages for any loss or injury sustained by the tenant, we have no doubt that it may be done, as they grow out of the same transaction. The object of this inquiry is to ascertain the amount of rent due; and, if the acts of the landlord impaired the value of the use of the premises, then the tenant should not pay the same rent as if the landlord had done no act to reduce such value." In Pepper v. Rowley, supra, which was an action to recover rent due under a lease, we said: "If there has been a breach of any covenant contained in the lease, whatever damage appellee has sustained in consequence thereof may be recouped in this action from the amount of rent due under the lease." In the case at bar the consolidated proceeding not only includes a suit for rent, but also several proceedings begun by the issuance of distress warrants; and the stipulation permits the defendant to introduce, under the general issue, "any defense and also any set-off, whether matter of contract or tort, that he may have, in the same manner . . . as if specifically pleaded." We therefore think that the offered testimony as to the effect of the erection of the Springer building upon the supply of light should have been received, in order that any damages which the defendant may have sustained thereby might be recouped in reduction of the amount of recovery, and that defendant was not precluded from showing such damages by his failure to surrender possession at an earlier date.

Even if the offered testimony was not admissible as tending to show damages by way of recoupment, it was competent, under the declaration in the action brought by Keating against Springer, to recover damages for cutting off the light by the erection of the Springer building. Under the stipulation, not only were the suits brought by Springer to be tried together, but also with them was consolidated for trial at the same time the action in case which Keating brought against Springer. It is well settled that, although the omission of the landlord to perform his covenants may not amount to an eviction, nor operate as a bar to his claim for rent, yet the lessee has his remedy by an action to recover damages for a breach of the covenant. Warren v. Wagner, and Chicago Legal News Co. v. Browne, supra; Lounsbury v. Snyder, 81 N. Y. 514; Wright v. Laitin, supra; Royce v. Guggenheim, 108 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322; 1 Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 379, 381, and notes; 2 Wood, Land. & T. § 477, p. 1107.

It is furthermore claimed by the appellant that all the matters set up in defense or as ground of recovery by the defendant in the present consolidated suits were extinguished by the judgment in the forcible detainer suit, and that said judgment operates as res judicata, so as to bar all appellant's rights of recovery or recoupment. We are unable to yield our assent to this view. The judgment in forcible entry and detainer is conclusive only as to the right of possession, and, in a certain class of cases, as to the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties, and as to the tenant's wrongful holding over. Doty v. Burdick, 83 Ill. 478; Norwood v. Kirby, 70 Ala. 397; Hodgkins v. Price, 182 Mass. 196, 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 176. It was said, in Robinson v. Crummer, 10 Ill. 218, that "damages are not recoverable in this action, but the only judgment for the plaintiff is that he have restitution of the premises," etc.

For the error committed in the refusal to receive the evidence offered by the defendant as hereinbefore mentioned, the judgments of the Appellate and Circuit Courts are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings, in accordance with the views herein expressed.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Jersey, ex rel. Charles B. MORRIS et al.,

v.

James T. WRIGHTSON, County Clerk.

SAME

v.

William E. O'CONNOR, City Clerk, et al.

(.....N. J.....)

1. Citizens who are deprived of as full and effective an elective franchise as they are entitled to under the constitution by an apportionment act have a sufficient interest to prosecute a writ of mandamus to test the statute.
2. The constitutionality of an apportionment act is a subject of judicial inquiry and not a mere political question.
3. The courts cannot overturn a law passed within constitutional limitations on the ground that it is unwise, impolitic, unjust, or oppressive, or even that it was procured by corrupt means.
4. The election of members of assembly in assembly districts allowing each voter to vote for but one member instead of voting for all the members elected in that county is not in accordance with the constitution of New Jersey, which provides that the members of assembly shall be elected "by the legal voters of the county respectively," and that each shall be an inhabitant of "the county for which he shall be chosen."

5. Long usage and practical interpretation cannot control in the interpretation of the constitution unless the language is obscure and doubtful.

6. Mandamus to compel officers to proceed under prior laws in respect to elections instead of following an unconstitutional statute is not premature because no demand and refusal has been made or the time arrived when it is the duty of the officers to act.

(November 9, 1898.)

APPPLICATIONS for writs of mandamus to the clerks whose official duties required them to prepare ballots for elections to compel them to proceed in reference to an election for members of the general assembly in accordance with the constitutional provisions, and in so doing to disregard an act recently passed by the legislature which attempted to prescribe another course of action. Granted.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Richard Wayne Parker, for relators:

Election by districts is unconstitutional.

The assemblymen are to be citizens of the county, apportioned "among the counties," not among the districts, elected by "the voters of the counties respectively," not by a few voters of each district.

Even if districts can be made, the District-

Neither under the United States Constitution nor under the constitutions of the several states, has districting ever yet been held to be lawful without an express constitutional provision to that effect.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, also for relators: The Constitution, art. 7, § 2, par. 7, provides that sheriffs and coroners shall be elected annually by the people of their respective counties at the annual elections for members of assembly.

Could the legislature make several districts and let the people of each elect one coroner?

Their jurisdiction comprises the whole county. Why? Because of the language of the constitution adopting English laws—which makes each of the coroners as much a man of the county as the sheriff is. The language in case of coroners is that they should be elected by "the people" of their respective counties. That in relation to the assembly that its members should be elected by "the legal voters of the county." Each provision calls for a county vote.

Mr. John R. Emery, also for relators:

The Constitution of 1844 requires the election of the assemblymen by the counties, on a general ticket. This appears—

(1) From the plain language of the Constitution, Appendix, p. 15, §§ 1, 2, 3.

(2) From the constitution, as read in connection with the previous constitutions and laws of the state; this method of examination is necessary for proper construction.

(3) From the contemporaneous construction of the Constitution of 1844, shown by the legislative acts to 1852.

The legislation subsequent to 1852, dividing into assembly districts, is not a practical construction adequate to change the express direction of the constitution.

(1) It is equivalent to a real amendment to the constitution, which can be made only in the method prescribed.

(2) It is not a case of doubtful construction, in which practical subsequent legislation is effective.

See Cooley, Const. Lim. §§ 67-69, especially § 69 collecting the cases; State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. L. 1.

(3) The legislative construction has not been uniform, and the construction of the first eight years immediately following the adoption of the constitution is entitled to the greater weight.

(4) The abuse of the power of the legislature has only arisen within recent date (since 1870), and the question therefore was not likely to be raised.

Mr. Thomas N. McCarter also for relators.

Mr. Frederic W. Stevens, for respondents:

The application is prematurely made. It is altogether problematical whether a certificate containing the names of candidates to be nominated on a county ticket will ever be presented to the clerk, and if presented, what his action will be.

The point that the constitution does not allow a division of the county into districts for the election of members of assembly is no longer open for discussion; it is res judicata in this court.

As to the point that the division is not proportional, there is no such principle of giving to the voter an equal voice in the choice of representatives as is here contended for either under the common law or our constitution.

Story, Const. § 661.

Mr. Allan L. McDermott, also for respondents:

The objection that in the apportionment the lines of the assembly districts were not drawn with a proper regard for population cannot have any force in this forum.

The power to divide the counties into election districts being found in the legislature, the exercise of that power is beyond judicial control.

If the legislature has the power to make any division, this court may not review the exercise of that power any more than the legislature could review and set aside the decisions of this court.

The third article of our state constitution defines the repositories of the powers of government, and the lines of demarcation cannot be disturbed by complaints made to one department against the doings, within its exclusive province, of another. The relators must show that the law they attack is violative of constitutional limitation. The moment they step beyond this line of attack they are on political ground beyond the jurisdiction of this court.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Act of April 16, 1846 (Rev. Stat. 409), entitled "An Act to Regulate Elections," by its first section enacted that on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in each year they shall be held in each county to elect for such county such a number of persons to be members of the general assembly as such county shall be entitled to elect. The first act dividing counties into assembly districts was passed March 26, 1852, (Pub. Laws 1852, p. 465). This act was a supplement to the act to regulate elections. The second section of that act enacted that on the day mentioned in the Act of 1846 in each succeeding year an election should be held in each of the said assembly districts for one member of the general assembly, who "shall be a resident of said district." In 1861, at the session of the legislature held next after the federal census of 1860, an act was passed which was also a supplement to the act regulating elections, forming the several counties into as many assembly districts as said counties were respectively entitled to members of assembly. Pub. Laws 1861, p. 529. In 1871 a similar act was passed, with the title of "An Act to Reapportion the Several Assembly Districts of the State of New Jersey." Pub. Laws 1871, p. 45. By the General Election Law of 1876 the first section of the General Election Act of 1846 was amended by requiring an election to be held in the several election districts in each county to elect for such county such a number of persons to be members of the general assembly as such county shall be entitled to elect. Revision, p. 387. Supplements to the Apportionment Act of 1871 were passed March 4, 1878 (Pub. Laws, pp. 40, 542); March 6, 1878 (Pub. Laws, p. 49); March 12, 1878 (Pub. Laws, p. 81); March 29, 1878 (Pub. Laws, p. 570); April 8, 1878 (Pub. Laws, p. 266); April 4, 1878 (Pub. Laws, p. 285); April 4, 1878 (Pub. Laws, p. 287); March 27, 1889 (Pub. Laws, p. 115). Of these acts, all with the exception of the Act of April 8, 1878, were alterations in several of the counties of the assembly districts established by the Act of 1871, and the Act of April 8, 1878, appears to be a general act redistricting all the assembly districts in this state. In 1891 a general act was passed apportioning members of the assembly to the several counties in conformity with the federal census of 1890, and creating new assembly districts in each of the counties. Pub. Laws 1891, p. 146. In 1891 another general act was passed, making a new apportionment of members of assembly among the several counties in conformity with the census of 1890, creating new assembly districts in each of the counties. Pub. Laws 1891, p. 389. By several acts, passed respectively March 7, 1892 (Pub. Laws, p. 52), March 23, 1892 (Pub. Laws, p. 180), March 24, 1892 (Pub. Laws, p. 251), which were supplements of the General Act of 1891, alterations were made in the assembly districts of the counties of Mercer, Cumberland, and Burlington. None of this legislation after the Act of 1862 contained an express provision for the election of one member of the assembly in each assembly district. But the second section of the Act of 1862 has not been repealed, and that section expressly provided for the election of one member in each of the districts. The contention in behalf of the relators that, although assembly districts are established, there is no law in existence which purports to confer the right to elect members of the assembly otherwise than by the counties respectively, is without substance.

The question, therefore, arises directly in this proceeding whether the Act of 1891 prescribed a constitutional method of electing members of the general assembly. The consideration arising in limine concerns the right and power of the judiciary to take cognizance of the subject. The contention of counsel in resisting the allowance of this writ is that the question is a political question, and not subject to judicial review. The constitution delegates to the legislative department of the government the function of providing for the election of members of the assembly in the manner and subject to the restrictions prescribed by the constitution. A statute in the performance of that function is the exercise of a legislative, and not a political, power; and the constitutionality of the act by which that legislative power is exercised is undoubtedly a subject of judicial inquiry. State v. Cunningham, 81 Wis. 440, 15 L. R. A. 561; Parker v. State, 183 Ind. 178, 18 L. R. A. 567. The prosecutors who apply for this writ are citizens and legal voters in the county of Essex. The gravamen of their complaint is that by the operation of the Act of 1891 they are restricted in the exercise of the elective franchise in as full a manner as by the constitution they are entitled to enjoy it. The interest the relators have in the subject-matter of this controversy is sufficient to give them a standing in court to prosecute this writ. If the writ be allowed, its mandate will be directed, not to members of the legislature, but to subordinate officers, whose duties in connection with elections are purely ministerial. Recent decisions have furnished weighty precedents affirming the jurisdiction of the courts on the prosecution of citizens and voters over the constitutionality of acts of the legislature making apportionments for the election of its members. State v. Cunningham, supra; Giddings v. Blacker, 93 Mich. 1, 16 L. R. A. 403; Parker v. State, supra. In United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 821, the court entertained jurisdiction to pass upon the validity of a rule of the house of representatives for determining the presence of a quorum to transact business. In McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 869, the same court entertained jurisdiction to consider whether a statute of the state of Michigan providing for the choice of presidential electors was in contravention of the constitution. In the argument counsel directly made the point that the controversy was not judicial, because whatever decision that court or any other court might make as to the validity of the state law was subject to review by other political officers and agencies. To this argument Chief Justice Fuller, in delivering the opinion of the court, responded in this language: "It is argued that the subject-matter of the controversy is not of judicial cognizance, because it is said that all questions connected with the election of a presidential elector are political in their nature; that the court has no power finally to dispose of them; and that its decision would be subject to review by political officers and agencies, as the state board of canvassers, the legislature in joint convention, and the governor, or, finally, the congress. . . . The question of the validity of this act as presented to us by the record is a judicial question, and we cannot decline the exercise of our jurisdiction upon the inadmissible suggestion that action might be taken by political agencies in disregard of the judgment of the highest tribunal of the state as revised by our own." In State v. Cunningham, Giddings v. Blacker, and McPherson v. Blacker the writs prayed for were to go to the secretary of state, commanding him to perform the ministerial duty of giving notice that at the next general election electors would be chosen in a certain manner. By statute the city and township clerks are to give public notice of the time and place and purpose of holding an election (Revision, p. 888, § 9), and by the Ballot Reform Act of 1890 it is made the duty of the clerk of the county to receive nominations, and provide official ballots for the election of members of the assembly (Pub. Laws 1890, p. 861). The prayer of the petitioners is for a mandamus directed to these officers in the alternative either to give notice, receive nominations, prepare ballots for the election of the number of members of the assembly apportioned to the county of Essex by the whole body of the legal voters of the county, or to receive nominations, prepare ballots, and to give notice of an election of such members in accordance with the assembly districts created by the Act of 1881. The map marked "Exhibit R, 12" shows the territorial location and extent of the assembly districts created by the Act of 1891. The following table, compiled from the testimony, exhibits the population of these districts respectively, and also the number of voters polled in each district at the election of 1893, and the majority of the members elected in each district:

District.	Population.	Votes.	Majority.
1892.			Dem.	Rep.
First.....	18,616	3,881	521
Second.....	14,897	3,634	810
Third.....	11,349	3,209	587
Fourth.....	17,748	4,662	596
Fifth.....	27,431	6,750		1,534
Sixth.....	18,245	3,296	648
Seventh.....	20,748	6,691	229
Eighth.....	25,000	5,137	119
Ninth.....	24,572	6,296		2,130
Tenth.....	28,172	6,454	761
Eleventh.....	42,412	9,980		1,628
			3,771	5,097

In this construction of districts the eleventh district, with a population of 42,412, and 9,980 qualified voters, is allowed one member of assembly; and the third district, with a population of 11,349, and 3,209 voters, obtains an equal representation in the popular branch of the legislature. A qualified voter of the county of Essex who casts his ballot in the third district has by this act an effect given to it equal to the ballots of three qualified voters of the county cast in the eleventh district. The inequality in the apportionment of the population and qualified voters of the county among the districts by this act is conspicuous. By the census of 1880, Essex county was entitled to ten members of assembly. The Apportionment Act of 1881 created ten districts, having a population ranging from 18,683 to 21,258. The contention of the relators is that the apportionment among the several assembly districts by the Act of 1881 was fair and reasonable, and that the apportionment by the Act of 1891 is unjust and unreasonable, depriving the citizens of the county of the right of equal suffrage secured by the constitution. Hence the alternative prayer of the petitioners is that a writ issue for an election of ten members of the assembly in the districts formed by the Act of 1881 and of one member by the county at large.

We find insuperable obstacles in the way of judicial action of the scope last mentioned. If the legislature, having made an apportionment of members among the counties in conformity with the constitution, has the additional power to create districts within the county for the election of members, its power in that respect is unfettered by constitutional limitation, and consequently beyond the control of the judicial department of the government. The legislature may create new counties. The creation of a new county adds an additional member to the state senate. The power of creating new counties may be resorted to for political or other purposes inconsistent with public welfare, and may be oppressive to taxpayers on whom the burden of supporting a county government may fall, and yet no one would entertain the thought that the remedy for such an unwise or oppressive act vested in the judiciary. The cases in which the courts have intervened to set aside acts of the legislature creating election districts have uniformly gone upon constitutional limitations which had been violated. I know of no precedent or principle that would authorize the court to overturn a law passed by the legislature within constitutional limitations, on the ground that it is unwise, impolitic, unjust, or oppressive, or even that it was procured by corrupt means. The remedy for legislation that is simply pernicious in its character is with the people. I concur in the views submitted by defendants' counsel in their brief that "the relators must show that the law they attack is a violation of constitutional limitations. The moment they step beyond that line of attack, they are on political ground, beyond the jurisdiction of the court." The issue presented by the record in this case is whether, under the government established by the constitution, the members of the general assembly apportioned among the several counties may be elected otherwise than by the qualified voters of the county at large. The constitutional provisions under consideration are contained in article 4, §§ 1-3, under the title of "Legislature," and article 2, under the title of "Right of Suffrage." Paragraph 1, § 1, art. 4, provides that "the legislative power shall be vested in a senate and general assembly." Section 2 provides that "the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state, elected by the legal voters of the counties respectively, for three years." Section 3 provides that "the general assembly shall be composed of members annually elected by the legal voters of the counties respectively who shall be apportioned among the said counties as nearly as may be according to the number of their inhabitants. The present apportionment shall continue until the next census of the United States shall have been taken and an apportionment of members of the general assembly shall be made by the legislature at its first session after the next and every subsequent enumeration or census and when made shall remain unaltered until another enumeration shall have been taken; provided that each county shall at all times be entitled to one member, and the whole number of members shall never exceed sixty." Paragraph 2 of section 1 of article 4 provides that "no person shall be a member of the senate who shall not have attained the age of thirty years and have been a citizen and inhabitant for four years, and of the county for which he shall be chosen one year next before his election; and no person shall be a member of the general assembly who shall not have attained the age of twenty-one years, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the state for two years, and of the county for which he shall be chosen one year next before his election." Article 2, in providing for the right of suffrage, provides that "every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years who shall have been a resident of this state one year, and of the county in which he claims his vote five months next before his election, shall be entitled to vote for all officers that are now or hereafter may be elective by the people."

In construing these constitutional provisions, the form of government antecedent to the adoption of the constitution, the manner in which the legislative department was organized, and the mode of electing its members, are important adjuncts in ascertaining the intent of the framers of the constitution. By the instructions of Lord Cornbury and his commission, the instruments which in 1702 established a colonial government, the general assembly for the enacting of laws was constituted, consisting of twenty-four representatives, to be chosen in manner following: Two by the inhabitants and householders in each of the towns of Perth Amboy, and Burlington, ten by the freeholders of East Jersey; and ten by the freeholders of West Jersey. The qualification of the representatives of these divisions was an estate of freehold in "the division for which he should be chosen;" and the general assembly was composed of persons "elected by the major part of the freeholders of the respective counties and places." Leam. & S. 619-647. By an act passed April 4, 1709, entitled "An Act Regulating the Qualification of Representatives to Serve as General Assembly in This Province of New Jersey," two representatives were assigned to the towns of Perth Amboy, Burlington, and Salem, respectively, and two to each of the counties into which the colony was divided. This act provided that these representatives should be chosen "by the majority of voices or votes of the freeholders of each county," and that the "representatives for the counties aforesaid" should be freeholders in that division "for which he or they should be chosen." Allinson, p. 6. As new counties were created from time to time, each county was given two representatives, to be chosen by the county for representatives of the county. By the first constitution of this state, adopted July 3, 1776, the legislative department was divided into two bodies, a legislative council and a general assembly, the members of which were chosen annually, one member of the legislative council and three members of assembly being chosen by each county. The language of that constitution is that "the counties shall severally choose one person to be a member of the legislative council," and "each county shall also choose three members of the assembly." The qualification prescribed for the members of both the legislative bodies were that the member of the legislative council should be, and have been for one whole year next before the election, "an inhabitant and freeholder in the county in which he is chosen," and that no person shall be entitled to a seat in the assembly unless he be, and have been for one whole year next before the election, an inhabitant "of the county he is to represent." The right of suffrage was provided for in these words: "All inhabitants of this colony, of full age who are worth fifty pounds, proclamation money clear estate in the same, and have resided within the county in which they claim a vote for twelve months immediately preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote for representatives in council and assembly and also for all other public officers that shall be elected by the people of the county at large." The Constitution of 1776 authorized the legislature to add to or diminish the number or proportion of the members of assembly for any county or counties, as it might judge equitable and proper, on the principles of more equal representation. From time to time acts were passed increasing or diminishing the number of members of assembly in several of the counties; but no effort was made to equalize representation on the basis of population until 1888, when an act was passed entitled "An Act to Provide for the Equal and Just Representation of the Several Counties in This State in the General Assembly," which enacted "that after the next and each subsequent census of this state that shall be taken in pursuance of any law or laws of the congress of the United States each county of this state shall be entitled to elect and send to the general assembly one member for every six thousand inhabitants which such county shall contain at the time of taking such census as near as may be; provided always that no county shall have a less number of representatives than such county is now by law entitled to elect and send to the general assembly." Pub. Laws 1888, p. 57. This act was in force when the Constitution of 1844 was adopted, and the apportionment of members among the counties therein contained was by the constitution continued until the federal census next thereafter should be taken.

In all the legislation on this subject during colonial times, and in the Constitution of 1776 and the legislation thereafter antecedent to the convention which framed the present constitution, members of the popular branch of the legislature were regarded as representatives of the counties, chosen by the legal voters of the counties, and qualified for the office by qualification having relation to the counties for which they were elected. In the convention of 1844 the inequality of representation in the legislature was made the ground of serious complaint. As the result of the deliberations of that body, the equal representation of the several counties in the senate was retained, and equality of representation in the general assembly was provided for by the apportionment of members among the counties according to population. A comparison of the language of the old constitution and the constitution framed by the convention indicates that the purpose of the members of the convention was a modification in some particulars, and not a radical change, in the composition and selection of members of the legislative department. The old constitution provided that "the county shall choose" the members of assembly; the new constitution provides that the members of the general assembly shall be elected "by the legal voters of the counties respectively." The old constitution provided that no person should be entitled to a seat in the assembly unless he be, and have been for one whole year next before the election, an inhabitant of "the county he is to represent;" the new constitution provides that no person shall be a member of the general assembly who shall not have been a citizen and inhabitant of the county for which he shall be chosen one year next before his election. In providing for the ratio of representation among the counties the method of apportionment adopted in the new constitution was in principle in conformity with the Act of 1888, which regulated the subject under the old constitution. Between the old constitution, with the provisions of the Act of 1888 ingrafted upon it, and the new constitution, there is a similarity of language and expression that indicates that the framers of the latter intended no change in the representative character of members of the general assembly or in the mode of their election. In recasting the section in the old constitution providing for the right of suffrage, the words "for representatives in council and assembly" were omitted. The new constitution having in the section relating specifically to the election of these officers expressly provided that senators and members of assembly should be elected "by the legal voters of the county," the omitted words were superfluous. And for the words, "for all other public officers that shall be elected by the people of the county at large," the new constitution substituted the expression, "shall be entitled to vote for all officers that now or hereafter may be elective by the people;" an expression which includes officers elected in townships, wards, and minor election districts as well as those officers who by force of constitutional prescriptions were made elective by the people, such as governor, senators, members of assembly, county clerks, surrogates, sheriffs, coroners, and justices of the peace, according as these constitutional officers were by the constitution made elective by the people of the state or by the legal voters of the counties or by the people of the several townships. The problem the members of the constitutional convention were dealing with was the equalization of representation in the popular branch of the legislature. The old constitution permitted the legislature, in its discretion, to add to or diminish the number or proportion of members of the assembly for the several counties. This discretionary power in the legislature was discarded in the new constitution, and the apportionment of members among the counties in proportion to population was substituted. In a popular government, representation in proportion to population extending over the area of a state is practically equivalent to representation on the basis of the number of qualified voters. A computation on either basis would, in the main, reach nearly the same result. And it is inconceivable that the distinguished body of men who composed the constitutional convention should have contemplated an apportionment of members within the several counties by means of assembly districts not in proportion to population, or under any other restriction which should give to one qualified voter a voice in the election of members of the assembly equal to that of three, or any indefinite number of voters, who exercise their elective franchise at another voting place within the same county; for, as has been said, if the power to create these districts is possessed by the legislature, it is a power beyond constitutional restraints.

The provisions of the Federal Constitution regulating the choice of presidential electors and the election of members of congress are not apt precedents for the construction of the provisions of our constitution for the election of senators and members of assembly. Paragraph 2 of section 1 of article 2 of the Federal Constitution provides that each state shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors (to vote for president and vice-president) equal to the whole number of senators and representatives in congress. The appointment of electors is left with the several states, to be exercised in such manner as the legislature may direct. Under this constitutional provision the legislatures of the several states have exclusive power to direct the manner in which presidential electors shall be appointed, whether by the legislature directly, or by popular vote in districts, or by general ticket. McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 26 L. ed. 869. In delivering the opinion of the court in the case last cited Chief Justice Fuller said: "The constitution does not provide that the appointment of electors shall be by popular vote, nor that the electors shall be voted for upon a general ticket, nor that the majority of those who exercise the elective franchise can alone choose the electors. It recognizes that the people act through their representatives in the legislature, and leaves it to the legislature exclusively to define the method of effecting the object." The provisions in the Federal Constitution for the election of members of congress are also expressed in general terms. Section 2 of article 1 provides that "the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." And by section 4 "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state, by the legislature thereof, but the congress may at any time by a law make or alter such regulation except as to the places of choosing senators." In the absence of the interposition of congress, the manner of electing representatives in congress is committed to the state legislature, with no other restriction than with respect to the qualification of the electors. At the second session of the twenty-seventh congress an act was passed for the election of representatives in congress by districts. The debate upon the act was long and earnest. Two representatives of this state, Senator Miller, and Mr. Halsted in the house of representatives, participated in that debate. This discussion occurred in June, 1842. The constitutional convention assembled in May, 1844. The article of our constitution relating to the election of senators and members of the general assembly was reported by Ex-Governor Vroom, than whom no one was more familiar with public affairs, state and national. If the convention which framed our constitution intended to adopt a mode of electing members of assembly in conformity with the election of members of congress under the Federal Constitution, it is reasonable to assume that, with the discussions in congress at the session of 1842 fresh in the minds of its members, the provisions of our constitution on that subject would have been cast in language of similar import with the Federal Constitution; and it is a significant circumstance that the language of the Federal Constitution, which conferred discretionary power on congress, was avoided; the discretionary power possessed by the legislature under the old constitution was taken away, and a fixed rule was adopted that the members of the general assembly should be apportioned among the counties in proportion to population, and be elected by the legal voters of the counties respectively. Grouping together the phrases in which the intent of the constitution is expressed, I think its true construction is beyond controversy. Members of the general assembly are apportioned among the counties. The qualification for membership consists of citizenship of the county for which they shall be chosen, and they are to be elected by the legal voters of the county. The right of suffrage is granted to residents of the county, and each qualified voter is secured by constitutional prescription the right to vote for all officers elective by the people. Members of the general assembly are by the constitutional regulation elective by the legal voters of the counties, and every qualified voter who has for the specified period of time been a resident of the county in which he claims his right to vote is secured the right to a voice in the election of all officers who, by the constitution are elective by the class of legal voters to which he belongs. The constituency by which members of the general assembly shall be elected is designated by the constitution, and the qualifications requisite for the right of suffrage are therein prescribed, and also the elective franchise which shall be enjoyed by each qualified voter. These constitutional provisions were self-executing, and also self-sustaining. State v. Newark, 39 N. J. L. 880-888, 40 N. J. L. 558. Nothing was left for legislative action except the apportionment of members among the counties in a fixed ratio, and such regulations as were necessary for holding elections,—the canvassing of the votes, and the certification of the result. When the legislature has once made the apportionment of members to any county, the constituency by which the members so apportioned shall be elected, and the elective franchise of each of the legal voters by whom such members are elective, become subject to constitutional prescriptions which are beyond legislative control. The first apportionment act under the constitution apportioned the members among the counties without making any provision for the manner in which they should be elected. Pub. Laws 1851, p. 289. The act was not imperfect. Without legislative action the mode of electing the members apportioned by the act among the counties was completely provided for by the constitution, which ex proprio vigore determines how members apportioned among the counties shall be elected.

Other constitutional provisions which provide for the election of other officers shed a light on the subject under consideration. Paragraph 7, § 2, art. 7, provides that coroners shall be elected by the people of their respective counties. Paragraph 1, § 7, art. 6, provides that there may be elected two, and not more than five, justices of the peace in each of the townships of the several counties, and in each of the wards in cities that vote in wards; the number of justices of the peace a township or ward may have being determined by its population. Paragraph 8, § 2, art. 7, provides that justices of the peace shall be elected by ballot at the annual town meetings of the townships and of the wards, and when elected they shall be commissioned for the county. In these provisions, as in that providing for the election of members of assembly the constitution prescribed the constituency by which coroners and justices of the peace shall be elected; and it could scarcely be contended with any plausibility that an act of the legislature for the election of coroners in election districts, or for the election of the number of justices of the peace a township or ward is entitled to have in a corresponding number of election precincts, would comply with the constitutional prescriptions. It will be observed, also, that throughout the constitution the constituency by which every constitutional officer shall be chosen is defined with precision.

After a careful examination and the most attentive consideration of the important questions presented in this case, with the aid of the learned argument and elaborate briefs of counsel, in my judgment the election of members of assembly in assembly districts is a plain departure from the method of electing these representatives prescribed by the constitution. Instead of the eleven members apportioned to the county being elected by the legal voters of the county, one member is elected in each assembly district by the legal voters of that district, arbitrarily created by the legislature. In the construction of statutes it is a cardinal rule, which applies as well to constitutional provisions, that when the law is in the affirmative that a thing shall be done by certain persons or in a certain manner, this affirmative matter contains a negative that it shall not be done by other persons or in another manner, upon the maxim "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." Stradling v. Morgan, 1 Plowd. 206, 207; 9 Bacon, Abr. 295; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 80. Where the constitution prescribes the manner in which an officer shall be appointed or elected, the constitutional prescription is exclusive; and it is not competent for the legislature to provide any other mode of obtaining or holding the office. Cooley, Const. Lim. 78, note 3; People v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50, 56; People v. Bull, 46 N. Y. 57-63, 7 Am. Rep. 302. The election of one member in one assembly district and one member in another district, and so on through the eleven districts into which the county is divided, is not the election of the members of the general assembly apportioned among the counties by the legal voters of the county. The constituency devised by the system of assembly districts is another and a different constituency from that prescribed by the constitution, and the qualified voters of the county are restricted in the exercise of the right of suffrage as fully as is guaranteed to them by the constitution. It seems to me that it cannot be affirmed on any defensible ground that a member of the assembly chosen by the voters of an election district within the county is, in the words of the constitution, "elected by the legal voters of the county." An act of the legislature providing that each qualified voter of the county should vote for only one of the members apportioned to the county would be plainly unconstitutional. The assembly district system differs only in form. It segregates the qualified voters of the county into classes, and allows each qualified voter of the class to vote for only one of the members apportioned to the county.

It is contended, in the first place, that the constitutionality of legislation for the election of members of the general assembly in assembly districts is res judicata. To sustain this contention, State v. Newark, 40 N. J. L. 297, was cited. The proceeding in that case was an application for a mandamus to compel the mayor and common council of the city of Newark to divide the city into wards corresponding in number and boundaries with the assembly districts created by the Act of April 5, 1878. The application was denied, on the ground that acts creating legislative districts were public acts, and did not go into operation until the July succeeding the time they were passed. The case was argued at June term, 1878, and prior to the date when the Act of April 5, 1878, became effective. It appears by the brief of the counsel of the relator in that case that the power of the legislature to divide counties into assembly districts was not put in dispute. His contention was that this power could be exercised only at the time the apportionment of members among the counties was made,—that is, at the session next after the federal census,—and that the districts then formed must remain unaltered until the time arrived for the next apportionment. It was to the aspect in which the question was presented by counsel that the remarks of Mr. Justice Reed, with respect to the unfettered power of the legislature to direct the method in which members apportioned among the counties should be elected, were directed. The case was decided on other grounds. In June term, 1890, the constitutionality of the assembly districting acts was mooted before the court of errors and appeals in Mortland v. State, 52 N. J. L. 521. In that case the proceeding was in quo warranto to test the defendants' title to the office of chosen freeholders under an election pursuant to an act of the legislature which provided for the election of chosen freeholders in assembly districts. In this case, as well as in Gardner v. Newark, the constitutionality of acts creating assembly districts arose collaterally. The title of the defendant to the office under such an election was sustained. But Mr. Justice Garrison, in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "Referring to the suggestion made on the argument that the assembly districts, which by this act are referred to as the precincts for the election of freeholders, were not legal legislative creations, inasmuch as the constitution contains no intimation but that members of assembly shall be chosen by the counties at large, it is sufficient to say that we are not now concerned with the legality of such subdivisions of counties. The act under review refers to these districts for the purpose of defining a territorial limit. Such precincts or assembly districts do exist, whether legally or not, and to each of these de facto districts a freeholder is assigned. Beyond this we need not at this time go." And the headnote prefixed to the case, prepared by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court, is as follows: "Quære, whether assembly districts may have any legal existence as political subdivisions of the county." Gardner v. Newark, although decided twelve years before, was not referred to by the court. With this judicial action of the highest court in the state, we are not at liberty to treat this question as res judicata.

The contention, in the next place, is that the purpose and intent of these constitutional provisions have, by contemporaneous construction, long usage, and practical interpretation, become established, and at this day the subject is not open for discussion. For the first eight years after the new constitution was adopted—from the fall of 1844 to the fall of 1851, inclusive—the members of assembly were elected by the counties at large. This may be said to be the contemporaneous exposition of the constitution. The Act of March, 1852, first created assembly districts. This act remained in force until after the census of 1860, when, by the Act of 1861, a new apportionment among the counties was made, and to some extent a corresponding change in assembly districts. The districts created by the Acts of 1852 and 1861, which continued to exist until 1871, conformed to county and the then existing township and ward lines. No criticism has been made upon the fairness and equality in population with which these districts were constructed. If the practical interpretation for the years from 1852 to 1870, inclusive, gave construction to the constitution, that construction will not sustain the Act of 1891. The result of the districting in the county of Essex by that act has already been stated. The districts into which the county was divided are unequal in population, and the legal voters of the county are so adjusted in the several districts that of the eleven members apportioned to the county, eight members are elected by majorities aggregating 8,771 votes, and the other three by majorities aggregating 5,097 votes. The inequalities in other counties appear by Map A, on the part of the relators, conspicuous among which are those in the counties of Burlington and Camden,* Burlington being divided into two districts, with the population, respectively, of 22,555 and 34,204; Camden into three districts, with the population, respectively, of 61,510, 15,506, and 10,671. A new system of constructing assembly districts was introduced by the Act of 1871, plainly for the furtherance of political purposes. Township, ward, and city lines were disregarded, and assembly districts were carved out within the counties without regard to population, and were so devised, by massing together the qualified voters of one political party, as to secure to the minority of qualified voters of the county an unjust advantage in the choice of members of the assembly, the members of that body representing counties being no longer "elected by the legal voters of the counties respectively." This was conspicuously, but not exclusively, the case in the county of Hudson. Exhibit No. 9,³ on the part of the defendants, discloses the result of the first election under that act; and the return of the votes in the second election district of that county illustrates the object that may be effectuated by the arbitrary establishment of districts that shall mass in one district a great body of the qualified voters of one political party. The "Horseshoe District" is as well known in this state as a synonym for (to use a subdued expression) unfair political methods as is the word "gerrymander" throughout the United States.

At the legislative session of 1878 no less than seven different acts were passed altering assembly districts in the several counties. In 1881 a new apportionment was made, and new districts were created, some of which were remodeled in 1889. In 1891 there was a new apportionment among the counties, and new assembly districts were created; and in 1892 three acts were passed altering the districts in three counties. The maps and election returns made exhibits in this case show districts with areas of grotesque shapes, inequalities in population, and the massing in districts of the voters of one political party, to overcome the constitutional rights of the legal voters of the counties to equality in choice of representatives of the county in the general assembly. The maps and exhibits, which, by the written stipulation of counsel, are evidence in these cases, exhibit the capacity that lies in the assembly district system to enable the political party that happens to control the legislature to provide means for its continuance in power. Certain it is that if the legislative usage and practice beginning in 1871 and coming down to the present time has established a construction of the constitution that is now a finality, then it must be conceded that the legislative power and discretion in the premises are unqualified and unrestrained; and, to adopt the language of the brief of the defendants' counsel: "There is not any constitutional restriction upon the law-making power controlling or directing the subdivision of counties into assembly districts. The division may be fair or unfair, equal or unequal, proportionate or disproportionate, and this court may not review the exercise of that power." How far contemporaneous exposition, long usage, and practical interpretation shall control in the construction of constitutional provisions is the vital question on this branch of the case. Contemporaneous construction and long usage, and especially the practical interpretation by the various departments of the government, are entitled to great weight in the construction of constitutional provisions. But it is only when the words of the constitution are of doubtful significance, or the meaning is obscure, that resort to extraneous aid is permissible. Mr. Justice Story, in his treatise on the Constitution, says: "Where its terms are plain, clear, and determinate they require no interpretation, and it should therefore be admitted, if at all, with great caution, and only from necessity, either to escape some absurd consequence, or to guard against some fatal evil." And again: "Contemporary construction is properly resorted to, to illustrate and confirm the text, to explain a doubtful phrase, to expound an obscure clause. . . . It can never abrogate the text; it can never narrow down its true limitations; it can never enlarge its natural boundaries." 1 Story, Const. §§ 405, 407.

The case most frequently cited to illustrate the effect of contemporaneous construction, long use, and practical interpretation in the construction of constitutional provisions is Stuart v. Laird, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 299, 2 L. ed. 115. Congress passed an act establishing circuit courts, and designated the justices of the supreme court to hold the circuits. The question before the court was whether congress possessed the power to assign justices of the supreme court to hold circuit courts, or whether the judges of these courts should be specially appointed as such, and have distinct commissions for that purpose. The only provisions of the Federal Constitution relating to the organizing of courts and the mode of appointment are those that provide that the judicial power of the United States should be vested in one supreme court, and inferior courts as congress may from time to time ordain and establish, and that the power of appointing judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments were not therein otherwise provided for, should vest in the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate. The constitution had nowhere defined the duties of the justices of the supreme court, nor did it contain any express designation of the persons by whom the inferior courts established by congress should be held. The only other provision there was on the subject was that the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts should hold office during good behavior, and should receive a compensation which should not be diminished during their continuance in office. It being left undefined in the constitution by what judges these courts should be held, the court considered the practical exposition by long practice and acquiescence to have fixed the construction of the constitution in a matter which the language of that instrument left in a state of uncertainty. Rogers v. Goodwin, 2 Mass. 475, is another case in the same line of decision. A statute passed in 1636 authorized the freemen of every town to dispose of their lands, and in the preamble of another statute, passed in 1753, it was recited that the proprietors of lands lying in common have power "to manage, dispose and divide the same in such way and manner as hath been or shall be concluded, and agreed on by the major part of the interested." Under this authority the proprietors of the town made conveyance by deed to a stranger. The point relied on against the validity of this deed was that the proprietors had no authority to sell lands to a stranger. The conveyance was sustained on the legal ground that long and continued usage furnished a contemporaneous construction, which must prevail over the mere technical import of the words. It will be observed that the statute in question contained no provision with respect to the manner in which common lands should be disposed of. The act was silent on that subject. Neither of these cases is pertinent to the subject under discussion, for the constitutional provisions under consideration expressly provide that members of the assembly shall be elected by the legal voters of the county, and qualified voters resident in the county are declared to be entitled to vote for all officers elective by the people. Judge Cooley states the controlling principle in this language: "Where no ambiguity or doubt appears in the law, the same rule obtains here as in other cases,—that the court should confine its attention to the law, and not allow extrinsic circumstances to introduce a difficulty where the language is plain. To allow force to a practical construction in such a case would be to suffer manifest perversions to defeat the evident purpose of the lawmakers." And the same learned jurist, after citing Stuart v. Laird, Rogers v. Goodwin, and other cases of similar import, which the author says appear on first reading not to have observed proper limitations, concludes his observations in these words: "It is believed, however, that in each of these cases an examination of the constitution left in the minds of the judges sufficient doubt upon the question of its violation to warrant their looking elsewhere for aids in interpretation, and that the cases are not in conflict with the general rule as above laid down. Acquiescence for no length of time can legalize a clear usurpation of power where the people have plainly expressed their will in the constitution, and appointed judicial tribunals to enforce it. A power is frequently yielded to merely because it is claimed, and it may be exercised for a long period in violation of the constitutional prohibition without the mischief which the constitution was designed to guard against appearing, or without any one being sufficiently interested in the subject to raise the question; but these circumstances cannot be allowed to sanction a clear infraction of the constitution. We think we allow to contemporary and practical construction its full legitimate force when we suffer it, where it is clear and uniform, to solve in its own favor the doubts which arise on reading the instrument to be construed." Cooley, Const. Lim. 84, 85.

An examination of the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States will disclose the fact that long usage, contemporaneous construction, and practical interpretation have been resorted to in construing statutes and constitutional provisions only to ascertain the meaning of technical terms, or to confirm a construction deduced from the language of the instrument, or to explain a doubtful phrase or expound an obscure expression. Calder v. Bull, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 388, 1 L. ed. 648; United States v. Wilson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 150, 8 L. ed. 640; Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97; Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. ed. 257; United States v. Dickson, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 141, 161, 10 L. ed. 689, 697; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 539, 622, 10 L. ed. 1061, 1091; Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299-315, 13 L. ed. 998-1008; Hahn v. United States, 107 U. S. 402-408, 27 L. ed. 527, 528; Burrow-Giles Lithographic Co. v. Sarony, 111 U. S. 58-57, 28 L. ed. 849-851; Brown v. United States, 118 U. S. 568-571, 28 L. ed. 1079, 1080; McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1-26, 36 L. ed. 869-874. In United States v. Dickson, Mr. Justice Story said: "The construction given by the treasury department to any law affecting its arrangements and concerns is certainly entitled to great respect. Still, however, if it is not in conformity to the true intent and provisions of the law, it cannot be permitted to conclude the judgment of a court of justice. . . . It is not to be forgotten that ours is a government of laws, and not of men, and that the judicial department has imposed upon it by the constitution the solemn duty to interpret the laws in the last resort; and, however disagreeable that duty may be in cases where our judgment shall differ from that of other high functionaries, it is not our liberty to surrender or to waive it." These observations were made by a learned jurist, with respect to the construction of statutes which are laws subject to alteration or repeal at any time in the discretion of the legislative department of the government. They apply with irresistible force to the fundamental instrument of government,—the constitution,—the supreme and irresistible power to make or unmake which (to quote the language of Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia) "resides only in the whole body of the people, and not in any subdivisions of them."

In this state the rule of construction is stated with accuracy and discrimination in State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. L. 1. The subject is discussed by the chief justice in his opinion (p. 22), and Mr. Justice Magie in his dissenting opinion (p. 47) with a citation of authorities. The conclusion reached by the court is stated in the headnote as follows: "A statute of uncertain meaning, which has been enforced in a certain sense for a long series of years by the different departments of government, will be judicially construed in that sense." The majority of the court, finding the language of the statute broad enough to embrace the meaning contended for, permitted a practical construction of it to that effect for more than fifty years to prevail. The subject was again brought under judicial decision in Engeman v. State, 54 N. J. L. 247. The question before the court in that instance was the constitutionality of an act of the legislature passed in 1855, making justices of the supreme court ex officio judges of the court of common pleas, orphans' court, and court of quarter sessions. State v. Kelsey was cited with approbation by Mr. Justice Van Syckel in delivering the opinion of the court. But it will be observed that the learned judge, on page 252, 54 N. J. L. lays particular stress upon the fact that the constitution gave the legislature power to alter or abolish all these courts, as the public good might require; and that the power to alter or abolish seemed necessarily to imply and carry with it authority to change or modify the structure of the court, as well in the mode of appointment as in the number of judges. The learned judge therefore concluded that the power of the legislature over the controverted subject was unrestrained by the fundamental law. To such a condition of affairs State v. Kelsey was properly applied. Neither of these precedents can be invoked as justifying long usage or practical interpretation as controlling the construction of constitutional or statutory law, unless under the exceptional circumstances above mentioned. Nor are we without precedents directly affirming the domination of the constitution, notwithstanding long usage and practical construction to the contrary, and the most conclusive arguments ab inconvenienti. I refer to Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. 19 How. 393, 15 L. ed. 691, and Hepburn v. Griswold, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 608, 19 L. ed. 518. In the first of these cases the federal court, in 1856, decided that the eighth section of an act of congress passed in 1820, and known as the "Missouri Compromise Act," which prohibited slavery in all that part of the territory ceded by France under the name of Louisiana, lying north of the line of 36 degrees and 30 minutes, not included within the limits of Missouri, was unconstitutional and void, notwithstanding the fact that the act was designed as a final settlement of the agitation of the slavery question, and a state had been admitted into the Union under its provisions, and that congress, from its first session down to the year 1848, had repeatedly exercised the power which was denied by that decision; and notwithstanding the doctrine of a practical construction, continued through a long series of years, was invoked by the dissentient judges. The keynote of that decision is expressed by the chief justice (p. 426) in these words: "No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling should induce the court to give to the words of the constitution a more liberal construction than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted. Such an argument would be altogether inadmissible in any tribunal called on to interpret it. If any of its provisions are deemed unjust, there is a mode prescribed in the instrument itself by which it may be amended; but while it remains unaltered it must be construed now as it was understood at the time of its adoption. It is not only the same in words, but the same in meaning, and delegates the same powers to the government, and reserves and secures the same rights and privileges to the citizen; and as long as it continues to exist in its present form it speaks not only in the same words, but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came from the hands of its framers, and was voted on and adopted by the people of the United States. Any other rule of construction would abrogate the judicial character of this court, and make it the mere reflex of the popular opinion or passion of the day." Whatever criticisms were made upon the result of this decision or its policy in the discussions that followed its promulgation, the soundness of the doctrine of the supremacy of the constitution whenever invoked, so forcibly expressed by the chief justice, has never been denied or impugned. In Hepburn v. Griswold, acts of congress passed in 1862 and 1863, making treasury notes of the United States a legal tender for debts, were in 1869 declared to be unconstitutional. This decision was subsequently overruled in the Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287. But in both of these cases the court rested its opinion on the language in which the constitutional grant of power to congress was expressed. In the decision of the latter case, Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, refers to the situation of the country at the time these acts were passed, and the great business derangement, widespread distress, and rank injustice" that would result if these acts were held to be invalid; but he adds: "The consequences of which we have spoken, serious as they are, must be accepted if there is a clear incompatibility between the constitution and the legal tender acts." The authority of congress to pass the acts in question was, in the opinion of the court, (pp. 533, 534,) deduced from the last clause of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution granting the power to congress to make all laws which should be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers of the constitution conferred upon congress. "The means or instrumentalities referred to in that clause and authorized," it is said by the learned judge who prepared the opinion of the court, "are not enumerated or defined. They were left to the discretion of congress, subject only to the restrictions that they may be not prohibited, and be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the enumerated powers given to congress." Precedents of the same import are numerous in the federal and state courts. I have cited Scott v. Sandford and Hepburn v. Griswold for the reason that the interests involved in these cases gave these decisions a conspicuous place in the domain of constitutional law.

The constitution contains the permanent will of the people. It is paramount to the power of the legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the power which created it. Popular government can be maintained only by upholding the constitution at all times and on all occasions as it was when it came from the hands of the people, by whose fiat it was established as the fundamental articles of government, to abide until altered by the authority which created it. To adopt the language of Chief Justice Bronson in Oakley v. Aspinwall, 8 N. Y. 568: "There is always some plausible reason for the latitudinarian constructions which are resorted to for the purpose of acquiring power; some evil to be avoided, or some good to be attained, by pushing the powers of the government beyond their legitimate boundary. It is by yielding to such influences that constitutions are gradually undermined and finally overthrown. . . . One step taken by the legislature or the judiciary in enlarging the powers of the government opens the door for another, which will be sure to follow; and so the process goes on, until all respect for the fundamental law is lost, and the powers of the government are just what those in authority please to call them." Within the domain of construction there is room for argument and discussion; nay, even for a divergency of opinion; but when the meaning of the constitution, interpreted by its letter and in its spirit, is ascertained, extraneous considerations are of no avail. In the process of construction, long usage and practical interpretation are entitled to great weight if the language be obscure or doubtful; but such extraneous considerations cannot be allowed "to abrogate the text," or "fritter away its obvious sense." I have already said that on a construction of the words of the constitutional provision regulating this subject, fortified by the policy and institutions which prevailed in this state prior to the framing of the constitution, and a comparison of other of its provisions, the constitutional mandate requires the election of members of the general assembly by the legal voters of the counties, respectively, and that the division of counties into assembly districts, and the distribution of the members among these districts for the purpose of electing such members, are in conflict with the constitutional mandate. No one can examine the legislation on this subject from 1871 to the present time and contemplate the results without realizing the evils which have been fostered under this system. Relief from these wrongs through the ballot box cannot be assured if the majority in the legislature is elected by a minority of the legal voters of the state. Precedent has been followed by retaliation, to be repeated from time to time as supremacy in the legislature has passed from one political party to the other. For this condition of affairs the only remedy is by a return to constitutional methods. If it be that the election of members of the general assembly in districts furnishes a more perfect system of popular representation in the popular branch of the legislature, the change devolves upon the people who made, and who alone can alter, the constitutional method of electing these representatives; and it may be affirmed with considerable confidence that if such a power be conferred upon the legislature it will be accompanied with qualifications and conditions that will secure to each qualified voter equality in the election of representatives as nearly as may be.

The remaining question is whether these proceedings were prematurely instituted, the contention being that a demand and refusal to perform a duty is an essential prerequisite to an application for a mandamus in any case and under all circumstances. There is a distinction between duties of a public nature and duties of a private nature affecting only the rights of individuals. In the latter class of cases, demand and refusal are held to be necessary as a condition precedent to relief by mandamus; in the former class, the duty being of a public nature, there is not the same necessity for a literal demand and refusal. In such cases the law itself stands in lieu of a demand, and omission to perform the required duty is equivalent to a refusal. High, Mandamus, § 18. To postpone the commencement of these proceedings until the time preceding the annual elections, at which the county clerk and the clerks of the cities and townships of the county are required to perform the duties devolved upon them under the election laws, would effectually prevent their institution being ever practically of any avail. The testimony of the county clerk and of other election officers, taken under this rule, makes it apparent that these officials intend to conduct elections in the county under the Act of 1891, until otherwise directed, so long as that act is unrepealed. Indeed, the presumption is not to be entertained that these officers would, on constitutional grounds, disregard the act of legislation conforming to precedents of upwards of twenty years' standing, unless the invalidity of the act be first judicially determined. In McPherson v. Blacker, the writ was allowed on the answer of the secretary of state denying that he had refused to give the notice of election required by the petition for the writ, but averring that he intended to give notices under the law the constitutionality of which was assailed, as will appear by the report of the case in 146 U. S. 8, 86 L. ed. 870.

The rule to show cause should be made absolute for a peremptory mandamus commanding that all future general elections for members of the general assembly in the county of Essex shall be so conducted that such members shall be voted for throughout the county as prayed for by the relators. To this extent the rule to show cause is made absolute, without costs.

failure to keep in repair the streets, alleys, sidewalks, roads, and bridges.

NOTE—Rights of children to protection against dangerous condition of highway.

There seems to be no question in any jurisdiction that so long as the child is a traveler the municipality owes it the same duty of having its streets reasonably safe that it owes to other travelers.

Children may use the street for the purpose of travel, and are entitled to have it safe for such purpose. Shippy v. Au Sable, 85 Mich. 280.

And such rule has been acted on at times without being formally stated. Draper v. Ironton, 42 Wis. 607.

Whether or not the municipality is bound to anticipate that children may be travelers and exercise on that account a degree of care in making the highway safe which would not be necessary if only adults were to use it does not seem to be determined. But the municipality is not required to exercise such care as will make accidents to children impossible.

If a bridge is reasonably safe for persons exercising ordinary care it is sufficient. No duty rests on the city to make it safe for children to play around or upon. Gavin v. Chicago, 97 Ill. 66, 37 Am. Rep. 99.

The city is not liable if the injury is caused by a fall from an awning post, which the child was at. 22 L. R. A.

tempting to climb without the least shadow of right. Gaughan v. Philadelphia, 119 Pa. 503.

The city is not bound to prevent the abutting owner from setting window screens on the sidewalk in front of his premises for the purpose of making the place safe for children. McLoughlin v. Philadelphia, 142 Pa. 80.

Statutes requiring simply safety for travelers.

Under the construction which has been given to the Massachusetts statutes, that the municipal corporation is bound to keep the way safe only for travelers, a child injured by a defect in the street while at play therein cannot recover from the municipality. Blodgett v. Boston, 8 Allen, 237; Tighe v. Lowell, 119 Mass. 472.

Only travelers can recover under the Wisconsin statutes. Reed v. Madison, 17 L. R. A. 783, 88 Wis. 171.

When children use a part of the public road for their sports, the town or city through which the way passes is not responsible for injuries received by one of the children so engaged, although the injuries may result from a defect in the road. Stinson v. Gardiner, 42 Me. 248.

Under the Wisconsin statutes, if the traveled part of the road is sufficient and safe, no recovery discharge of, or failure to discharge, such duties as are purely ministerial, and not governmental or discretionary.

4. A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries caused by the negligence of its agents and officers in the discharge of, or omission to discharge, duties which are purely governmental or discretionary.
5. When the injury sued for is alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligent use of its corporate property, or in the discharge or omission to discharge of a ministerial duty, the burden of proving negligence is on the plaintiff; and if the jury, by its determination, finds that the facts are not sufficient to sustain the charge of negligence, the court cannot disturb the verdict, even though it be of a different opinion. To do so would be a denial of the right of trial by jury guaranteed by the constitution of this state.

Under this class of statutes the chief question which can arise after the highway is shown to be defective is whether or not the child was in fact a traveler.

That the ulterior purpose of a child in passing along a street or over a bridge is play is not sufficient to defeat a recovery for injuries caused by a defect in the way. Strong v. Stevens Point, 62 Wis. 255.

The street commissioner testified that he had seen this excavation in this bank some months before this accident occurred, and that he did nothing to repair this defect, and that he saw it frequently afterward, previous to this accident, and still did nothing to repair it.

There was nothing between the wagon-beaten track in this road and the bank.

Children had been in the habit of playing around this bank for some time previous to this accident.

These facts constitute such negligence as imposes a legal liability for damages against the city.

The court held that amusing himself as he went did not necessarily deprive him of his rights as a traveler, but at all events there was evidence that at the moment of his injury he was actually walking towards home, and that therefore he was a traveler entitled to protection.

Where a boy had stopped before a shop window to look at objects therein and was injured as he turned away, it was held that the question whether or not he was a traveler was for the jury. Hunt v. Salem, 121 Mass. 294.

Absence of statutory rules.

If the statutes do not limit the right of recovery to travelers and the highway is shown to be defective, the question then becomes one of contributory negligence. If the child is so young that its very presence in the street raises the presumption of negligence the question of imputed negligence may arise as shown in note to Chicago City R. Co. v. Wilcox (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 70, otherwise the question is simply one of contributory negligence by the child itself. The mere fact of playing in the street is not of itself sufficient to show negligence.

If the liability rests upon general principles and not upon statute, the fact that the child is playing in the street at the time of the injury is immaterial. Donoho v. Vulcan Iron Works, 7 Mo. App. 447, affirmed in 75 Mo. 401.

the road or gutter at the time of the unfortunate occurrence.

When the bank fell no part of the falling dirt reached the road, and only a few clods rolled down to the gutter.

Plaintiff cannot recover under the provisions of section 53 of chapter 43 of the Code, which provides that "any person who sustains an injury to his person or property by reason of a public road, bridge, sidewalk, or alley in an incorporated city being out of repair, may recover all damages sustained by him."

The city need not have erected rails or barriers, under the circumstances of this case, to prevent persons from going out of the road and approaching this bank.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary Lewis, an infant four years and five months old, while playing on the side of a road in the city of Huntington on the — day of May, 1892, was killed by the falling of an embankment which had been left along the street or road as a barrier to keep travelers along the highway from driving into the adjacent creek. This embankment had been undermined to some extent by persons digging out sand and gravel, and was in a dangerous condition, as the death of the child bears witness. The street commissioner, after some excavating had been done, (how much, the evidence does not disclose,) put up a notice forbidding the taking of sand and gravel from this place; but afterwards (how long does not appear, nor how long before the accident) a man by the name of Brown excavated sand and gravel, and hauled it away; for what purpose, is not revealed, but, so far as the evidence shows, it was without the knowledge of the municipal authorities. The jury were taken to view the place of the accident.

It is now firmly established, by a long line of well-considered decisions, that a municipal corporation is liable for injuries occasioned by its negligence in the following three classes of cases: (1) Failure to keep its streets, alleys, sidewalks, roads, and bridges in repair, under the statute. (2) In the discharge of ministerial or specified duties, not discretionary or governmental, assumed in consideration of the privileges conferred by charter, even though there be the absence of special rewards or advantages. (3) As a private owner of property, to the same extent as individuals are liable. It would be impracticable to cite all the authorities settling these propositions, but the following are referred to as leading cases: Mendel v. Wheeling, 28 W. Va. 233, 57 Am. Rep. 665; Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 375, 94 Am. Dec. 461; Orme v. Richmond, 79 Va. 86; Mackey v. Vicksburg, 64 Miss. 777; Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 23 L. ed. 440. In the first class of cases, negligence is presumed, and notice of defect is not required. In the second and third classes, negligence must be alleged and fully proven. Chapman v. Milton, 81 W. Va. 385; Biggs v. Huntington, 82 W. Va. 55.

This suit is not proper under the first class, or statutory provision, because it was not caused by any defect or obstruction in the roadbed; but it can be maintained under the two latter classes, because it is made the ministerial duty of the municipality, by law, to protect the public and individuals from anything dangerous, and the embankment that caused the injury was maintained by the city

In an action against a municipal corporation for injuries caused by the fall of an obstruction in a street, it was held no defense that the child was playing in the street, if it did not appear that, in view of all the circumstances of the case, he was guilty of negligence. In other words, the fact of a child's playing in the street is not at all times and under all circumstances negligence. King v. Troy, 104 N. Y. 844, 58 Am. Rep. 508.

A child playing in the street is not a trespasser in such a sense as to preclude a recovery in case of injury. Vicksburg v. McLain, 67 Miss. 4.

In McGarry v. Loomis, 68 N. Y. 108, 20 Am. Rep. 510, a mill-owner abutting on a street had carried a steam pipe under the sidewalk and discharged it so as to cause a pool of hot water to form near the sidewalk. A child four years old fell into it and was scalded. The court in the course of an opinion holding the mill-owner liable for the damages stated that the child was in a lawful place, and that being there, it was not unlawful, wrongful, or negligent for it to play there.

Where an abutting owner had constructed an open area in the sidewalk, into which a child fell while playing on the street, the owner was held liable for the injury, and it was held no defense that the child was at play at the time. McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 308, 43 Am. Rep. 668.

Where a child four years old fell into a tank in the street and was drowned, the court made the question one of negligence. It held that an instruction was properly refused that the city was not liable to provide against an extraordinary occurrence or accident, saying that it cannot be held as matter of law that every time a child four years old steps unattended into the street, the mother is 22 L. R. A.

guilty of such negligence as would authorize the city to expose traps and pitfalls at every corner of the street in which a child may be drowned or maimed. Chicago v. Major, 18 Ill. 360, 68 Am. Dec. 553.

Leaving a ditch five feet deep filled with water near the sidewalk with no barrier between them will render the city liable for the death of a four year old child who wanders into the street and falls into it. Chicago v. Heang, 83 Ill. 204, 26 Am. Rep. 378.

In Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, a city which made an excavation in a shallow stream where it crossed a highway, at a point where children were in the habit of going to play, was held to owe them the duty of so guarding the excavation as to make it safe for them to be there.

In Illinois, on principles of the common law, an action for damages resulting from negligence will lie against a municipal corporation, if the duty to make repairs is fully declared and adequate means are put within the power of the corporation to perform the duty. Therefore the liability is not limited to travelers but extends to all rightfully on the street. And within this rule a child may lawfully be upon the walk for pleasure only. And the expression seemingly to the contrary in Chicago v. Starr, 42 Ill. 177, 39 Am. Dec. 423, is there explained as being on a question of fact and not intended to lay down a proposition of law.

And that rule was followed in Kunkel v. Chicago, 37 Ill. App. 325.

A recovery for injuries caused by a defective street to a child exercising therein was sustained in Brennan v. St. Louis, 92 Mo. 433. H. P. F.

as its property, in lieu of other barrier along and within the boundaries of a public highway. The city has no more right to erect or keep within or along a public highway an unnecessarily dangerous structure, even though it be for some public purpose, than an individual. It is true that the city did not erect this embankment, but, as the witness said, it was placed there by nature, and the city adopted and maintained it as a barrier to prevent travelers from driving into the creek. Had there been an artificial structure so rudely constructed of stone, wood, or iron as to fall of its own weight, and crush this child, the liability of the city would not have been questioned; and it certainly ought to make no difference whether the city builds or adopts one already there, even though nature was the original builder. It was its ministerial duty, neither governmental nor discretionary, to see that it was not dangerous to any one lawfully using the road, or any part thereof. By leaving the embankment there as such barrier, the council fixed the limits of the road, and any one using it had the right to lawfully use it, up to the limit so fixed, whether it was the traveled part of the road or not.

Was the child using the road for a lawful purpose? Children are not responsible for the choice of their parents, nor the place or condition of their birth. God decides these for them when he breathes into them the breath of life. Poor parents are unable to provide a place of healthful exercise and play for their children, but it requires all their earnings to clothe, feed, and shelter them. The law prohibits them, under the penalty of being trespassers, from entering on the lands of others; and now to forbid them to use the road to its utmost boundary for the purpose of play, when not interfering in any manner with the traveling public, would savor too much of the dark ages of barbarism, when children were subjected to inhuman and diabolical punishments, and their lives were at the mercy of those having charge over them. It is the only commons they now have, and to confine them in the narrow limits of their cheerless tenement houses would be cruel, unjust, and oppressive, blight their young lives, and render their bodies weak, sickly, scrofulous, and vile; and, if they could manage to escape the long list of contagious diseases so fatal to their kind, they would grow up to adult age morbidly despising laws so tyrannous and unworthy a civilized and liberty loving people. It is a right they have immemorially enjoyed, and should continue so to do as long as the public fails to provide them other free commons, where they can have the pure air, bright sunshine, and sportive exercise so necessary to the healthful growth of their sensitive bodies. Horses, cattle, hogs, dogs, and other domestic animals, are all at large in the streets, unless prohibited by special ordinance, and why not children? The public highways can be put to no better use. So I am clearly of the opinion the child had the right to be there, even though out of the beaten path, and only for play. Neither was it old enough to realize the danger it was in, or the dangerous condition of the embankment, and could not possibly be guilty of contributory negligence.

The most troublesome question is that of negligence. In all cases where the remedy is not given by statute, but the common law, negligence must be proved by the party alleging it. Where the facts are indisputable, and there can be no fair difference of opinion as to whether the inference of negligence should be drawn, the question becomes one of law alone, and the court may decide it, if appealed to for this purpose. But, even where the facts are not disputed, if there may be a fair difference of opinion as to whether the inference of negligence should be drawn, or as to whether the facts sustain the charge of negligence, the jury are the sole judges, and their verdict cannot be disturbed, although the court may be of the opinion that the facts do not sustain it. The litigants have the constitutional right to a trial by a jury of fair and impartial men under the rules of law. Having demanded and had it, they have no right to complain, and the court has no right to interfere. It is a tribunal of their own choosing. It has been held in cases of this character, "that notice to the corporate authorities, either express or implied, must be shown. If the defect causing the injury had existed for such length of time that proper diligence would have discovered it, then no notice need be proven; but if the defect arise otherwise than from faulty structure, or the direct act of said authorities or other agents, and be a recent defect, it is generally necessary to show that the town authorities had knowledge thereof a sufficient time before the injury to have, by reasonable diligence, repaired it, or that they were diligently ignorant of it." Curry v. Mannington, 28 W. Va. 14.

The embankment was on the side of the road, in a remote part of the city. The authorities had the right to leave it there as a barrier, provided it was not dangerous to the lawful users of the road. There is no evidence tending to show that it was dangerous when left there, but the evidence shows it afterwards became dangerous by reason of the excavations made under it. The street commissioner, when he found that persons were removing the sand and gravel, posted a notice warning them from so doing, not because he regarded it dangerous, but to prevent it from being destroyed as a barrier,—the city's property. After this notice was put up (how long, the evidence does not disclose, nor how long before the accident, except as a mere conjecture) a man by the name of Brown, without the knowledge or permission of the authorities, and against the express notice posted as aforesaid, did further excavating of sand and gravel, and hauled it away, which, presumably, was the excavating that rendered the bank dangerous. It is not shown that the authorities had notice of this last excavating. On the contrary, it appears from the evidence that they had no notice of it. The witness Brown, for some unexplained reason, is not introduced to show when or by what authority he did the excavating. It is true the street commissioner says he passed along there frequently, but it does not appear that he passed there after Brown had done his work, nor does it appear that there was anything to indicate to him that the embankment was in danger of falling; and none of the plaintiff's witnesses testify that they had any knowledge beforehand of the dangerous character of the embankment that produced the injury, and one of his principal witnesses says: "I considered it dangerous from falling on top. I didn't know it would cave down on them." From this evidence the jury certainly had a right to conclude that the structure was not rendered dangerous by the direct act of the city authorities; that they had no notice of its dangerous character a sufficient time before the injury to have, by reasonable diligence, repaired it; and that they were not negligently ignorant of it. While we might have found a different one, we have no right to disturb their verdict. Their decision is supreme and final.

But, even if this did not conclude us, there is another question that would; and that is the jury were taken to view the spot and its surroundings. The counsel deemed it necessary.

What effect this had on the minds of the jury in reaching a conclusion, this court cannot say, but that it was material cannot be doubted. The remoteness of the place, the situation and character of its surroundings, and the nature and condition of the embankment, would obviously all be taken into consideration in making up a verdict. None of these things are before this court; and the settled rule is that this court will not disturb the finding of a jury unless all the material evidence touching the matter at issue that was considered by the jury is before it, as the case, as presented to the two tribunals, would be materially different.

No instructions were asked, and no points of law raised; and, there having been a fair hearing before an impartial jury, this court is legally powerless to interfere, and the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Charles GUSTAFSON, Appl.,

v.

Theodore HAMM, Resp.

1. The city council of St. Paul has no authority, either under Gen. Stat. 1873, chap. 24, § 47, or Special Laws 1880, chap. 37, to grant a license to construct and operate a purely private railroad upon or across public streets. These statutes have reference to railroads which perform the duties of common carriers, and are therefore public or quasi public in their character.

2. As the owner of a lot abutting on a street has, as appurtenant to the lot, and independently of the ownership of the fee of street, an easement in the street, to its full width, in front of his lot, for purposes of access, light, and air, which constitutes property, therefore the maintenance and operation of a railroad on any part of the street in front of his lot so as to pollute the air, and thus depreciate the rental value of the premises, constitutes a positive invasion of property rights, for which the owner may maintain a private action; and where his legal right is clear, and the nuisance or trespass a continuing one, he may maintain an action to enjoin it.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court of Ramsey County which refused part of the relief demanded by plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin the continued operation of a private railroad in a street adjacent to plaintiff's premises. Relief granted.

Defendant has the exclusive use of a part of the public street for his own private purposes. A permission for this is a perversion and not a regulation of the street.

The city assumed to confer unlimited and unconditional authority on a private citizen to erect, maintain, and operate an ordinary commercial steam railroad over a public street and exclusively for his own private advantage. This should not be tolerated.

Messrs. Munn, Boyesen & Thygeson, for respondent:

Plaintiff has not shown that he has suffered special or peculiar damage by reason of the construction of the track in question so as to entitle him to maintain an action to enjoin its use.

A court of equity will not interfere by the extraordinary remedy of a peremptory injunction to correct imaginary or simply technical wrongs, nor will it interfere to correct any wrongs by an injunction where the damages suffered are slight and insignificant, but will leave the complaining party to such action as he may have for damages.

The facts show that plaintiff is not entitled to maintain this action at all for the reason that he does not sustain special damage other and different than that suffered by the public generally.

Granting that the abutting owner has an action for damages, it does not, therefore, follow that he can maintain an equitable action for an injunction against the use of the track after it has been constructed. If damages will compensate the owner that is good reason for denying the injunction. An action in equity cannot be maintained where an action at law will give relief.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relief sought in this action, as finally limited on the trial, was an injunction against defendant's maintaining and operating a railroad track across Fauquier street, in the city of St. Paul, immediately in front of plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff owned a house and lot fronting north on this street, which was the only means of access to the premises. Defendant owned a brewery and mill about two blocks south of plaintiff's premises. The Omaha Railroad was about a block north of plaintiff's premises. Defendant had constructed an ordinary commercial railroad track from the Omaha road to his mill and brewery. This was his private track, and was used to carry in supplies to the mill and brewery, and to carry out their products. The only authority for the maintenance of this track was an ordinance of the city, assuming to grant to defendant the privilege to lay, use, and operate the same across the street. This track strikes the north side of Fauquier street directly opposite the center of plaintiff's lot, and runs thence diagonally across the street in a south-westerly direction, striking the south line of the street fifteen feet west of plaintiff's west line. It crosses the center line of the street in such a way as to occupy a small triangular piece of the south half of the street, of which plaintiff owns the fee. This railroad track is operated with ordinary railroad freight cars and locomotives, there being, on an average, about one train a day, which takes about one minute to cross the street. These trains have been operated with reasonable care, but, when they pass, smoke and cinders are emitted and cast on plaintiff's premises, which, to some extent, pollute the air, and interfere with the enjoyment of the property, and depreciate its rental value. Plaintiff never consented to the construction of the track or the operation of trains upon it. The trial court held that the maintenance and operation of this track on the small triangular piece of the street, of which plaintiff owned the fee, was a continuing trespass, which he was entitled to have enjoined; but the court denied the motion of plaintiff for judgment enjoining the defendant from maintaining the track, or operating trains on and over any part of the street, to its entire width, lying immediately north and in front of plaintiff's premises. The correctness of this ruling, upon the facts stated, is the only question in the case.

1. The city had no right or authority to grant defendant a license to construct and operate a purely private railroad upon or across a public street. The provisions, both of Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 84, § 47, and of Special Laws 1889, chap. 87, must be construed as having reference only to such railroads as perform the duties of public or common carriers, and which are therefore public or quasi public in their character. Even assuming that the legislature has the power to authorize the use of a public street for the purposes of a purely private railroad, it would require very clear and explicit language to that effect to warrant a court in holding that such was the legislative intention. The right to license one necessarily implies the right to license all to use the streets for such private purposes, which would render the streets well nigh impassable by the public, and amount to a perversion of them from their lawful purposes. Hence, if the defendant has the right to maintain and operate this track, he did not acquire it under this ordinance. State v. Trenton, 36 N. J. L. 79; Mikesell v. Durkee, 84 Kan. 509; Heath v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 11; Macon v. Harris, 75 Ga. 761; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 710, note 2.

2. That the construction and operation of any ordinary commercial railroad on a street is the imposition of an additional servitude, and amounts to a perversion of the street to a use for which it was not intended, which the state or municipality cannot, as against private rights, authorize, the decisions of this court are explicit. Carli v. Stillwater Street R. & Transfer Co. 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290; Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493. If this is so as to a public railroad it certainly must be so as to a purely private one. It is merely begging the question to say that defendant, as the owner of the fee of the north half of the street, has the right to use it for any purpose not inconsistent with the public easement. The private right is always subordinate to the public right, and subject to all the limitations and abridgements caused by the exercise of the latter; and hence cannot extend to any use which amounts to a perversion of the street from the uses for which it was intended. The right of an abutting owner, under certain municipal regulations, to use a part of the street for areas, for purposes of access to basements, for the temporary storage of building material, for laying underground pipes to connect with water and gas mains, stands on a different principle. These are all really included in the general right to use a street for purposes of access to the abutting premises, and have been long sanctioned as legitimate street uses. It is not necessary to consider here just what is the precise limit to the uses to which an abutting owner may put a street for purposes of access to his premises. It is at least certain that he cannot use the street in any way or for any purpose that amounts to a perversion of it, or to an invasion upon the private right of property of another in the part of the street so used; and this is as far as it is necessary to go for present purposes.

It is the settled doctrine of this court that the owner of a lot abutting on a public street has, as appurtenant to the lot, and independently of the ownership of the fee in the street, an easement in the street, to its full width, in front of his lot, for the purposes of access, light, and air, which constitutes property. Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493; Lamm v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 71, 10 L. R. A. 268. The act of defendant in maintaining and operating this track on any part of the street, to its full width, in front of plaintiff's premises, so as to pollute the air, and depreciate their value, was, if not a trespass, at least a nuisance, which amounted to a positive invasion upon plaintiff's private property rights, and for which he may maintain a private action. The legal right being clear, and the trespass or nuisance, whichever it be, being a continuing one, he is not confined to successive actions for damages, but may maintain an action to enjoin the constantly recurring grievance; and, where a clear legal right is thus violated, the fact that the actual damages, if substantial, are comparatively small, is not important.

Cause remanded with directions to the court below to amend the judgment, in accordance with plaintiff's request.

Canty, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The majority of the court decide the case mainly on the authority of Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493, and on the principle there laid down as follows: "The conclusions arrived at are that the owner of a lot abutting on the street has, independent of his fee in the street as appurtenant to his lot, an easement in the street in front of his lot to the full width of the street, for admission of light and air to his lot, which easement is subordinate only to the public right." The court added to this an easement for access, and this case was approved in the case of Lamm v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 45 Minn. 71, 10 L. R. A. 268. I am willing to go even further than the court did in those cases in sustaining the rights of the abutting owner to an easement in the whole width of the street, but still I think that those cases do not apply to or control this case. The principle there laid down is mainly on the authority of the Elevated Railway Cases. Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146, and Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268. That principle was not there applied to an ordinary commercial railway at all, but to a mere street railway, which was not of itself an additional servitude on the street, but the permanent structures built to support it were. It was there conceded by the court that if it had been a surface road it would not be an additional servitude, though operated by steam. In the Story Case the road was to be constructed upon a series of columns set in the outer edge of the sidewalk, on each side, carrying great girders for the support of cross-ties for three sets of rails, fifteen feet above the street. The structure divided the street into a sort of basement, used by the general public and abutting owners, and a first floor, used exclusively by the railroad company. The court compared the structure to the illegal erection in the street of the house in the case in 6 Johns. Ch. 489, 2 L. ed. 178 (Corning v. Lowerre), and of the freight depot in 94 U. S. 824, 24 L. ed. 224 (Barney v. Keokuk). In the Lahr Case the elevated road was similar. It is not, in these cases, claimed that the generating of gas, steam, and smoke, and the distribution of cinders, dust, and ashes by a street railway is necessarily an additional servitude on the street, except as it is aggravated by the height from which it is thus distributed and thrown down upon the street. A street railway is not an additional servitude, though operated by steam (Newell v. Minneapolis, L. & M. R. Co. 85 Minn. 112, 59 Am. Rep. 808); while an ordinary commercial railway is, though run by horse power. Carli v. Stillwater Street R. & Transfer Co. 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290. Yet the former will deprive the abutting owner of much more light and air than the latter. It is lawful to move a house on the street (Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 262, 69 Am. Dec. 536), though it deprives the owner of much more light and air than any railroad train. Unless prohibited by some statute or ordinance, it is held that it is not unlawful to run a traction steam engine on a public highway. Macomber v. Nichols, 34 Mich. 212, 23 Am. Rep. 522. What is an additional servitude does not at all depend on the amount of space it necessarily occupies, or the amount of light and air it necessarily excludes, in passing along the street. The street belongs to the local public. In a city, that would include perhaps all the adjacent country tributary to the city by the ordinary highways, and, if the railroad is "in aid of the street," does not destroy its ordinary and usual uses, and does not collect and converge on one street the traffic from any other or greater territory, it is not an additional servitude, no matter how much light and air it necessarily excludes by its moving appliances. If a railroad is not "in aid of the street," or collects and converges on the street traffic from any greater territory, it is an additional servitude, no matter how little light and air it excludes. I think the abutting owner should have the same right to object to an additional servitude on the opposite side of the street as on his own side, without regard to any mere question of light, air, or access. The old theory that the abutting owner could only object to such additional servitude when it encroached on his fee in the street was found to be too narrow, too easily evaded, and no protection to his real rights in the street. Neither do I think that the theory of an easement in the opposite half of the street for light, air, and access merely is a proper test of his rights. When the abutting owner dedicates his own half of the street, it is consideration that the owner opposite and the owners on each side of him will do likewise, and it should be held on broad principles that he has, appurtenant to his premises, an easement in the street, not only to the whole width thereof, but also, at least, immediately on each side of his premises. When his land is taken for a street by condemnation proceedings, the same easement is created for him, and the benefit of it to him taken into consideration in assessing his damages. In my opinion, this easement exists not only for the 23 L. R. A.

purposes of light, air, and access, but also for all purposes that are beneficial to his premises, and not inconsistent with the rights of the public and the private rights of the other abutting owners in the street, and cannot be taken from or interfered with by any additional servitude in the street.

But the right of a railroad to cross the street is a very different question. No one has a right to draw a line on the face of the earth, and, as if it were a Chinese wall, prohibit intercourse across it, whether that intercourse be by railroad or otherwise. Now, suppose that the side track of an ordinary commercial railroad is laid in the street, on the abutting owner's side, up to the line of his fee, and there terminates, would he not have just as much right to object as if it were laid in front of his premises on the opposite side of the street? I think he would. But supposing, on the other hand, that a railroad crossed the street at the same point, running close to, but not encroaching on, his fee in the street, would he have a right to object? Certainly not, unless his access to the street was completely cut off, and not merely interfered with. See the Adams Case, page 288, 39 Minn., and page 494, 1 L. R. A., and cases there cited. He would be in the same condition, and subject to the same annoyances, as any other man whose land adjoined that of his neighbors, which had been taken for railroad purposes. Neither does it make any difference whether the railroad crosses at right angles to the line of the street or in a slightly oblique direction. Natural obstacles and other causes often make it necessary to cross in a slightly oblique direction. The abutting owner has no greater rights in the street immediately in front of his fee therein than he has immediately by the side of his fee therein, and the railroad may take either or both in so crossing the street, if it does not encroach on that fee. The sole and exclusive owner of one avenue of public traffic has no vested right that another shall not cross his. That his rights are prior is immaterial. When a highway or a new railroad is laid out across the tracks of an old one, the damages for the cross easement to be awarded to the owner of such old railroad are not assessed on the same principles as are applied in favor of the owner of the fee. In determining the compensation to be paid for such cross easement it is generally held that the value of the land in the cross section covered by such cross easement, and the cost of restoring the crossing, are substantially all that should be considered. The damages to the rest of the track or right of way of the old railroad, whether immediately adjacent to such cross easement or more remote, are not considered; neither are the interruptions or inconveniences occasioned to the old company's business, or any other elements of collateral or consequential damage. Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 489, 491. Then, if the right of the defendant to lay his private track across the street is to be measured by the right to lay the track of an ordinary commercial railroad in the same place, without paying damages to plaintiff, I think that defendant's right must be sustained, notwithstanding the Adams Case and the Lamm Case. But it seems to me, whether we look at it as a question of what are the rights of the public in the street as against abutting owners, or a question of what are the rights derived through the public, or acquired in connection with it, of one abutting owner as against the other, the judgment of the court below should be sustained. The court below found that defendant is the owner of all the land or the fee of all of the land over which the track passes, except the two or three feet of the corner of plaintiff's fee in the street from which he orders the track removed. Then, what are the private rights of an abutting owner in his own fee in the street? "By the location of a way over the land of any person the public have acquired an easement which the owner may not lawfully extinguish, or unreasonably interrupt; but the soil remains in the owner, although incumbered with a way. And every use to which the land may be applied, and all profits which may be derived from it consistently with the continuance of the easement, the owner can lawfully claim." Perley v. Chandler, 6 Mass. 456. This principle is elementary, and too well established to need the citation of authorities. The question to be particularly discussed is, what are the limits of the private uses to which the owner may apply it? The same case further states: "Upon these principles, there can be no doubt but that the owner of the land can sink a drain or any watercourse below the surface of his land, covered with a way so as not to deprive the public of their easement; and a common practice for the owners of water mills or of sites for water mills is to sink watercourses for the use of their mills in their own land under highways, care being taken to cover the watercourses sufficiently so that the highways remain safe and convenient for passengers." Page 457. "If a highway be located over a watercourse, either natural or artificial, the public cannot shut up these courses, but may make the road over them by the aid of bridges. But when a way has been located over private lands, if the owner should afterwards open a watercourse across the way, it will be his duty at his own expense to make and keep in repair a way over the watercourse for the convenience of the public." Page 458. The owner of land adjoining a highway may place building material on it for the purposes of erecting a building. Palmer v. Slocerthorn, 32 Pa. 65. It was held in Chamberlain v. Infield, 48 N. H. 356, that in such a case a pile of lumber on the side of the highway, 75 feet long, from 6 to 11 feet wide, and from 4 to 6 feet high, as testified to by different witnesses, was not necessarily unlawful.

It is hardly necessary to multiply illustrations of such private uses of the street by the abutting owner. It seems to me that the principle involved in these cases warrant the conclusion that this private right of access to and from the street, and across the street from one part of the abutting owner's premises to the other, is not necessarily unlawful or necessarily a nuisance per se though carried on by means of a railroad track, cars, and steam engine. When such private right of access exists, the fact that it is exercised by means of improved appliances does not necessarily make it unlawful.

As I have tried to show, the principal test of what is an additional servitude on the street is not that the traffic is carried on by such improved appliances, but it is the volume of traffic collected and converged on the street, and that such traffic comes from territory which could not be tributary to such street by any system of ordinary highways, however laid out and improved. The principle can be used to illustrate this case. It appears that nothing is carried on this track but what would be ordinarily carried in wagons over the same route, for the same purposes, if the track was not there. Such private switch tracks are a very common means of access to mills, foundaries, machine works, breweries, and other manufacturing establishments; and to hold that they cannot be laid across a street is a serious matter, and will leave the proprietors of such establishments without remedy, as it is generally held that no right of way can be condemned for such private purposes. The right to use such improved appliances for private access does not depend upon any ordinance. It is a right which undoubtedly the city council can regulate and limit to a very considerable extent, but cannot create.

Neither do I question the fact that the circumstances may be such that maintaining and operating such a private track would be a nuisance. I simply claim that it is not a nuisance per se, and that the facts found in this case do not prove it to be a nuisance. If it were maintained in a thickly settled or highly improved residence or retail portion of the city, it would be; but if in a wholesale or manufacturing district, it might not be. It would be a question of fact to be decided in each case. In this case it does not appear what kind of a district this is. Nothing appears as to the character of the locality, except that defendant has buildings and improvements and a mill and brewery the width of one street and 185 feet from the rear of plaintiff's lot, and that there is a dwelling house on plaintiff's lot. It nowhere appears that there are any other buildings or improvements in the vicinity. Thus, for the purposes of this case, we must hold that there are no other improvements anywhere in the vicinity. True, it is found that "the operating of trains over said track somewhat depreciates the value of plaintiff's property, and lessens the rental value thereof;" but that is not sufficient. 1 Wood, Nuisance, 8d ed. § 2.

I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina, ex rel. RAIL-ROAD COMMISSION,

v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,
Appl.

(..... N. C.)

1. The power of railroad commissioners to make rates for telegraph lines includes the power to ascertain what corporation is in the control of such a line.
2. Telegraph messages between points in the same state do not constitute interstate commerce, because of the fact that they traverse another state on the route.
3. The authority of railroad commissioners in North Carolina to regulate telegraph rates does not include the power to direct offices to be opened for commercial business.

(November 21, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County affirming an order of the railroad commission fixing the rate to be charged by defendant for sending telegraph messages, and directing it to keep certain offices open for commercial telegrams. Modified and affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Strong & Strong and Robert Styles for appellant.

Mr. Robert O. Burton, for appellee:

Defendant having built a line and equipped an office at Elizabeth City, with an agent ready to receive commercial messages, it has no power to discriminate.

To give the railroad the service of its line and refuse it to an individual, is a discrimination against the individual. The common-law principles against discrimination apply as well to new agencies of commerce as to old.

In the absence of legislation providing other means for regulating and controlling a railroad, a court of general jurisdiction has the power to compel it to extend to the public proper facilities for the transaction of business, including the establishment of stations.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The board of railroad commissioners is "authorized and required to make or cause to be made just and reasonable rates of charges for the transmission of messages by any telegraph line or lines doing business in the state." Laws 1891, chap. 320, § 26. It may cause notice to be served upon corporations or persons charged with a violation of the rules prescribed by it in pursuance of the above authority, and upon a hearing may ascertain and direct ample and full recompense to be made by the company, corporation, or person offending; which recompense may be enforced by civil action as prescribed in section 10 of said Act. Mayo v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 112 N. C. 343. It is a court of record, with "the powers and jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction" as to all subjects embraced in said act by Laws 1891, chap. 498. Atlantic Exp. Co. v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 111 N. C. 463, 18 L. R. A. 393, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 294; N. C. Const. art. 4, § 2.

The defendant, being served with process, appeared before this court to answer the complaint or petition of Eugene Albea, called plaintiff herein, and filed its answer. Thereupon, a trial was had, and it appearing that the said Albea had tendered no commercial message to any of the offices of the defendant, it was adjudged that he had no cause of complaint, and the proceeding was practically dismissed as to him. The commission, however, having the defendant before it, proceeded, under its general powers, to make rates of charges for the transmission of business by the defendant from and to points in North Carolina, which rate of charges is the same as that applicable to all the offices of the defendant within the limits of the state. The commission, after having disposed of the complaint of Albea, should have amended the proceeding so as to substitute as complainant the state of North Carolina ex rel. the railroad commission; but, as it has been fully heard without reference to this irregularity, we have ordered that the amendment be now made, and the proceeding be entitled accordingly. Code, § 273; Reynolds v. Smathers, 87 N. C. 24.

The order of the board which is the subject of review is as follows: "That the telegraph offices at Edenton and Elizabeth City, and at other points on the Norfolk & Southern Railroad in North Carolina, are offices of defendant, and that said offices shall transmit commercial messages at rates prescribed by the commission to any point in North Carolina." This order is based upon certain findings of fact, some of which are excepted to; but inasmuch as it was agreed that his honor might pass upon these questions in the place of a jury, and as there was evidence sufficient to warrant such findings as, under the view we have taken are material to be considered, they cannot be reviewed in this court. Battle v. Mayo, 102 N. C. 413; Southern Fertilizer Co. v. Reams, 105 N. C. 283.

It appears, in the language of his honor, "that the defendant owns, controls, and operates a line of telegraph from Edenton, N. C., passing through Elizabeth City, N. C., Hertford, Moyock, N. C., and other places along the track of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad to Berkley and Norfolk, Va.; . . . that the company receives and transmits over this line (commercial) messages at the towns and villages of Hertford, Moyock, and other places along said line to any place in North Carolina where it has an office, at the uniform rate of twenty-five cents per message of ten words, except at Edenton and Elizabeth City," at which two last-named offices the defendant receives no commercial business; the said offices being devoted exclusively to the business of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company, in respect to the running of its trains, etc. It is very clear to us that, under the authority given it to make rates for "the transmission of messages by any telegraph line or lines doing business in the state," the commission—subject, of course, to the right of appeal—has the incidental power of ascertaining what particular corporation is at least in the control or operation of the same. This would seem indispensably necessary to a proper exercise of its authority to fix rates, as well as to know against whom to proceed, under section 10 of the Act, in the event of a violation of such regulation.

The exception, therefore, in this respect, must be overruled.

A more serious question, however, is presented by the ruling of the court upon the third conclusion of the commission, which is as follows: "That telegraphic messages transmitted by defendant over its said line from Elizabeth City or Edenton, or other points in North Carolina, to points in said state, do not constitute commerce between states, although traversing another state in the route, and are subject to the rate prescribed by the commission." It appears from the findings of fact that the shortest and only route over the wire of the defendant, by which messages can be transmitted to many points in this state, necessarily "traverses, in part, the state of Virginia, and thence back into North Carolina;" and it is insisted that such messages so transmitted are interstate commerce, and therefore not subject to the tariff regulation of the commission. It is not denied that the offices of the defendant along the line of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company, except those at Edenton and Elizabeth City, receive commercial messages for transmission, in the manner described, to various points in North Carolina; and it is plain that such business does not relate to the intercourse of the citizens of this state with those of some other state. It is purely an intercourse between the citizens of North Carolina, through the means afforded by a corporation having extensive facilities of communication within the limits of the said state; and the uniform rates fixed by the commission for the business which the said corporation accepts, or is under legal obligation to accept, in no wise affect or interfere with any business which the defendant undertakes for the citizens of Virginia, either between themselves, or with the citizens of other states. Neither are we able to see how the mere fixing of rates between different points in this state can in any way conflict with any regulation which the state of Virginia may have the power to impose in respect to its domestic business. It must be manifest, therefore, that this business is without a single feature of interstate commerce, unless it can be found in the fact that, in the transmission of a message, it must traverse a part of the defendant's own line in the state of Virginia. We have been referred to several cases in which it has been held, in respect to the continuous carriage of freight by a railroad company under such circumstances, that a state commission had no power to prescribe rates, and also that a state had no right to levy a tax upon the gross receipts, even as to that part derived from the transportation within its territory. State v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 40 Minn. 267, 3 L. R. A. 238, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 519; Sternberger v. Cupe Fear & Y. V. R. Co. 29 S. C. 510, 2 L. R. A. 105, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 426; New Orleans Cotton Exch. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 289.

Without attempting to discuss these cases, and to distinguish them in some particulars from ours, it is sufficient to say that, if they are not distinctly overruled, their principle is certainly in conflict with the reasoning of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States (Fuller, Ch. J.) in Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 38 L. ed. 672. The state of Pennsylvania levied a tax on the gross receipts of all railroad companies, derived from the transportation by continuous carriage from points in Pennsylvania to other points in the same state; that is to say, passing out of Pennsylvania into other states, and back again into Pennsylvania, in the course of transportation. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company has no road of its own from Mauch Chunk, Pa., to Philadelphia, but in transporting its coal and general freight traffic, it uses its own line from Mauch Chunk to Phillipsburg, N. J., from which point it is, under an arrangement for a continuous passage with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, transported by the latter road, via Trenton, to Philadelphia. It was insisted that the state could not tax that part of the gross receipts derived from so much of the transportation as was wholly within the state of Pennsylvania, because the freight, during its entire transportation, was impressed with the character of interstate commerce. The court sustained the tax, and, although it may be said that the decision relates only to that part of the receipts which arose from the transportation within the state, yet it must be apparent, from a perusal of the opinion, that this conclusion was reached on the ground that such continuous transportation was not interstate commerce. Indeed, the entire course of the reasoning of the court is in support of this very principle, and is clearly applicable to the question involved in this appeal. The language of the court is plain and emphatic, and we do not feel at liberty to ignore it, and especially when it is applied to telegraphic communication, under the peculiar circumstances of this case. The court, in speaking of the grant of power to regulate commerce between the states, remarked: "But, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall, the words of the grant do not embrace that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a state, or between different parts of the same state, and which does not extend to nor affect other states. 'Commerce,' observed the chief justice, 'undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse.'" The court further proceeded to say: "The point of departure and the point of arrival were alike in Pennsylvania. The intercourse was between those points, and not between any other points. Is such intercourse, consisting of continuous transportation between two points in the same state, made interstate because, in its accomplishment, some portion of another state may be traversed? Is the transmission of freight or messages between two places in the same state made interstate business by the deviation of the railroad or telegraph line onto the soil of another state?" Again, in another part of the opinion it is said: "It is simply whether, in the carriage of freight and passengers between two points in the same state, the mere passage over the soil of another state renders that business foreign which is domestic. We do not think such a view can be reasonably entertained, and are of the opinion that this taxation is not open to constitutional objection by reason of the particular way in which Philadelphia was reached from Mauch Chunk." The court uses the words "continuous passage," from which it is to be inferred that if, after the freight passed beyond Pennsylvania, it was transferred to another transportation agency in New Jersey, and by this other agency carried to Philadelphia, it would be interstate commerce; and the same, if consigned to a point in New Jersey, and then reloaded to Philadelphia. It is in evidence that the defendant owns and operates a continuous wire, or system of wires, from the offices mentioned to other points in North Carolina, and therefore it is not compelled to transfer its business to any other agency outside of North Carolina, in order that it may reach its destination in this state. In this respect, our case is stronger than the one from Pennsylvania, as the road from Phillipsburg to Philadelphia was owned and operated by another corporation, and not by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. We refrain from entering into an extended discussion of the subject, and are content to follow the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose authority upon such questions is conclusive. We will observe, however, that we think the principle laid down by that court is peculiarly adaptable to cases like the present, in which there is such an exceptional facility for the evasion of state authority to fix the rate of charges. This may be done in an instant, and without expense, by so adjusting the wires that messages must go through a part of the territory of another state. We think the exception should be overruled.

The remaining exception which it is necessary to consider relates to that part of the order which substantially commands the defendant to open its offices at Edenton and Elizabeth City for the transmission of commercial messages. It is urged, but not very seriously pressed, that the order only means that the company shall transmit such messages at the prescribed rates whenever it undertakes to do that character of business at those points. The order of the court is not, in our opinion, susceptible of such a construction; but whatever doubt there may be must surely vanish when it is considered in connection with the finding of the commission upon which it is based, and which the court, in its judgment, approves and adopts. This finding is that the operators in said offices "are the agents and operators of the defendant, and that it is their duty to transmit commercial messages, when tendered to them, to points in North Carolina, at the rate prescribed by the commission." It is impossible, without violating all rules of interpretation, as well as destroying the plain import of language, to adopt the view contended for; and it is therefore necessary to determine whether the commission act conferred upon the commission the authority to direct that the said offices should be open for commercial business. That it has no such authority is settled by the court in Mayo v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, (decided since the trial of this proceeding,) in which it is declared that "there is nothing to show the intent of the statute to give to the commission power to prescribe other rules and regulations for telegraph lines than those directed in section 26 with regard to their charges for the transmission of messages, as neither of the other sections could be made to apply to telegraph, even if the same had been specifically named." Under this decision, so much of the order as is open to the objection referred to must be set aside, but in all other respects it is affirmed. Let it not be understood that we are deciding that a corporation like the defendant, exercising its franchise, the right of eminent domain, and other unusual privileges, under a grant from the state for the benefit of the public, can give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, or corporation. This question may be presented when commercial messages have been tendered and declined at the said offices, but we think it would be going outside of the record to pass upon it now; and especially should we refrain from doing so when the intelligent counsel who appeared for the defendant very properly concluded that the court would not anticipate a point of such importance, and therefore did not deem it necessary to discuss it.

The order of the court is modified and affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Lawrence C. ENEWOLD, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Lewis Ferdinand OLSEN.

(.....Neb.)

*1. In law, the name of a person consists of one given name and one surname, the two, using the given name first and the surname last constitute such person's legal name; and to be ignorant of either the given or surname of such a one is to be ignorant of such person's name, within the meaning of section 148 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. The law requires that a defendant shall be sued by his true name if the same is known or can be ascertained by the party suing him; and under section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure a court obtains no jurisdiction over the person of a defendant served with summons by leaving a copy thereof at his usual place of residence, unless such defendant is designated by his true name, except in cases brought under section 28 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

3. Under section 148 of the Code of Civil Procedure if a defendant is sued by any name and description other than his true name, except in actions brought under section 28 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a court acquires no jurisdiction over him by the sheriff leaving a copy of the summons at such defendant's usual place of residence. Accordingly, where E. sued "F. Olsen, (full name unknown)," the sheriff returned that he served the summons on "F. Olsen, (full name unknown)," by leaving a copy thereof at his usual place of residence. The court defaulted "F. Olsen, (full name unknown)" and rendered a personal judgment against him. In proceedings by E. against Ferdinand Olsen to show cause why judgment (the same having become dormant) should not be revived against him.—Held, that the court acquired no jurisdiction over Ferdinand Olsen by a copy of the summons left at his usual place of residence, and that the judgment rendered against him in the name of "F. Olsen, (full name unknown)," was a nullity.

4. A person summoned to show cause why a dormant judgment should not be revived against him may interpose the defense that such judgment is void, because the court pronouncing it had no jurisdiction over him, when such lack of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record of such judgment.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a proceeding to revive a prior judgment which was alleged to have been recovered against defendant. Affirmed.

Goodenow v. Tappan, 1 Ohio, 63.

In Nelson v. Highland, 18 Cal. 75, the court says: "We do not think it was a good ground of demurrer that the Christian name of one of the plaintiffs does not appear in the record. We cannot judicially know that one of the plaintiffs had either a Christian or a heathen name, or that it is necessarily untrue that he has forgotten it if he had. Judgment reversed and cause remanded."

Bliss on Code Pleading, § 146a, says: "The code does not dispense with the rule which requires the pleader to give the true name, and whether an apparently initial letter will be treated as itself a name must depend upon the manner in which the question is raised. In the absence of anything in the record, or in the pleading or motion to the contrary, the court will be warranted in so treating it. The party who objects to the pleading must do so for misnomer and give the true name."

Section 28, Code of Civil Procedure, provides absolutely for the proper proceeding in suing upon instruments where party has signed himself or herself in a particular style, and then as by reference to another section concludes: "Instead of stating the Christian or first name or names in full," but it does not say that suits cannot be commenced by the initial letter of the Christian name in other cases.

Where names are spelled differently but substantially alike in sound, it will not vitiate the proceeding. Thus Mars is idem sonans with Marres.

Section 148 refers to cases where the identity and full Christian and surname of a defendant is not within the knowledge of the plaintiff and has references to, and was passed for the purpose of reaching a different class of cases than the one at bar.

Rosenoranta v. Rogers, 40 Cal. 491.

Mr. C. P. Halligan, for defendant in error:

A name as defined in Bouvier's Law Dic- tionary is one or more words to distinguish a particular individual.

By the common law since the time of William the Norman, a full name consists of one Christian or given name, and one surname or patronymic, the two, using the Christian name first and the surname last, constitute the legal name of the person.

Schofield v. Jennings, 68 Ind. 233.

Even though the defendant had knowledge of the pendency of suit before rendition of judgment, that alone will not cure a defective service. If it did our courts would be open to fraud and the prerequisites now indispensable to the rendition of a valid judgment would be dispensed with. Where a summons against an individual is served by leaving a certified copy at his usual place of business the court acquires no jurisdiction.

Aultman & Taylor Co. v. Steinan. 8 Neb. 113.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

On the 23d day of December, 1886, Lawrence C. Enewold brought suit on an account in the county court of Douglas county against one Olsen. In the petition filed, Olsen was described as "F. Olsen (full name unknown)." The sheriff's return of the summons in the case was as follows: "On December 23, 1886, I received this writ, and on December 23, 1886, I served, by leaving a certified copy of this writ, and indorsements thereon, at the usual place of residence of the within-named F. Olsen, the defendant, in Douglas county, Nebraska." The further proceedings of the county court in the case were as follows: "January 4, 1887, on the call of the docket, this day, it appearing to the court that the defendant, F. Olsen, has been served with a summons, and has failed to appear, plead, answer, or demur thereto, and is in default: Now, therefore, on motion of plaintiff's attorney, it is ordered that default of the defendant be, and the same is hereby, entered against him." The same day the case came on for trial to the court, L. C. Enewold, the plaintiff, was duly sworn and examined in his own behalf. After hearing the evidence, the court finds that said defendant, F. Olsen (real full name unknown), is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $433.89. It is further considered, adjudged, etc. February 11, 1892, Lawrence C. Enewold filed in said county court a petition against Ferdinand Olsen, praying for a revival of said judgment. On said day the county court made an order that said judgment be revived, unless Ferdinand Olsen should show cause why it should not be. On February 19, 1892, a copy of this order was duly served on Ferdinand Olsen, and he appeared in the county court, and objected to a revival of said judgment, on the ground that the same was void, as he (Olsen) was named in the summons "F. Olsen (full name unknown);" that the court could only acquire jurisdiction over him by the personal service of summons; and that the leaving a copy of the summons at his usual place of residence was not such service upon him as invested the court with jurisdiction over his person. The county court sustained the objection, and dismissed the application to revive the judgment. Enewold took this order to the district court, where the ruling of the county court was affirmed; and Enewold brings the judgment of the district court here for review.

Section 69 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The service [of summons] shall be by delivering a copy of the summons to the defendant personally, or by leaving one at his usual place of residence, at any time before the return day." Section 148 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "When the plaintiff shall be ignorant of the name of a defendant, such defendant may be designated in any pleading or proceeding by any name and description, and when his true name is discovered, the pleading or proceeding may be amended accordingly. The plaintiff in such case must state, in the verification of his petition, that he could not discover the true name and the summons must contain the words: 'real name unknown,' and a copy thereof must be served personally upon the defendant." The law requires that a defendant shall be sued by his correct name if known to the plaintiff suing him, and this section 69 defines what shall be sufficient notice to him when thus sued. But cases may and do arise where the correct name of a party about to be sued is unknown to the plaintiff desiring to bring the action. To meet such cases, this section 148 was enacted, by which the party sued may be designated by any name and description; but, to authorize the suing of a party by a name and description,—i. e. by any other than his correct name,—the statute not only requires that the plaintiff should be ignorant of the correct name of the party against whom he desires the law's process under a pseudonym, but to make oath that he has not been able to discover the party's true name. These prerequisites complied with, the plaintiff may proceed against the party by whatever name and description he chooses, but the summons of such case must contain the words "real name unknown," and be personally served on the defendant sued, except in cases brought under section 28 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The law presumes that a party will see a summons left at his usual place of residence; and if, in such summons, he is notified by his true name that he has been sued, he must appear and make a defense, if he has one; and, if he fails to appear in obedience to the writ's command, he thereby confesses his liability and want of defense to the action, and is concluded by the judgment. But the law does not require Ferdinand Olsen, should he find on his doorstep a summons directed to "F. Olsen," to know that such summons was meant for him. In such a case, to require Ferdinand Olsen to appear in obedience to the command of such summons, or be concluded by the judgment, the summons must be delivered to him personally. Ferdinand Olsen may suspect such summons was intended for him,—may even know it; yet, until a copy of it is personally served on him, he is not notified of a suit against him.

The inquiries here are: What, within the meaning of this section 148, constitutes a person's true name? And, if Enewold was ignorant that Olsen's given name was "Ferdinand," was Enewold then ignorant of Olsen's true name, within the meaning of said section 148? In Schofield v. Jennings, 68 Ind. 233, it is said: "By the common law, since the time of William the Norman, the full name consists of one Christian or given name, and one surname or patronymic. The two, using the Christian name first, and the surname last, constitute the legal name of the person." It follows, then, that a person's legal name is made up of his first or given name and his surname or patronymic, and for one to be ignorant of either is to be ignorant of such person's name, within the meaning of said section 148; and that in order to invest the county court with jurisdiction over Ferdinand Olsen, in the suit brought by Enewold against him under the name of "F. Olsen (full name unknown)," the summons in which Ferdinand Olsen was so designated must have been personally served on him. This not having been done, the judgment rendered by the county court, and which it is here sought to revive, was void. That such summons was left at Ferdinand Olsen's usual place of residence, and that he was aware of it, count for nothing. It might as well have been retained by the sheriff, and Olsen notified by mail of its existence. A personal judgment rendered against a defendant without notice to him, or an appearance by him, is without jurisdiction, and is utterly and entirely void. Black, Judgm. § 230. A statute which allows one party to take a personal judgment against another, on proof that notice of suit was left at the defendant's usual place of residence, ought not to be extended to cases where the party is sued by any other than his true name.

In this proceeding—one to revive a dormant judgment—Olsen is called on to show cause why the judgment should not be revived, and he alleges, as a reason why this should not be done, that such judgment is void, and that this appears from the record itself. Can Olsen be heard to make this objection in this proceeding? We think he can. In Wright v. Sweet, 10 Neb. 190, it is said: "Upon proceedings to revive a judgment which has become dormant, . . . no objection will be heard which seeks to go behind the original judgment." But this case does not decide, nor was it intended to decide, that a person against whom it was sought to revive a judgment might not make the objection that such judgment was void,—that is to say, that there was no such judgment,—and that such fact appeared on the face of the record. Suppose that Olsen had disregarded the notice served on him to show cause why this judgment should not be revived; the conditional order of revivor then would have become absolute, and there are authorities which hold that such order of revivor would estop Olsen from claiming that the original judgment was void, the proceeding to revive being in the nature of a suit on the judgment and the order of revivor itself, a judgment that the judgment revived was valid and in full force. Comparet v. Hanna, 34 Ind. 74; Kelly v. Donlin, 70 Ill. 378; Van Fleet, Colateral Attack, § 236, and cases there cited. This point is not necessary, however to the decision of the case under consideration. It is not raised by counsel in their briefs, and we do not determine it. Nor must we be understood as deciding that a judgment is void because the defendant is sued or summoned or described in the judgment rendered against him by a fictitious name, or because he is designated by an initial letter of his given name. What we do decide is that the judgment rendered by the county court in the case of Enewold v. "F. Olsen" (full name unknown)," was void, as a judgment against Ferdinand Olsen, because the summons in the case was not personally served on him.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

certain place can arise only from such appearances or circumstances as would lead ordinarily prudent and intelligent persons to understand that the crossing was public.

(November 29, 1893.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Rice, King & Rice, for plaintiff:
The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury find that Dodge's way of crossing (so called) was a 'travel way,' over which people were accustomed to drive, and against which custom or practice the defendant had made no objection, then the persons in the carriage described in this case were not guilty of trespass in traveling upon said lane, and attempting to cross over defendant's railroad at the said crossing. In such case the defendant is under obligation to use reasonable care to protect persons crossing the railroad."

See also 23 L. R. A. 203, 715; 24 L. R. A. 531; 30

In support of that ruling, see —

Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, 98 Mass. 577, 96 Am. Dec. 685; Swift v. Staten Island Rapid Transit Co. 128 N. Y. 645; Schindler v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 87 Mich. 400; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Carper, 88 Va. 558; Hooker v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 76 Wis. 542; Davis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 58 Wis. 646, 46 Am. Rep. 687; Clampitt v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 84 Iowa, 71; Campbell v. Boyd, 88 N. C. 129, 43 Am. Rep. 740; Barrett v. Midland R. Co. 1 Fost. & F. 361.

It was an error to impress upon the minds of the jury that the care, judgment, and prudence of the plaintiff in determining whether as one of the public she was invited to pass over the crossing, must necessarily be the judgment of an ordinarily intelligent and prudent man. The plaintiff should not be called upon to exercise more than the judgment of an ordinarily intelligent and prudent woman.

Whether the care, judgment, intelligence, and prudence of the plaintiff regarded as an ordinarily prudent and intelligent woman would be equal to that exercised by an ordinarily prudent and intelligent man in any particular case, could not be stated as matter of law.

This is akin to the principle on which the degree of care exercised by children is held not equal to that exercised by adults.

Messrs. W. S. B. Hopkins and Frank B. Smith for defendant.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for running down the plaintiff at a point on the defendant's track where it is crossed by a private way along which she was traveling. The plaintiff asked for an instruction to the effect that if people were in the habit of using the crossing, and the defendant had made no objection, the plaintiff was not a trespasser, and the defendant was bound to use reasonable care to protect her. The judge refused this, but instructed the jury in substance that if, taking the whole condition of things into account,—the physical condition of the crossing, the width of it, the extent to which it was traveled, etc.,—a reasonably intelligent and prudent man would have understood that the defendant by implication declared that the crossing was public, and that he as a member of the public might pass over it, the defendant was bound to do what was reasonable and necessary to do in order to protect an ordinarily intelligent and prudent man who was rightfully there. The plaintiff excepted to the refusal to rule as requested, and excepted in a general way at the end of the charge.

The general exception to the charge adds nothing to the exception to the refusal to rule as requested, except, perhaps, to make explicit an implied exception to rulings inconsistent with the one requested; and it seems doubtful whether the refusal of the plaintiff's request was understood at the time to be more than a refusal to adopt the precise form of words, or to indicate a difference of view upon the criteria of liability. However, there is a difference between the two rules as stated, although no attention was drawn to it.

The ruling asked for lays it down as matter of law that if people are accustomed to cross a railroad track at a certain place, and the company makes no objection, this imports a license from the company, and that such a license imposes a duty to use reasonable care to protect the crossers. But, even if we are to assume the use of the crossing to be with knowledge of the company, it seems a strong thing to say that the very state of facts which, if continued twenty years, would create a right of way, on the presumption that the user was adverse, that is, without a license; Johanson v. Boston & M. R. Co., 153 Mass. 57, 59, shall be presumed, up to the very last moment of the twenty years, to have been with license. We are aware that language has been used in other states which seems to sanction the plaintiff's proposition, Barry v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 289, 292, 44 Am. Rep. 377; Swift v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. 128 N. Y. 645, 649; Taylor v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 113 Pa. 162, 175, 57 Am. Rep. 446; but we think it would be going quite as far as is possible if the fact of continuous crossing, standing alone, were allowed to be considered by a jury as evidence of a license. See Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 374, 87 Am. Dec. 644. Usually, and in the present case, that fact does not stand alone, but there are other circumstances which will aid in determining whether the use is adverse, and therefore wrongful unless with title, or is permissive. All these facts were left to the jury, including the extent to which the crossing had been traveled, and this was as much as the plaintiff could ask.

If the plaintiff was a trespasser, the defendant was not liable. McEachern v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 515; Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 377, 80 Am. Rep. 686. The analogy of spring guns and mantraps does not apply. In those cases the defendant does an act which contemplates the presence of the plaintiff on the spot, and which not only produces its effect after he is there, but is intended to do so. His actual intent makes the defendant the last wrongdoer. He intervenes between the wrongful act of the plaintiff and the result complained of as much as if he had assaulted him in person. But when the act complained of is done with a different intent, such as the ordinary running of its trains by a railroad, the defendant has the right to assume that wrongdoers will not be upon its premises, and will be presumed not to have anticipated them until the fact is shown to have been otherwise. Hayes v. Hyde Park, 153 Mass. 514, 12 L. R. A. 249.

If the plaintiff was a licensee, and nothing more, her case stands no better. As against a bare licensee, a railroad company has a right to run its trains in the usual way without special precautions, if the circumstances do not of themselves give warning of his probable presence, and he is not seen until it is too late. Hanks v. Boston & A. R. Co. 147 Mass. 495, 496; June v. Boston & A. R. Co. 153 Mass. 79, 82.

If the circumstances did give warning of the plaintiff's probable presence, it was because the mode in which the crossing was prepared, coupled with the other facts in evidence, showed an "invitation," as that word commonly has been used and understood. Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 868, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. 183 Mass. 121; Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 578; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 430; Stevens v. Nichols, 155 Mass. 472, 15 L. R. A. 459. The judge rightly instructed the jury mainly with reference to a possible finding that there was such an invitation, although, as we have stated, he also used language importing that the defendant would be liable in case of a license. No attention seems to have been directed to the distinction by any one.

In explaining to the jury what he meant by a "reasonably intelligent and prudent man," the judge said that they were not to inquire what conclusion a woman or child would come to with reference to the way, but that the test was whether an ordinarily intelligent and prudent man would understand that there was an invitation to use the crossing as a public way. This expression was selected for criticism in argument, but no exception was taken to it except the general exception to a charge which fills three quarto pages of print. As we have intimated, such an exception is not enough to raise the point. Curry v. Porter, 125 Mass. 94. If, however, we were to consider it, we should see no error. Theoretically, at least, there must be a line at which the preparation of the face of the earth will express the owner's assent to its being entered upon, and short of which it will not express such assent. The theory is the same when the facts relied on are more complicated. But as the law is not prepared with an infinite number of plans, pictures, and explanations to meet all possible cases, it has to adopt some short test. What, then, is it fair to require of an owner as against strangers? If they enter without his license, they are trespassers, however incompetent and wanting in judgment they may be. What must he do to diminish his rights? Clearly, it is not enough that he puts something on his land which may tempt or allure a child or a fool. Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 18 L. R. A. 248. It must be something which by a general standard of understanding gives leave to enter. That standard is the understanding of the ordinarily prudent and intelligent person; not man as against woman, but a person possessed of ordinary intelligence and prudence as against one who has less than the ordinary. This is what the judge meant, and we think that he was right.

Exceptions overruled.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Mary E. HAGGART et al., Appts.,

v.

John STEHLIN et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A statute providing for the licensing of liquor sellers is not unconstitutional on the ground that it is to promote their business or that it confers a privilege to do an unlawful act since in the absence of any statute on the subject the business would be open to all.

3. A saloon constitutes an actionable nuisance to neighboring property owners, whose property is largely depreciated in selling and rental value by reason of the proximity of the saloon, frequented by persons for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors therein, when it is established in a residence neighborhood that had been previously free from such business and which, aside from residences, included little except churches, schools, a female college and an orphan asylum, and in which the people are largely opposed to saloons.

3. The lessor of a building for use as a saloon, which will constitute an actionable nuisance to neighboring property owners, is liable to them for the damage resulting from such use.

4. A saloon keeper's license for the sale of intoxicating liquors is no defense against liability to adjoining property owners, as to whom his saloon may constitute an actionable nuisance.

5. An injunction will not lie in all cases to prevent the maintenance of a nuisance causing damage to private property, but the remedy may be by an action for damages.

(Howard, Ch. J., and Hackney, J., dissent.)

NOTE.—The above case is one of extraordinary interest and importance. It is none the less a new departure or advance because it applies to the case old and well established principles such as are presented in Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. 711, and note. But it will be noticed that the decision while establishing the doctrine that a licensed saloon may constitute an actionable nuisance to neighboring property owners, is far from deciding that a saloon is a nuisance. The same question of fact exists in other cases as to what degree of annoyance and injury will constitute a nuisance. It is present here and open for decision in every case where a saloon is alleged to be a nuisance.

400; 40 L. R. A. 423, 552.

(January 26, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from maintaining a liquor saloon in such close proximity to plaintiff's property as to amount to a private nuisance to plaintiffs. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Eli F. Ritter, for appellants:

The point at issue here is the validity of that act so far as its license features are concerned.

This act does undertake to control, regulate, and to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors, but in that connection it does license, authorize, and sanction the sale and the saloon by the license for which it provides, and the control, the regulations, and restrictions in the act are in the interest of and do promote the interests and business of saloon keeping and the saloon business, and the saloon is the creature and institution established, sanctioned, and protected by this system.

The wisest and most effectual way to promote, encourage, and protect any special enterprises, has been found to be by licensing, regulating, and restricting the same.

There could not be a license system without prohibition, regulations, and restrictions in it that would be of any force whatever.

The first act established by the governor and judges who composed the legislative body in the northwest territory was a license saloon system.

There was no man in that day, I dare say, who contended that that was an act in restraint of the liquor traffic, but the act itself with all its surrounding history shows that it was intended in the interest of and to build up what was considered a great industry.

The legislature in the passage of an act adopting or continuing a measure or policy that has been long in existence and thoroughly tried in our state and elsewhere in the world and has made for itself a history as to the workings, the effect, and results of the measure will be presumed to intend what the history of the measure has shown to be the effect and results of such legislation.

If a man cannot conduct the saloon business, as he cannot, without license, and can conduct the saloon business, as he can, with license, then the license is the authority, protection, approval, and sanction for the deadly business that he conducts.

There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or of a citizen of the United States.

Crowley v. Christensen, 187 U. S. 86, 84 L. ed. 620.

A business that a man cannot conduct without license, and may conduct with license, is a business founded solely upon the license and authorized by the license, and the license is the consent, sanction, and approval of the business.

Inherent or natural or inalienable rights, all meaning the same thing, are the only rights that may be regulated and restricted.

Acquired rights, such as the right to keep a saloon, are not regulated and restricted, for such rights are only rights so far as they are acquired and conferred.

Whatever they may formerly have been thought to be the place, the proprietor, and the business have now come to be known as the saloon, the saloon keeper, and the saloon business. Each with an unbroken record and history which have established character and reputation by testimony in which there is no conflict. Of this the courts in this government long ago took judicial knowledge.

Thurlow v. Massachusetts, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256.

By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community, there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dram-shop where intoxicating liquors in small quantities to be drunk at the time are sold indiscriminately to all parties applying.

Crowley v. Christensen, supra.

All that is said or claimed in candor from the business itself is by way of excuse, that it is a necessary evil; but the constitution of Indiana, as well as public policy, recognizes no such thing as a necessary evil.

If the saloon business is, in fact, what the civilized and Christian sentiment of our country have declared it to be, certainly an act of a state legislature cannot provide for the maintenance and continuance of such a business.

The mistake and unconstitutionality of the act lies in the false theory that the business is laudable and the enterprise to be protected; when, in fact, the business itself is criminal under any intelligent contemplation of crime, and therefore should be dealt with on the theory that it is criminal, and instead of being provided for, should be provided against.

The act that accomplishes such disastrous results is certainly in conflict with the constitution of Indiana and public policy and is void.

The legislature is charged by the constitution of Indiana with the duty of improving and encouraging by all suitable means, moral, intellectual, scientific, and agricultural improvements, etc.

See Const. art. 8, § 1.

If the legislature, instead of providing for the promotion of specific objects, as required by the constitution, does in fact provide a system the working of which is a disturbance, destruction and defeating of these objects, such legislation cannot claim the protection of the constitution.

Blackstone says: "A law is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power of the state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong."

That defines the fundamental principle in every constitutional provision and legislative act.

Salus populi suprema lex.

What may be considered as a lawful institution or business at one period under given conditions may be considered as an unlawful institution or business at another period under other conditions.

Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L.

ed. 1079; Phalen v. Virginia, 49 U. S. 8 How. 163, 12 L. ed. 1030.

The Indiana territorial government on the 29th day of November 1806 (see Laws, 2d Sess. 1st General Assembly, p. 6), by legislative action chartered Vincennes University at Vincennes, Indiana, and in the charter provided for a lottery.

The present constitution of Indiana, adopted in 1851, prohibited lotteries, but the supreme court of Indiana in 1879, in the case of Kellum v. State, 66 Ind. 588, held that under the original charter to the Vincennes University, the lottery provided for therein could not be disturbed by even a constitutional provision, and must remain a valid institution. Afterwards the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision upon this question in the case of Stone v. Mississippi, supra, expressing its judicial knowledge, and the civilized and Christian sentiment of the people.

Then the question of the Vincennes lottery feature came again before the supreme court of Indiana, in 1883, in the case of State v. Woodward, 89 Ind. 110.

And the court proceeded to declare that the Vincennes lottery must go, or words to that effect, overruling its former decision on that subject.

Lotteries, being regarded as mischievous games, are common nuisances, and any person setting up a lottery or selling tickets therein is punishable for a common nuisance at common law.

Wood, Nuisance, § 53.

What has been said, and can be truthfully said, about the evil nature and injurious effects of lotteries, has been and can be far more strongly said of saloons.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the case of Mugler v. Kansas, and other cases consolidated with it, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, apply the same principle to the liquor traffic which they have heretofore applied to a slaughter-house in the wrong place, and a lottery in any place.

A house need not be noisy to constitute a disorderly house. It is not necessary that the public peace of the neighborhood would be disturbed. It is enough if it is resorted to for any immoral purpose.

People v. Rowland, 1 Wheel. Crim. Cas. 286; Harvey v. Dewoody, 18 Ark. 252; Meeker v. Van Rensselaer, 15 Wend. 397; Manhattan Mfg. & Fertilizing Co. v. Van Keuren, 23 N. J. Eq. 251; Coe v. Schulte, 47 Barb. 67; Bishop, Non-Cont. L. p. 490.

In considering whether any act is a nuisance, regard must be had, not only to the thing done, but to the surrounding circumstances. What would be a nuisance in one neighborhood might not be so in another.

Rodenhausen v. Oraven, 141 Pa. 546; Sturges v. Bridgman, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 852; Hurlbut v. McKone, 55 Conn. 31; Dennis v. Eckhardt, 3 Grant. Cas. 390; McCaffrey's App. 105 Pa. 253; *Dallas v. C. 18.

Even though the appellee's saloon might be a necessary institution (which we do not admit by any means) in some locality, yet it would be a nuisance in the locality where it is.

Wood, Nuisance, §§ 6-12.

A law, the effect of which is to defeat the ends and purposes of the government and constitution, should be declared void by the courts.

Jones v. People, 14 Ill. 196; Thurlow v. Massachusetts, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256; Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 536, 63 Am. Dec. 391.

If the act, whatever may have been the intention of the legislature, does in fact defeat and thwart the purpose of the constitution in the promotion of public morals, public intelligence, public health, and public peace, then the court must exercise its function and protect the public by declaring such an act void.

Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205.

The Supreme Court of the United States says: "No legislature can bargain away the public morals and the public peace. The people themselves cannot do it."

There is no escape from the fact, saying the very least that can be said, that this act does provide for a license, or a temporary lease, or a consent, or a permit, whatever it may be called, to abuse the public morals, and the public health, and the public peace.

There never was any constitutional law in Indiana for the establishment and existence of the most heartless, devastating, and cruel tyranny, the saloon, and that it is an outlaw from the beginning.

The life of a law is the reason or necessity for its enactment.

Beebe v. State, supra.

If there ever was a reason for such a law as contemplated in the act of the Indiana legislature referred to, that reason long ago ceased.

A license saloon system has survived, without material change, this one hundred years of progress in all things else. The act of the Indiana legislature upon which the appellees in this case depend for defense, is the same act in substance with the first act adopted by the Northwest Territory more than one hundred years ago. One hundred years have tested this theory of legislation. After one hundred years of trial of this measure, the Christian and civilized sentiment of the whole nation, and the highest judicial tribunal in its judicial knowledge, declare the places established thereby to be universal public enemies, and that "the statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained in these retail liquor saloons than to any other source."

Of all the systems and theories of legislation upon any subject, that the worst and most destructive should survive is beyond comprehension. It is upheld and defended only by that element in society that profits by its deadly work.

The greatest rules of law which express the highest wisdom and justice, have not come to us through legislation, but through the courts. The wicked institution of slavery in the United States would never have been abolished by legislation. But by a constitutional proceeding that deadly foe was slain at a blow by the Emancipation Proclamation in an emergency to save the government.

On petition for rehearing.

The right of the legislature to regulate and control and to license the sale of intoxicating liquors was specifically and distinctly conceded in my original brief in this case and in my oral argument before the court. That question was in no way put at issue in this case, yet, with all due respect for the opinion of this court as rendered in this case, I urge that the court has decided very clearly and very conclusively and very satisfactorily that particular question.

My objections are made to the license, the authority, and the sanction given by the act, to the person, the place, and the conduct of the saloon business. I am talking about the saloon business solely; the place where intoxicating liquors are sold and drunk, where persons are invited to meet and drink, the place and the business authorized and sanctioned by law.

This question that is at issue is not passed on in the opinion rendered by the court.

The appellants in the institution of this action sought damages for injury to their property and the disturbance to their enjoyment of the premises, and sought relief by injunction, also, from the further continuance of the same.

If the legislature were to pass an act which was against education, or an act against public intelligence, or an act against the interests of agriculture, such an act would be void, and it would be the duty and province of the courts to declare it so. If the act in fact worked an injury that was ruinous to the subject contemplated by Const. art. 8, § 1, the courts must pass on the effect and result of the act, sustain or declare it void in accordance with the effect and result it in effect has, however laudable might be the intention of the legislature in the passage of the act.

If the legislature, as it might do, were to establish a license system for slaughter-houses with regulations and restrictions and without any exception as to locality, it would not be insisted that under such general license law a slaughter-house might be established on the main street in the heart of Indianapolis.

The legislature might provide a system for licensing pest-hospitals with regulations and restrictions, and without any exceptions as to locality, but it would not be contended by the legal profession that a man might establish a pest-house on the main street and in the heart of the city of Indianapolis.

On the principle of law recognized and established, how can a saloon be established in the neighborhood described in the complaint in this case, and be maintained and protected.

While the legislature, I concede, may by a constitutional act license, regulate, and restrict the sale of liquor, it could not, in connection with the sale of liquors, license gambling or any other immoral thing.

It is no more necessary to license a saloon in connection with licensing, regulating, and restricting the sale of liquor, than it is to connect gambling and other vices with the same.

The proposition that the authority to license, regulate, and restrict the sale of liquor carries with it the authority to license a saloon, cannot be maintained.

Any legislation that causes the evil effects and consequences growing out of the use of intoxicating liquors to be prevented, mitigated, or reduced is within the scope of the constitutional provision. Any legislation upon this subject which aggravates and multiplies the evils and disastrous effects growing out of the use and abuse of intoxicating liquors is in violation of the constitution.

The question whether the purpose of the constitution which requires that the legislature shall, by the best means, provide for morality, is being carried out by an act of the legislature, is a question addressed to the court, comes within its duty, and from which there is no escaping the responsibility.

The court cannot avoid the judicial knowledge, that the act of the legislature providing for a saloon license system is against the interests of public morals. The constitution and this act with the history and results of such legislation cannot be reconciled. The saloon is clearly within the definition of a common-law nuisance, and classed under wrongs malum in se.

Wood, Nuisance, § 24.

Instead of licensing a saloon, in connection with the licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors, instead of conferring the authority to open a place where persons are invited to assemble, wherein intoxicating liquors may be sold and drunk, that is the very thing that ought not to be licensed in connection with such sale.

The statutes concerning nuisances are ample both in their civil and criminal provisions to give relief and protection to these appellants, if the appellees were left to their inherent rights. Probably the most important case, considering the circumstances and effects, ever decided in England, was the case of Somerset v. Stewart, in king's bench, decided June 22, 1771, see Loft's Reports, Easter term, 1st case.

About fifty years before that date Lords Hardwicke, Talbot, and York had held that African slaves might legally be held in England, and from that date to the date of the decision in that case, that had been accepted as the law.

That case was habeas corpus for the release of a slave. The argument of the question before the court was lengthy, and participated in by numerous advocates, in which was made very prominent, that the growth of Christian and civilized sentiment and public intelligence was such, that the law of England could not then be declared to be what it had been declared and understood to be fifty years before.

Lord Mansfield delivered the unanimous opinion of the court. He said in the language of that day, among other things: "The setting fourteen to fifteen thousand men at once free, loose by solemn opinion, is much disagreeable in the effect it threatens."

If the parties will have judgment, fiat justitia, ruat cælum, let justice be done, whatever be the consequences.

Mr. Stewart may end the question by discharging or give freedom to the negro.

But if the parties will have it decided, we must give our opinion.

Compassion will not on the one hand, nor inconvenience on the other, be decided, but the law."

The slave was liberated. There had been no act of parliament, no decision of court, upon this question intervening for fifty years, and, since the declaration of law, directly the opposite.

That decision freed every slave then held in England. The dire consequences of such a decision, predicted in the argument, to commerce, domestic affairs, and social order, did not follow. The Christian civilization so adjusted the affairs that the effects of the decision came like a providential blessing to the whole people.

Messrs. Kern & Bailey for appellees.

Elliott, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One question, and only one, is here presented; all others are excluded by the statements of counsel and by the record. That question is this: Is the Statute of March 17, 1875, regulating the liquor traffic, requiring a license and imposing a tax upon dealers in the form of a license fee, unconstitutional?

The assault upon the statute comes from a quarter different from that whence all assaults have come in the past, for it comes from citizens and property owners who are not engaged in the traffic; not from those whom the law requires to take out a license and against whom penalties are denounced for a failure to pay the fee prescribed and to obtain the license which is required of all who engage in the business of dram selling. The position of the appellants is a novel one; there is no instance in the books where such a position has been assumed. We are asked to overthrow a principle of law which has prevailed not merely for years, but for centuries. So far as we can ascertain, the power of the legislative department to regulate the liquor traffic by exacting a license has never been challenged by parties other than those of whom a license was exacted until now. In every reported case the power has been asserted to exist. The state courts have without a break in the current of opinion affirmed the validity of such statutes, but no court has asserted their validity in stronger or more emphatic terms than the Supreme Court of the United States. There is absolutely no diversity of opinion. There is, therefore, no room for doubt, no question as to our duty for we are bound by the law as it exists. We are not law-makers and hence are without power to change the law. A change can be made only by the law-making department of the government. The question is so free from difficulty, and so firmly settled, that there is really no room for discussion; but we have concluded that it is due to the able and elaborate argument of counsel to consider somewhat in detail the points upon which a reversal of the judgment is asked.

The position that a license is required of liquor sellers for the promotion of their business is untenable. It has been asserted again and again by the courts and by the text-writers that a license is required for the protection of the community not for the benefit of the liquor dealers. The object of license laws is to restrict the traffic to the few, not to open it to all without restriction or restraint. But whether the policy of the law is good or bad is a question for the legislature, not the courts. In the License Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 462, 18 L. ed. 497, it was said: "This court can know nothing of public policy except from the constitution and the laws. . . . It has no legislative powers. It cannot amend or modify any legislative acts." No court can decide such a question without a flagrant violation of duty and an usurpation of authority that no principle will justify nor any precedent excuse. We begin our quotations from the text-writers and the courts with one from a work of excellent repute, Mr. Tiedeman's work on the Police Powers. This author says that: "Since the primary object of such a law would be to operate as a restriction upon the trade, and not to raise a revenue, the incidental increase in the revenue would constitute no valid objection to the law." Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 277.

In the case of State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312, 21 Am. Rep. 765, the court said: "Regarding the law as a precautionary measure, intended to operate as a wholesome restraint upon the traffic, and as a protection to society against its consequent evils, the exacted fee is not unreasonable in amount."

The court of appeals of New York, in the case of Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323, said: "The right of the state to regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors, within its limits, has been exercised from the foundation of the government, and is not open to question. The state may prescribe the persons by whom, and the conditions under which, the traffic may be carried on. It may impose upon those who act under its license such liabilities and penalties as in its judgment are proper to secure society against the dangers of the traffic."

In the case of Welch v. State, 126 Ind. 71, 9 L. R. A. 664, our own court said: "That the state of Indiana possesses the power to regulate and control the traffic in intoxicating liquors has never been an open question." It was also said: "All laws regulating and imposing burdens on the business are prohibitory in their character. There is no difference between an absolute prohibitory law, a law providing for local option, and license law, except in the extent to which they prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drink. An absolute prohibitory law deprives all within its reach from engaging in the business, while a local option law prohibits all within a given locality from selling with-

In that locality; while a license law prohibits all within the state, who have not obtained a license, from engaging in the business of retailing intoxicating liquors. Each of these is a restriction upon the common-law right of the individual citizen."

In asserting the right of a city to exact a license of a person not a resident of the municipality in the case of Emerich v. Indianapolis, 118 Ind. 279, the court said: "Liquor-sellers are subjected to the payment of a special tax, because the object of this class of legislation is to restrict the business, and not because its object is to secure to the liquor-sellers the benefit or protection of the municipal government. The liquor-seller is compelled to pay a special tax, in the form of a license fee, in order that the business may be restricted to fewer persons, and not be open, like other pursuits, to every one without the payment of any special tax. The theory of the legislation upon this subject is, that the business is one which requires restraint because it is harmful to society, and a license fee is exacted for the purpose of restricting the business and not for the purpose of increasing the traffic. Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564, 51 Am. Rep. 768; Lutz v. Crawfordsville, 109 Ind. 466. The law in exacting a license fee does not grant a privilege that did not before exist, but, on the contrary, lays a special tax upon a pursuit which, but for the statute, might be followed without paying any special tax."

Many other cases in our own reports declare the same general doctrine. Frankfort v. Aughe, 114 Ind. 77; Vinson v. Monticello, 118 Ind. 103; Wagner v. Garrett, 118 Ind. 114; Moore v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 483; Harrison v. Lockhart, 25 Ind. 112.

It would be an easy task to multiply quotations sustaining the doctrine we have stated, but it would inexcusably prolong this opinion to do so, and we shall do no more than make an extract from the only case adduced by appellant's counsel in support of his position. The case to which we refer is that of Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620. The question in that case was as to the constitutionality of a statute requiring the payment of a license fee and the obtaining of a license, and that is the question in this case. The only difference in the cases is this: In the case before us the statute challenged is one authorizing the issuing of licenses by county officers, while in that case the question was upon a statute authorizing the officers of a municipal corporation to exact a license. The court in that case affirmed the constitutionality of the statute as strongly and decisively as it was possible for a court to do. In the course of the opinion it was said: "As it is a business attended with danger to the community, it may, as already said, be entirely prohibited, or be permitted under such conditions as will limit to the utmost its evils. The manner and extent of the regulation rest in the discretion of the governing authority. That authority may vest in such officers as it may deem proper the power of passing upon applications for permission to carry it on and to issue licenses for that purpose. It is a matter of legislative will only."

It is impossible to conceive how a decision could be more directly or conclusively against the appellant's position than the one from which we have quoted and upon which they rely.

Counsel seize upon a fragmentary expression in the opinion from which we have quoted, and isolating it from its associated words, affirm that it sustains the contention that the state has no power to regulate the liquor traffic by providing that dealers shall take out a license. . . . In affirming this, one of the plainest and most elementary principles of logic and of law is violated by counsel, for a clause or sentence is always to be considered in connection with the words with which it is associated.

The part of the opinion in Crowley v. Christensen, supra, which counsel quote is this: "There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or a citizen of the United States." The context plainly and unequivocally shows the sense in which this language was used. The meaning is, that because the business is hurtful to society there is authority to regulate it, and that the right to conduct such a business is not one that is beyond legislative control. If the right to sell liquor were one of the inherent rights of personal liberty, such, for instance, as the right of a farmer to sell his corn, wheat, or potatoes, the legislature could neither burden nor abridge it by imposing a special tax or requiring a special license. The legislature can burden those engaged in the liquor traffic because the right to conduct such a business is not an inherent attribute of personal liberty inasmuch as such a pursuit is hurtful to the community and requires special regulation and restraint. If it were harmless and not inimical to the good of society, it could not be subjected to special burdens, restrictions, or regulations, but to such burdens, restrictions, and regulations it may be subjected for the reason that if it is not regulated and restricted society may suffer. If there were no statute regulating and restricting dram selling the business would be open to all, for it is settled beyond controversy that where there is no such statute any citizen may engage in the business without hindrance or restraint. If the statute regulating the traffic should be overthrown the business might be conducted by anyone who chose to engage in it, free from any of the liabilities and restrictions which the statute has thrown around it. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the License Tax Cases, 73 U. S. 5 Wall. 462-472, 18 L. ed. 497-501: "These licenses give no authority; they are mere receipts for taxes." The object of exacting the tax is stated by the same great court in Perreay v. Massachusetts, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 475-490, 18 L. ed. 608, 609: "The object of the law," said the court, "was to protect the community against the evils of intemperance. The mode adopted, of prohibiting under penalties the sale and keeping for sale of intoxi-eating liquors, without license, is the usual mode adopted in many, perhaps all, of the states. It is wholly within the discretion of state legislatures."

Judgment affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently granted after which on December 14, 1893, McCabe, J., on behalf of the court, delivered the following opinion:

Suit by appellants against appellees for damages on account of an alleged nuisance, and for a perpetual injunction against the same. A separate demurrer by appellee Heidt was sustained and a separate demurrer by appellee Stehlin for want of facts was overruled to the complaint; a demurrer to his answer was overruled and appellants refusing to plead further, appellees had judgment on the demurrers. The only errors assigned and noticed in appellants' brief are the sustaining appellee Heidt's demurrer to the complaint and overruling appellants' demurrer to the answer of appellee Stehlin. "The substance of the complaint is that appellants have for five years owned and resided in, and still reside in, a dwelling house on lot 9 in block 21, in Johnson's heirs addition to the city of Indianapolis situated on College avenue, in the second ward of said city, that the people of the locality named have been distinguished for fifteen years for a high grade of morality, good order, and sobriety, and until the acts hereinafter complained of, there was not a saloon, where persons could assemble to buy and drink intoxicating liquors in said second ward, nor where intoxicating liquors were sold to be drunk on the premises within said ward; that said ward has within its boundaries nine churches, an orphan asylum, where about one hundred children were kept and cared for, when the acts hereinafter complained of began, another orphan asylum enterprise under way, and a female college, the public school largely attended, all in the neighborhood of the premises aforesaid; that the neighborhood of said premises is settled and composed largely by religious church-going people, who are opposed to saloons and places where persons are invited to assemble and buy and drink intoxicating liquors; that the real estate and residences in that locality prior to the acts hereinafter complained of were sought for by a class of people whose views and sentiments were in harmony with the aforesaid conditions and facts, and real property situated therein had an enhanced value because of said facts, both intrinsically and for rental purposes, that plaintiff's property is situated where it was most favorably affected by the conditions aforesaid; that there are no manufacturing establishments or business houses, excepting a few small groceries, meat shops, and drug stores in the neighborhood; that on a lot adjoining plaintiff's premises there is a house, coming out to the sidewalk and fronting on College avenue, and only ten feet between said building and plaintiff's said residence; that on June 17, 1890, defendant Stehlin established a saloon upon said premises, and has ever since continued the business of selling intoxicating liquors, and permitting the same to be drunk on the premises; that he advertised his said business by causing to be printed on the front of said building the words 'Aurora Beer Hall'; also on the front windows the words, 'Stehlin's Sample Room'; and on the south along the side of said building in letters a foot in length the word 'Saloon,' that he provided an entrance thereto from the front on said College avenue, from the side on said Seventh street, and by the rear from an alley on the east, all of which have ever since been maintained by him; that persons have continually ever since been invited and received by said defendant upon said premises to, and do buy from him and drink intoxicating liquors, and meet together upon the said premises for the purposes of drinking intoxicating liquors, and are seen by the public going in and coming out of said premises at each of said entrances to the same for the purpose aforesaid; that the said saloon business, the place established where persons are invited to go, to meet and drink intoxicating liquors, the said advertisements, the meeting of persons and their drinking intoxicating liquors at such place, and the other acts and conduct aforesaid, are severally and altogether exceedingly odious and offensive to these plaintiffs and to the persons who seek residences in said locality, and to persons who desire to purchase real estate therein, and are great injuries and disturbances to the good order, morals, and peace of said community, that plaintiff's enjoyment of their said premises by reason of the acts aforesaid, has been greatly disturbed and lessened; that their premises which would have rented for $35, per month, have been so damaged in their rental value that they would not, so long as said saloon business shall be continued where it is, rent for more than $20, per month, that said premises would readily have sold for and were of the value of $5,500, but because of the aforesaid facts would not sell for more than $3,000; that defendant Heidt owns said premises and rents them to defendant Stehlin for the purposes aforesaid for $50, per month, which would not rent for $25, for any other purpose. Said defendants claim that they are authorized and protected in the conduct of said business and other acts aforesaid by virtue of a license issued by the board of commissioners of Marion county, Indiana, to said defendant Stehlin, which plaintiffs deny and say said claim is false; that plaintiffs have been damaged by defendants' aforesaid wrongs in the sum of $2,000. Prayer for judgment for said sum and for a perpetual injunction against the longer maintenance of said saloon, etc."

Stehlin's answer set up the fact that he had a license duly granted by the board of commissioners of Marion county, Indiana, to carry on said saloon, and to sell therein intoxicating liquors by the drink, to be drunk on the premises under the liquor license law. One question presented by the record therefore is, whether the license alleged constitutes a valid defense to the supposed cause of action set up in the complaint; and the only other question is, Does the complaint state a valid cause of action against appellees? The sufficiency of the complaint is the first question because if it is insufficient, there was no available error in overruling a demurrer to the answer of Stehlin, even though that answer was bad. State v. Emmons, 88 Ind. 279; Vert v. Voss, 74 Ind. 565; Reeves v. Howes, 104 Ind. 485; Low v. Studabaker, 110 Ind. 57; Bowen v. Striker, 100 Ind. 45; Atina Ins. Co. v. Black, 80 Ind. 518; Atina Ins. Co. v. Kittles, 81 Ind. 96; Dorrell v. Hannah, 80 Ind. 497; Ice v. Ball, 103 Ind. 42.

Much labor and learning is expended by appellants' counsel in a contention that the license alleged in Stehlin's answer was invalid because the Act approved March 17, 1875, requiring such a license to be taken out as a condition to sell intoxicants by the drink is unconstitutional. Why appellants' counsel so contend is a mystery to this court. If such contention were upheld, it is difficult to see how it could help the appellants. They are asking damages for, and an injunction against, an alleged nuisance created by the sale of intoxicants by the drink in close contact with their dwelling house. But for the liquor license law, every man in the ward, every man, woman, and child in the city could, if they chose, engage in the traffic without giving bond to keep an orderly house, without establishing their fitness to be entrusted with the sale of intoxicants and without any other of the many restrictions and burdens that that statute imposes upon the traffic. With that statute obliterated, the appellees could stand up and say, our business stands on the same legal basis as that of the dry goods merchant, the groceryman, the hardware merchant, or any other legitimate business or traffic. There is no mark of the public ban upon it, and our business stands the equal before the law of all other branches of traffic, and therefore we can no more be subjected to the charge of being the maintainers of a nuisance than the dry goods merchant. On the other hand, the license law treats the traffic as dangerous, as dangerous to public and private morals, dangerous to public peace and the good order of society, and therefore imposes heavy burdens upon it, among which is a heavy license fee to the county and city, and throws around it severe restrictions and liabilities upon those who engage in it, and of whom it requires proof of their fitness to be entrusted with the sale of the dangerous thing. With such a law in force, and springing as it does from such a public policy, as old as the state government, it is and must be easier to reach the conclusion that a licensed saloon might be kept in such a place as to make it a nuisance per se, than if the law and the policy upon which it is founded were obliterated as appellants' counsel would have us do. So it seems quite apparent to us, if appellants' contention that the license law is unconstitutional should prevail, it would weaken rather than strengthen their position. Such laws have been in existence from the earliest times and the courts everywhere have upheld their constitutionality, and appellants' counsel have been unable to cite a single decision where such laws have been held unconstitutional. The only case cited by appellants' counsel upon the question as strongly affirms the constitutionality of such legislation as any of our own cases. Counsel has not only failed to cite authority in support of this contention, but he has not even suggested one single valid reason why such laws are in conflict with any provision of the constitution. His whole contention is founded on a total misconception of the object and effect of such laws. Counsel supposes the law was enacted for the protection of those engaged in the traffic, and to encourage and foster that traffic, and cites provisions of the constitution supposed to be inimical to such an object and policy; whereas, the object was to protect the people and society generally against the known evils and dangers which had arisen from the free and unlimited right of all people and all kinds of people to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors which they would enjoy without any statute upon the subject. What provision of the constitution such a law would infringe has not been pointed out, and we know of none. The question is not, whether the statute provides the most effective remedy for the evils mentioned, nor whether some other kind of statute would not have better accomplished the object in view. That consideration belonged exclusively to the legislature.

The argument of appellant's counsel all the way through is precisely such argument as might be appropriate to address to the voters before an election whereat a legislature is to be elected. Indeed, appellant's briefs purport to be, and are, campaign documents printed in the best style of the art. There are very many arguments that can be addressed appropriately to the law-making power, and often effectively, that would be entirely out of place addressed to a court against the law after it is made. There are many books extant where this information can be found. These books will inform counsel that this court has no power to make, change, or modify laws. The following are a few of the cases where this court has affirmed the constitutionality of such statutes. Thomason v. State, 15 Ind. 449; Harrison v. Lockhart, 25 Ind. 112; O'Dea v. State, 57 Ind. 81; Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564, 51 Am. Rep. 768; Welsh v. State, 126 Ind. 71, 9 L. R. A. 664.

The statute is clearly not unconstitutional. Does the complaint state facts sufficient? It shows that appellee Stehlin has established a drinking saloon in a portion of the city devoted to residences, churches, Sunday schools, orphan asylums, female college, public schools, and residences of people distinguished for morality and habitual attendance upon church services, and on account of these things property in that vicinity bore a high valuation both for sale and rent, and away from the business part of the city where no saloon had ever been established before. In the midst of all this, said appellee sits down and begins the work of selling intoxicating liquors by the drink, in a building on a lot adjoining that on which appellants, two women, have their residence, with all the incidents generally accompanying such a traffic, from which both the rental and selling value of their home has been reduced nearly one half, and their home rendered odious and offensive to them.

In Reichert v. Geers, 98 Ind. 76, 49 Am. Rep. 786, this court said: "The necessity which will authorize the granting of the writ of injunction to restrain the carrying on of a business lawful within itself, must be a strong and imperious one. If it were otherwise, all mills and manufactories might be stopped at the demand of those to whom they caused annoyance, even though the injury complained of might be slight and trivial." Queen v. Phillips, 78 Ind. 284, and authorities there cited.

And it must be conceded that the sale of intoxicants by the drink is a lawful business.

Wood on Nuisance, section 88, says: "A house which becomes a rendezvous or place of resort for thieves, drunkards, prostitutes, or other idle, vicious, and disorderly persons, who gather there to gratify their depraved appetites, or for any other purpose, for such persons are regarded as dangerous to the peace and welfare of the community, and their presence at any place in considerable numbers is always a just cause of alarm and apprehension; . . . and a place where liquor is sold in excessive quantities, whereby persons become intoxicated, and where frequent brawls result therefrom, is a disorderly house and indictable as a nuisance; for no person has a right to carry on, upon his own premises or elsewhere, for his own gain or amusement, any public business clearly calculated to injure and destroy public morals, or to disturb the public peace. And while a license to sell liquors will protect a person from prosecution for such sales, it will not protect him from a prosecution for an abuse of the authority given him whereby he creates a nuisance."

"No person can maintain a private action for a mere public or common nuisance, for the reason that the exercise of such a right would lead to a great multiplicity of suits, and endless interminable litigation." Wood, Nuisance, §§ 645, 646.

The complaint at bar makes the injury partake somewhat of a public or common nuisance, in that it shows injury probable to others in the neighborhood. But a nuisance may be both public and private. Wood, Nuisance, § 674; 16 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 980, and authorities cited.

But where the damage or injury to one is more than to the public, however slight, or where he sustains a special damage not common to all, he may maintain a private action. Wood, Nuisance, §§ 14-16, 672.

The facts stated in the complaint and admitted by the answer and demurrer to be true, show the injury to be greater to appellants than to the public. It is to be observed that the facts alleged in the complaint and admitted to be true by the demurrer and answer under consideration do not bring the case within the definition of that sort of a nuisance by Mr. Wood. But he was speaking about what it would take to make a drinking saloon a nuisance in any and every locality. In secti cality, the condition of property, and the habits and tastes of those residing there, dictated by dainty modes and habits of living, are the test to apply in a given case. In the very nature of things, there can be no definite or fixed standard to control every case in any locality. The question is one of reasonableness or unreasonableness in the use of property, and this is largely dependent upon the locality and its surroundings." And in section 10, he says: "The diminution of the market value of adjacent buildings by such use will not of itself make it a nuisance, but there is a limit to such a right. No man is at liberty to use his own property without reference to the health, comfort, or reasonable enjoyment of like public or private rights by others. Every man gives up something of his absolute right of dominion and use of his own, to be regulated or restrained by law, so that others may not be hurt or hindered unreasonably in the use or enjoyment of their property. This is the fundamental principle of all regulated civil communities and without it society could hardly exist, except by the law of the strongest. This illegal, unreasonable and unjustifiable use to the injury of another, or of the public, the law denominates a nuisance."

In Hackney v. State, 8 Ind. 494, in a prosecution of a nuisance in keeping a ten-pin alley it is said: "Thus anything offensive to the sight, smell, or hearing erected or carried on in a public place, where people dwell or pass, or have a right to pass, to their annoyance, is a nuisance at common law."

In Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 576, 50 Am. Rep. 880, it is said: "A wooden building is not in itself a nuisance, . . . but when erected where it endangers the safety of adjoining property, it may become a nuisance."

It is no mere fanciful notion, dictated by dainty modes and habits of living that makes one who has located his home in a quiet, peaceful part of a city, in the immediate neighborhood of numerous churches, Sunday schools, common schools, female colleges and among neighbors who are attendants upon such places, and out of the reach of the busier haunts of the business part of the city to protest and object to the maintenance of a saloon on the adjoining lot, and within ten feet of such residence, where drinking people are invited to and do assemble to drink intoxicating liquors, with all the incidents usually attendant upon such a place, very few people indeed who would not object and protest and be seriously annoyed thereat. Even the man who frequents such a place to drink would, as a general thing, object to the traffic obtruding itself within ten feet of his threshold; especially where it is alleged and admitted, as here, that it has so injured the appellant's property both for selling and rental purposes.

We think, therefore, that the complaint stated facts sufficient as against Stehlin to constitute an actionable nuisance. Did it state a good cause of action against appellee Heidt? It states that he rented the property to appellee Stehlin for the purpose of being used for a saloon, and received $50 per month because of that fact, and that the property would not rent for more than $25 per month for any other use. The landlord is liable where he rents his premises for the purpose of the establishment thereon of a nuisance. Wood, Nuisance, §§ 30, 31.

The court therefore erred in sustaining Heidt's demurrer to the complaint. Did the license set up in the answer of Stehlin constitute a justification? We are of opinion that it did not. It did not enlarge his rights, but restricted them within narrower limits than they were before and without any statute on the subject. It was a certificate only that he had been put under bond to keep the peace, and paid the license fees and was thereby permitted to sell. Notwithstanding his payment of the large sums of money for license fees both to the county and city, his license could be revoked without refunding his money. State v. Bonnell, 119 Ind. 494; Monroe County Comrs. v. Kreuger, 88 Ind. 231; Moore v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 483.

It is no contract; it is a mere permit given to sell in the exercise of the police power of the state, and may be withdrawn at any time. Ibid.; McKinney v. Salem, 77 Ind. 213.

The congress of the United States passed an act authorizing the Baltimore & Potomac Railroad Company to bring its tracks within the municipal limits of the city of Washington and to construct shops and engine houses there; and pursuant to said authority they built their engine house and shops close enough to the Fifth Baptist Church edifice in said city to so annoy the worshippers thereat as to make the same a nuisance, and in a suit very much like the present to recover damages, but asking no injunction, it was claimed that the license afforded by the act of congress was a complete protection against the charge of maintaining a nuisance, to which the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The acts that a legislature may authorize, which, without such authorization, would constitute nuisances, are those which affect public highways or public streams, or matters in which the public have an interest and over which the public have control. The legislative authorization exempts only from liability to suits, civil or criminal, at the instance of the state; it does not affect any claim of a private citizen for damages for any special inconvenience and discomfort not experienced by the public at large." Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 332, 27 L. ed. 744.

In a similar action, the supreme court of New Jersey said: "It may be lawful for him and his assignees to execute this act, so far as the public interests, the rights of navigation, fishing, etc., are concerned, and he may plead, and successfully plead the act, to any indictment for a nuisance, or against any complaint for an infringement of a public right, but cannot plead it as a justification for a private injury, which may result from the execution of the statute." Sinnickson v. Johnson, 17 N. J. L. 151, 34 Am. Dec. 184.

In a nuisance case in the court of appeals in New York it is said: "But the statutory sanction which will justify an injury to private property, must be express, or must be given by clear and unquestionable implication from the powers expressly conferred, so that it can fairly be said that the legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury. This is but an application of the reasonable rule that statutes in derogation of private rights, or which may result in imposing burdens upon private property, must be strictly construed. For it cannot be presumed, from a general grant of authority, that the legislature intended to authorize acts to the injury of third persons, where no compensation is provided, except upon condition of obtaining their consent." Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 21, 57 Am. Rep. 701.

We therefore hold that the complaint stated facts sufficient as against both appellees to entitle appellants to some relief, and that the answer of Stehlin stated no defense. We do not mean to be understood as holding that the complaint stated facts sufficient to warrant all the relief prayed for. It does not follow that because an act done, as here, under legislative authorization (the statute being constitutional), creating a nuisance and resulting damage to private property, that the extraordinary remedy of injunction may in all cases be invoked for the discontinuance of the acts complained of, as well as to recover damages for the injury. It is said in section 648, Wood on Nuisance, "The rule as existing at this time may be stated to be that where a person sustains special damage peculiar to himself, either to his person or property, direct or consequential, from a public nuisance, . . . he shall have his remedy therefor."

Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, was a case where damages only were sought, and not injunctive relief. And the court there said: "It is sufficient to maintain the action to show that the building of the plaintiff was thus rendered less valuable for the purposes to which it was devoted."

All the other cases above cited after the church case were cases of the same kind upholding the right of recovery for damages where the act done was done under legislative authorization, but no injunction was granted.

The complaint was sufficient to constitute a cause of action for damages.

The judgment is reversed, the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the separate demurrer of Heidt to the complaint, and sustain the appellants' demurrer to appellee Stehlin's answer.

Howard, Ch. J., dissenting:

I regret that I am unable to agree in the result reached by the majority of the court in this case.

In the admirable opinion delivered on the first hearing of the case by Elliott, Ch. J., then a member of this court (Jan. 26, 1892), the validity of our statute regulating the liquor traffic was fully and clearly demonstrated, as it also is in the majority opinion of the court at the present hearing. Yet the able counsel for appellants has insisted and still insists, that the question at issue is not the constitutionality of the statute in so far as it provides for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, but its constitutionality in respect to its provisions for licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors in saloons. "If the act of the legislature," says counsel, "contained no other provisions than such as assume control, regulation, and restriction upon the sale of intoxicating liquors, I should readily concede its validity. It is not the control over this subject and business to which I offer objections. My objections are made to the license, the authority and the sanction given by the act to the person, the place and the conduct of the saloon business." With all deference to the learned counsel, it would seem that he here attempts to make a distinction where there is no difference. If the control and regulation of the liquor traffic are in the hands of the legislature, that body must certainly be the judge as to the best means to secure such control and regulation; and it is consequently competent for the legislature to determine, as it has done, that the license system is the most just, efficient, and satisfactory means to attain the end in view. This policy is the one adopted. The legislature has, in effect, decided that the best policy for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors is the license system; that by such system the traffic can best be controlled, regulated, and restricted. Counsel himself concedes, "that a statutory law providing a license system for saloons existed at the time when our present state constitution took effect, in 1851." There is no question that such system has been practically in operation ever since.

That the regulation of the liquor traffic, therefore, is entrusted to the legislature, and that the policy adopted by the legislature in the exercise of the power thus confided is the license system, seem to admit of no controversy.

Counsel, however, goes still further, and says that selling intoxicating liquors in a saloon is immoral; and that the act licensing such sale must for that reason be unconstitutional; inasmuch as the constitution provides for the promotion of morality. In answer to this, it would seem that if the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors is a trust confided to the legislative department of the government, then the sale itself cannot be immoral. And if the legislature, in the exercise of its sound discretion, is of opinion that the saloon license system is the best means of controlling and regulating such sale, it would also seem that the sale in a saloon, in the manner prescribed by law, cannot be immoral.

Because some saloons are not conducted in the mode which the law directs, it does not follow that a saloon which is properly conducted is also an immoral institution. Such a conclusion would amount to an admission that the legislature could not so regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors as to make such sale lawful, notwithstanding the admission already made that the legislature has the power to control such sale. It would seem to follow that the regulation and restriction of the liquor traffic must be a question of policy, and not, properly speaking, a question of morals; and that, as such, it is confided to the good judgment of the legislature of the state. So far as the courts are concerned, to quote from the Licenses Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 462, 18 L. ed. 497: "The court can know nothing of public policy, except from the constitution and the laws."

Counsel asks that the damage feature involved in this case to the appellants, caused by the establishment of a saloon beside their home be not overlooked by the court. This consideration, though but thus incidentally referred to, and not at all argued by counsel, I regard as the strongest that could be urged in appellant's favor. It has frequently been held that locality is often an important element in determining whether a business is or is not a nuisance. In Owen v. Phillips, 73 Ind. 284, the doctrine was approved in its fullest extent, "that in some localities, a business will be considered a nuisance, while it would not be so in others." The fact that the business conducted by appellees is a lawful one does not affect the question. No matter how good one's title to property, no matter how lawful the business in which he is engaged, he must so use his property and conduct his business as to cause no unnecessary injury to the property, rights, or interests of others. The reason for this rule, as well as the rule itself, are comprehensively stated by Judge Ray, formerly of this court, in his work on Negligence of Imposed Duties, p. 152: "It is the injury, annoyance, inconvenience, and discomfort thus occasioned that the law regards, not the particular business, trade, or occupation from which these result. And lawful as well as unlawful business may be carried on in a place, or in a manner so as to prove a nuisance."

The complaint shows the location of a saloon beside a home in a thickly settled residence part of the city, near also to schools and churches; and far from the business center. It also shows conspicuous advertising signs on the building, side and alley entrances, and that persons have been continuously going in there to buy and drink intoxicating liquors and are so seen going in and coming out by the public.

It avers a consequent diminution of the value of appellant's property and annoyance to appellants in the enjoyment of their home.

To this appellees answered by setting up their liquor license issued by the board of county commissioners, and the conduct of the business by authority of, and in pursuance of, such license.

Had appellants put their argument in support of their demurrer to this answer upon the ground that such license did not authorize the acts complained of, some case might perhaps have been made in favor of sustaining such demurrer. But, instead of this, appellant's contention is based upon the assumption that the answer is insufficient to constitute a defense for the reason that "the law pretending to authorize the same is unconstitutional and void." And the whole argument of counsel, instead of being addressed to the insufficiency of the answer as a defense to the acts complained of, is directed against the license law itself. Counsel says expressly that, "the point at issue here is the validity of the act so far as its license features are concerned. If the law in that respect is valid, then the defense as set up in the respective answers of the appellees is complete."

I must disagree with counsel's reasoning in this. The license granted by the county commissioners gave no right to appellees to keep a disorderly place, where intoxicating liquors are sold, as prohibited by section 2097, Rev. Stat. 1881, and gave them no right to unnecessarily injure their neighbors' property, rights, and interests. For, while the business of selling intoxicating liquors, under a license duly issued, is lawful, yet, as we have seen, "a lawful as well as unlawful business may be carried on in a place, or in a manner so as to prove a nuisance."

Appellants, in basing their argument upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the law, instead of upon the insufficiency of the answer as a defense to the alleged unlawful acts of appellees, abandoned, as I think, their only reasonable grounds of action. Whether the acts complained of were in fact sufficient to constitute appellee's place of selling intoxicating liquors a disorderly house, or a nuisance, need not, as I think, be considered, since appellants in their argument chose to waive that question, and to rely wholly upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the license system. Having adopted a theory, they should be held to abide by it. It has often been decided that every case must proceed upon a definite theory. Parties cannot adopt one theory in the trial court, and a different theory in the appellate court.

I think that we must therefore assume, since the record shows nothing to the contrary, that appellant's contention in support of the demurrer to the answer was the same in the trial court as it is here, to wit, that the law licensing saloons is unconstitutional and void; and I think we must also assume that the trial court ruled upon the demurrer on that theory solely, holding against appellants that the law is constitutional; and further, that the court did not otherwise rule, nor intend to rule upon the question as to whether the answer constituted a sufficient defense to the acts complained of.

Courts are not called upon to decide questions not presented and argued by the parties, nor is it, as I think, equitable between the parties, nor just to the court trying the case, to reverse its decision upon a theory different from that on which the cause was tried and different likewise from that on which the case is presented on appeal.

This principle is very fully developed in chapter 24 of Elliott's Appellate Procedure; in section 489 of that work it is said that, "parties must stand by the positions assumed in the trial court, and upon which they asked and obtained rulings. The same rulings are to be reviewed, and not different ones." And in section 494: "If the parties put a definite construction upon the pleadings in the trial court, and induce the court to act upon that construction, they must adhere to it on appeal. . . . Pleadings will be treated on appeal as the parties elected to treat them in the trial court."

If, then, the parties in this case, in arguing the demurrer to the answer, and the court in ruling upon that demurrer, proceeded upon the theory that appellants demurred for the reason that the answer was insufficient as being based upon an unconstitutional law, I do not think we should now pass upon that ruling of the court by assuming a different theory. Indeed, counsel does not ask this. He does not ask to have the demurrer sustained for any reason but because the license law is invalid, and says emphatically that "if the law in that respect is valid then the defense as set up in the respective answers of the appellees is complete." In addition to the express waiver so made, the failure of counsel to argue in his briefs any question in the case but the validity and constitutionality of the license law is, by the settled decisions of this court, a waiver of all other objections to the answer.

"It is essential," says Judge Elliott in his Appellate Procedure, section 444, "that all points be made in the brief and properly made; if not so made, they are waived. Many cases affirm this doctrine."

As nearly as the case of Bates v. Bulla, 6 Ind. 86, the court ruled that, "all points not made by brief may be treated as waived."

In the case of Donovan v. Stewart, 15 Ind. 498, it was said: "We are inclined to think that the points in the case, if any such exist, are not shown by the brief filed by the three attorneys whose names are signed thereto, and are consequently waived."

In Burk v. Hill, 55 Ind. 419, the court said: "The sufficiency of the second paragraph of complaint is questioned by an assignment of error, but the question is not discussed in the briefs of the parties,—indeed, it seems to be waived. We therefore dispose of it at once by holding the paragraph good."

In Martin v. Martin, 74 Ind. 207, it was said by Woods, J.: "That the rules of practice are a part of the laws of the land; that we have no right to disregard them; and that following these rules on appeal, 'we never go beyond the brief of the appellant to search the record in quest of errors which have not been pointed out in the brief, but the appellee, without filing any brief at all, is entitled to the benefit of everything in the record which may prevent a reversal of the judgment upon the errors assigned.'"

In the Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferris, 103 Ind. 91, the statement is: "As this question was not suggested in the original brief and argument of appellant's counsel, nor until after the brief for appellee had been filed and the case taken up for consideration by the court, we think it might well be regarded as waived."

In the Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Grantham, 104 Ind. 358, the court said: "In this court, the appellant has assigned a number of errors, but of these only one is noticed even by its learned counsel in his brief of this cause. . . . Of course, under the settled practice of this court, the other errors assigned by appellant, but not discussed by its counsel, are regarded here as waived, and are not considered. Goldberry v. State, 69 Ind. 430; Williams v. Potter, 72 Ind. 354; Coffin v. Asbury University Trustees, 92 Ind. 337."

In Carr v. State (Ind.) 20 L. R. A. 863, decided at last term, objection was made in the court below to certain offered evidence. This court found the questions by which the evidence was sought to be introduced informal, but held that, as the objection to the evidence was sustained with express reference to the subject matter, and not to the form of the questions, and as no objection was made in this court to the form of the questions, the correctness of the ruling should be determined as if no such informality had existed. That was the theory upon which the court ruled below, and that was also the theory upon which argument was had in this court. See also, Kimberlin v. Tow, 183 Ind. 696, and Funk v. Bentschler, Feb. 18, 1893, both decided at last term, and Thompson v. McCorkle, Sept. 26, 1893, decided at this term. Also, Works, Pr. § 1099, and authorities there collected.

Whether, therefore, the demurrer in the case at bar should be sustained by reason of the insufficiency of the answer as a defense to the alleged acts complained of by appellants, and their demand for relief therefrom by injunction, or for any other reason than the alleged invalidity of the license law, is a question which has been waived by the failure of counsel to discuss the same, and, as I think, should not be considered.

The license law being valid, we must presume, until the contrary is shown, that appellee's business being lawful in itself, was conducted in a lawful manner; that they did only what they had a right to do with their own.

In Barnard v. Shirley, June 6, 1893, decided at last term, it was said: "No principle of law is better settled than that a man has a right to the lawful use and enjoyment of his own property, and that if in the enjoyment of such right, without negligence or malice, an inconvenience or loss occurs to his neighbor, it is a wrong for which there is no liability. This must be so, or every man would be at the mercy of his neighbor in the use and enjoyment of his own."

It is true that there are certain well-known exceptions to this general rule, but until it is shown that some such exception applies, or that negligence or malice in the conduct of the business exists, or the law is otherwise violated, the owner will not be disturbed in the use and enjoyment of his property.

In the case before us, there is no unlawful act charged. According to the complaint, the appellee Stehlin established a saloon and engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors, to be drunk on the premises; he advertised his business by putting up printed signs, and provided different entrances to his building; persons have ever since been invited and received into said premises to buy from him and drink intoxicating liquors, and meet together there for that purpose, and are seen by the public going in and coming out. That is the sum and substance of what is 22 L. R. A.

charged against appellees; and it is acknowledged in the complaint that the appellees claim that they are authorized to do these things by virtue of a license duly issued by the board of county commissioners.

Appellees themselves answered this complaint by setting up their license and averring that the business has been conducted in pursuance of such license. The truth of this answer is not denied, but on the contrary, by the demurrer it is admitted to be true. No negligence or malice is charged, no violation of the liquor law, or of any other law of the state is alleged. We are brought, then to the conclusion, according to the opinion of the majority of the court, that a lawful business, carried on in a lawful manner, is yet a nuisance; that a man setting up on his own land a business made lawful by the statutes of the state, and conducting this business in a peaceful and quiet manner, without any wrong-doing on his part whatever, may yet be assessed damages because his neighbor's property is incidentally lessened in value. I do not think, this is the law. If a modest mechanic's shop, or a small and plain house, the best he can afford, is set up on a little lot of his beside a splendid mansion, in a fashionable part of a city, it will undoubtedly lessen the value of the fine property adjacent. Can the owner of the marble palace and the beautiful lawns and pleasure grounds therefore collect damages from the mechanic who has set himself down before the great man's door? Not in England, where every man's home is his castle; still more, not in free America, where all men are equal.

And if, as follows from the decision of the court in this case, a man may collect damages because the value of his property is lessened by the lawful business in which his neighbor engages, why may not a merchant bring suit against the man who sets up another lawful business next door, which may perchance lessen the popular favor which the merchant has heretofore enjoyed?

It is hardly necessary to further intimate the mischievous results which must, as I think, inevitably flow from thus practically, and that, too, without any legislative sanction, engraving so definite a feature of local option upon our license system. If the people desire local option, and the constitution and the laws are so framed as to sanction it, it seems to me it will then be time enough for the courts to do so.

If there were any improper conduct, any violation of the law, any boisterousness or noise, anything injurious to health or offensive to the senses charged against appellees, I could see some reason for declaring the place a nuisance; and I do not think that the authorities show that a business so conducted can be found a nuisance, simply because the presence of even a properly conducted saloon is offensive, and because adjacent property is incidentally lessened in value.

In St. James Church v. Arrington, 86 Ala. 546, 76 Am. Dec. 332, the court held that a private nuisance would be abated only when the matter complained of is a nuisance per se or when it has been declared a nuisance by law; and hence, that the erection of a private stable near a church building would not be enjoined, a stable not being unavoidably and of itself a nuisance.

In Wolcott v. Melick, 11 N. J. Eq. 204, 66 Am. Dec. 790, it was held that an injunction to prevent the erection of a building for manufacturing purposes, on the ground of its being a nuisance to an adjoining dwelling house, would not be granted unless a very strong case should be made, and one which is marked by some very peculiar features. To the same effect was Van Bergen v. Van Bergen, 8 Johns. Ch. 282, 1 L. ed. 619, 8 Am. Dec. 511, decided by Chancellor Kent.

In State v. Hall, 52 N. J. L. 153, the supreme court of New Jersey held that a ten-pin alley, kept for public use in a village, even though kept in connection with a lager beer saloon, is not, per se a nuisance.

In Pfingst v. Senn, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 325, it was claimed by neighboring residents that certain premises were to be reopened which had before been used as a pleasure resort garden, with ten-pins, dancing and band music till early morning, where the noise would keep the neighbors awake to the detriment of their health and comfort, and where crowds of idle, disorderly persons were attracted and became a nuisance in the streets; that all this was not due to the management, but inherent in the business. The court of appeals of Kentucky held that a nuisance was not clearly made out. In the course of the opinion, the court said: "Nor are the things about to be done in themselves nuisances. There can be beer gardens and pleasure resorts, music, and dancing and yet no nuisance set up. Admittedly, the conduct of such exercises, or the running of such a business may result in inconvenience and annoyance to neighbors not participating. It may render the location less eligible as a place of residence for people who pay high rents, and are of 'dainty modes and habits of living' (Wood Nuisance, § 800), but nevertheless, these places and modes of amusement are not to be condemned or denounced as nuisances in themselves. . . . One living in a city, it was said (in Louisville Coffin Co. v. Warren, 78 Ky. 400), 'must necessarily submit to the annoyances which are incidental to city life.'"

In Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. 274, 98 Am. Dec. 221, it was well said by the learned Chief Justice: "It is a difficult matter at all times to strike the true medium between the conflicting interests and tastes of people in a densely populated city."

These cases, and many others, go very much farther than it would be necessary to go in this case in order to hold that the business of appellees as conducted by them is not a nuisance, and that they are not liable for damages because the adjacent property had been rendered less valuable without any fault on their part.

I may say, besides, that were this an appeal from a judgment based upon an order of the board of county commissioners, renewing or refusing to renew a license to appellees in the locality where the acts complained of were done, the case, as I think, would be a stronger one for appellants than is the case before us, which is, in some respects a collateral attack upon the order of the board granting the license.

I have no doubt, as already intimated, that the question of locality is one which the board of county commissioners, or the court on appeal, ought to take into consideration in determining the fitness or unfitness of an applicant for a license to conduct a saloon. The statute itself, section 5814, Rev. Stat. 1881, seems to imply as much.

In Estlinger v. East, 100 Ind. 494, objection was made to the introduction of certain evidence showing where the building in which license was applied for was situate, with reference to a public square and to a college and a graded school and how many school children usually passed the building in going to and returning from school. This court approved a ruling admitting the evidence. Judge Mitchell, speaking for the court, after alluding to the requirement of the statute, that the applicant for license should state in his notice "the precise location of the premises in which he desires to sell" said that while the inquiry must always be as to the fitness of the applicant to be entrusted with the sale of intoxicating liquor, yet "it may well have been supposed (by the legislature) that in determining the fitness of things, a court or jury might take into account whether, under all the evidence, an applicant in a particular case was a fit person to be entrusted with the sale of intoxicating liquors, if the place proposed was such that only a man possessed of an extraordinary degree of circumspection and caution could fitly conduct the business at that place, with a due regard to the situation and surroundings."

That, however, was an appeal from the action of the board of county commissioners as to granting a license in the first place. Here there is an attack on the authority of the license after it is duly granted.

Besides, in this case, there is no question of the fitness of the appellee to keep a saloon. His character and fitness are not even called in question. It is the saloon itself, as a saloon simply, and a properly conducted saloon, that is objected to. And here we return to the real question at issue. This saloon is objected to, not that it is in any way improperly carried on, but simply because it is a saloon, and because the law authorizing it is unconstitutional, and void. All other questions are waived by appellants in their argument, and by the rules of this court should not, as I think, be considered.

The waiver, too, is not an implied one simply, but is an express waiver. And counsel candidly gives us his reason for the waiver, saying: "If this were the only saloon in Indiana, located as it is, I dare say there would be little difficulty in suppressing it, but as it is a part of a great system, we are compelled to attack the system."

Appellants thus seek to uphold their demurrer to the answer setting up the license on the sole ground "that such license is no defense, because the law pretending to authorize the same is unconstitutional and void."

It does not seem to me that we are justified in ignoring the positions taken by the parties before the lower court, and in their appeal to this court. If there was error on the trial, that error should be presented here by the party appealing. We cannot reverse a judgment for a reason that the lower court had no opportunity to pass upon. Appellants' briefs show that the invalidity of the liquor law was the question presented to the lower court. The briefs also show that to be the question presented to this court. Shall we then do what Woods, J., in Martin v. Martin, supra, said the courts would never do,—"go beyond the brief of the appellant to search the record in quest of errors which have not been pointed out in the brief?" I think we should not, and that the appellees are themselves "entitled to the benefit of everything in the record which may prevent a reversal of the judgment." By the decision of the majority of the court, it would seem as if this rule was to be changed, and that hereafter the burden would be upon the appellee to show that the record was without error, rather than upon the appellant to point out the error, if any there should be. To me, however, the long established rule seems the fair one to be applied in this case, fair to the parties and fair to the court below, which could only pass upon the questions presented to it for consideration and decision. The theory of appellants' complaint and of appellees' answer, the theory recognized in the trial court and urged in the briefs in this court, bears wholly upon the constitutionality of the liquor license law. I am therefore of opinion, without even considering the fact that this saloon is properly conducted according to law, and is not a nuisance in itself, that the demurrer was properly overruled, and that the judgment ought consequently to be affirmed.

Petition for second rehearing denied March 14, 1894.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Div. 2).

Floyd CRANDALL, Resp't.,

v.

Robert ALLEN, App't.

(.....Mo.....)

1. Accretions formed in front of the land of several owners belong to them all and cannot be claimed by one, with whose land the first point of contact was made.
2. Accretions which begin to form upon land which was originally not riparian but became such by the washing away of a portion of an intermediate tract, and which continue to form until they reach the latter tract and then fill out in front of it, replacing some of its washed-out portion, do not all belong to the land on which they begin to form, but that portion of them which forms beyond its original boundary line and along the washed-out portion of the adjoining land belongs to the latter.

(December 7, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cole County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover possession of certain land which had been formed by accretion along the shore of the Missouri River. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Silver & Brown, for appellant: That land formed by accretion belongs to the owner of the contiguous tract to which the accretion is made, is a fundamental principle.

Land not originally riparian becomes so when the river has reached it by gradually washing away all the intervening land.

NOTE.—For extensive treatment of the question of the division of alluvion flats or water front, see note to Northern Pine-Land Co. v. Bigelow (Wis.) 21 L. R. A. 776. The present case adds to the subject a novel decision on peculiar facts.

Naylor v. Coz, 114 Mo. 232; Welles v. Bailey, 55 Conn. 292. See also Rees v. McDaniel, 115 Mo. 145.

And where the lot originally not riparian becomes so by such change of the river-bed, there attach to it all the incidents of riparian land.

Welles v. Bailey, supra.

Among these incidents is that of the right of appropriating to itself gradual accretions from the river where, by a change in the movement of the bed, it begins to recede, and leave soil upon its front.

Ibid.

And this right of appropriation does not cease when the original limits have been restored.

Ibid.

Messrs. Pope, Edwards & Davison for respondent.

Gantt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment for 8.18 acres of land, described by metes and bounds. Plaintiffs assert title to it as a part of the S. E. fractional $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 21, township 45, range 12, and defendant claims it as an accretion to lands he owns in section 28, in the same township and range, to wit, the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 28. On the trial, and in his answer, defendant admitted he was in possession of all the lands described in the petition, but disclaimed all title or right to "so much of said land as lies north of the line between sections 28 and 21, in township 45, range 12, and west of a line beginning at a point on said line between said sections 28 and 21, 16 chains east of the northwest corner of the northeast quarter of said section 28, and extending north by a straight line to the slough of the Missouri river," and denied plaintiffs' right to the remainder of the land. It was admitted that plaintiffs, as the heirs-at-law of Floyd Crandall, their father, the original plaintiff in this cause, now deceased, were the owners of the S. E. fractional quarter of section 21, under meane conveyances from the original patentee to said land from the United States, and that defendant was likewise the owner of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 28. It was shown that the Missouri river borders on, and constitutes the eastern boundary line of, said S. E. fractional $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 21; that the direction of the river along the eastern side of this land is from the northwest to the southeast; that since it was originally surveyed, and patented by the government of the United States, six or seven acres of it has washed away, but has since been restored, by accretion, to the eastern boundary. Defendant's evidence tended to show (1) that so much of the land sued for as lies north of the line between sections 28 and 21 (township 45, range 12), and east of a line beginning at a point on said line between sections 28 and 21, 16 chains east from the N. W. corner of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 28, and extending north by a straight line to the Missouri river, had been washed away by the Missouri river; (2) that said washing and cutting in extended in on defendant's land lying south of the line between sections 21 and 28, leaving defendant's land south of said line bordering on the Missouri river; (3) that afterwards land began to re-form to defendant's land so bordering on the Missouri river, and that said land so formed by degrees—that is, by accretion,—and gradually extended over the line between sections 21 and 28; that the land so formed, and north of said section line between sections 21 and 28, is that part of the land in suit, which defendant claims; that said land is east of plaintiffs' land in section 21, and north of defendant's land in section 28; that the river runs from the northwest to southeast. Defendant also introduced evidence tending to show that he had known the land since 1857; that he had bought it in 1880, and claimed possession of it since then, and fenced it in about four years before suit was brought.

Thereupon the court instructed the jury, on behalf of the plaintiffs, as follows: "(1) If the jury believes and finds from the evidence that the land described in plaintiff's petition was in the possession of the defendant at the commencement of this suit, and that plaintiff was the owner of the same, or that the same was formed by accretion made to the mainland, of which the plaintiff was the owner, then they will find for the plaintiff, and also find for him for damages whatever the reasonable rental value of the land is worth from the 2d day of February, 1888, until the present time, and also the value of timber taken by defendant, and will also assess the monthly rents and profits of whatever they may believe from the evidence that such is worth, not to exceed $5 per month. (2) In an instrument made either by the government or by an individual, if a boundary such as a river is called for, the tract must have that boundary. (3) The call for a natural object in a deed or grant, as a river, will control both course and distance; and if the plaintiff's deeds called for the Missouri river, and that defendant had and still holds the possession thereof wrongfully from plaintiff, they will find for the plaintiff." "(4) Although the jury may believe that the portion of lands contained in the deeds to plaintiff at any time washed entirely away, or in part, after the same was surveyed and patented by the United States government, yet if they further find that the land in controversy is a re-formation of said lands on the bed of the river where said lands formerly existed, then plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action, if it be shown that the defendant unlawfully detained the same. (5) If the jury finds that the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, were in possession and the owners of the land in controversy, then the fact that the lands had washed away, and other land formed on the bed thereof by accretions, does not change or deprive plaintiffs of title to same." The court gave all the foregoing instructions asked by plaintiffs, and defendant objected and excepted.

The court, then, at request of defendant, gave the following instructions: "(8) The court instructs the jury that the term 'accretion,' as used in these instructions, means portions of soil added to that already in possession of the owner by gradual deposit caused by the washing of the river. (4) The court instructs the jury that, if they find for plaintiff for only a part of the land claimed by him in this suit, they will express in the verdict the part of said land plaintiff is so entitled to recover. (5) The court instructs the jury that an accretion partakes of the character of the land by the conveyance of the latter, and it makes no difference in this case whether the alleged accretion was formed to defendant's land before or since he became the owner thereof, provided the jury find it actually did so form by way of accretion. (6) The court instructs the jury that if they shall find and believe from the evidence that, for ten years next before the bringing of this action, the defendant was in the public, open, and adverse possession of the land in dispute, claiming the ownership thereof, then such possession and claim of ownership constitutes a good defense for defendant, and the jury will find for him,"—and refused the following, also prayed by defendant: "(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant is the owner of the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the west half of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 28, township 45, range 12, in Cole county, Mo., which at the time of the government survey of the same was cut off from the Missouri river by intervening land, but that said intervening land was washed away by change of the river bed until a portion of defendant's land bordered on the river, and that afterwards additions were made to defendant's land so fronting on the river by gradual and imperceptible accretions or additions thereto by the sediment or deposit of the river, then defendant is entitled to all such accretions to his front, to the present margin of the river, and the jury will so find. (2) The court instructs the jury that although a tract of land may not originally have bordered on a river, being cut off therefrom by an intervening tract, yet if such intervening tract is washed away until the remoter tract borders on the river, the latter then becomes riparian, and is entitled to the riparian right of accretions,"—and defendant duly excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.

The appellant, upon the foregoing facts, submits that the main question involved in his appeal is this: "Although a tract of land may not originally have bordered on a river, being separated therefrom by an intervening tract, yet, if such intervening tract is washed away until the remote tract borders on the river, the latter then becomes riparian, and is entitled to the riparian rights of accretion, even though such accretion extends beyond the original line dividing the two tracts." Naylor v. Cox, 114 Mo. 282, is cited as authority for this position, but it is misapprehension of that case to apply it to the undisputed facts of this case. In Naylor v. Cox the accretion began to the island, between which and the Howard county shore the Missouri river ran. The accretion gradually pushed the river north, until it cut away a large portion of the bank on the north, or Howard county side; the river thus changing its bed, but still preserving, as long as it ran, a water front to each tract of land. We held that the river was a natural boundary on defendant's land, and, as it had cut away and destroyed a part of his land, his boundary receded as the river encroached upon him, and although the accretions to the island on the opposite side increased until they passed the line of survey, which once defined defendant's southern boundary, they belonged to the owner of the island. With that decision we are still satisfied, but we think this record presents a very different proposition. In the case at bar, both proprietors own their lands on the west bank of the Missouri river; the plaintiffs' land lying immediately north of, and adjoining, defendant's on the south. The proposition of defendant, that if the river cut away and destroyed all the land that originally intervened between his land in section 28 and the river, until the river formed in fact his eastern or northern boundary, he thereby became a riparian owner, is true enough, in one sense; but it is not true, either in reason or upon authority, that it would enable him, by means of the accretion to his own shore, to appropriate all the alluvion or accretions that formed in front of his neighbor's shore on the same side of the river or water front. We find nothing in the record that questions that this accretion in front of plaintiffs' land formed to their shore; but it is assumed by defendant that if it began to form on the north of his land, as the river then ran, until it extended up in front of plaintiffs' boundary on the same river, it then became defendant's by reason of the alluvion having first made its appearance on his northern boundary. The inevitable consequence of this claim would be, if carried to its logical conclusion, that defendant would thus become possessor of the river front, not only in front of plaintiffs, but of all other riparian owners, wherever the accretion extended east of a line drawn north from a point on the line between sections 21 and 28, 16 chains east of the N. W. corner of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section No. 28, if it was continuous. In a word, the contention is simply this: that if, in the forming of accretions along a river front, it can be shown that the point of contact was first made to lands of one of the riparian owners, he is entitled thereby to the whole accretion subsequently made to the lands of other riparian owners on either side of him, and although this would thus cut off their water boundaries and privileges. As before said, there is no warrant for this claim in Naylor v. Cox, or any other case within our knowledge. On the contrary, the authorities are numerous and well considered which scrupulously preserve to each adjoining riparian owner his water boundaries and privileges. In Lamprey v. Metcalf, 52 Minn.—, 18 L. R. A. 670, the supreme court of Minnesota, in discussing the reason for the law giving accretions and relictions to the riparian owner, says: "The reasons usually given for the rule are either that it falls within the maxim 'de minimis lex non curat,' or that, because the riparian owner is liable to lose soil by the action or encroachment of the water, he should also have the benefit of any land gained by the same action. But it seems to us that the rule rests upon a much broader principle, and has a much more important purpose in view, viz. to preserve the fundamental riparian right—on which all others depend, and which constitutes the principal value of the land—of access to the water. The incalculable mischiefs that would follow if a riparian owner is liable to be cut off from access to water, and another owner sandwiched in between him and it, whenever the water line has been changed by accretions or relictions, are self evident, and have been frequently animadverted on by the court."

When the witnesses were asked in front of whose land the river now ran, they answered, "As much in front of plaintiffs' as defendant's," or "About as much of one as the other," and defendant said that after the accretion formed "it was east of plaintiffs' land, and north of mine." The apportionment of alluvion is by no means new in the judicial history of this country, and many rules have been suggested and adopted to secure to each riparian owner his just proportion of the accretions. Thus, in Deerfield v. Arms, 17 Pick. 41, 28 Am. Dec. 276, Chief Justice Shaw quoted and adopted a rule of the civil law found in Denisart's Collection of New Cases, in France (1783), and says of it: "The rule suggested in this work is founded upon the obvious consideration already alluded to, that in many cases lands which border upon navigable rivers derive a great part of their actual value from that circumstance, and from the benefit of the public easement thereby annexed to such lands, and that being wholly deprived of the benefit of that situation would operate as a great hardship, and do real injustice to a riparian proprietor, although he should obtain his full proportion of the land, measured by the surface. This injustice will be avoided by the proposed rule, in conformity with which each proprietor will keep a larger or smaller proportion of the alluvial formation, and of the newly formed river or shore line, according to the extent of his original line on the shore of the river." After giving the rule, he says further: "This mode of distribution secures to each riparian proprietor the benefit of continuing to hold to the river shore, whatever changes may take place in the condition of the river by accretion, and the rule is obviously founded in that principle of equity upon which the distribution is to be made." See also Gould, Waters, §§ 162-164, and cases cited; Gray v. Deluce, 5 Cush. 9; Thornton v. Grant, 10 R. I. 487, 14 Am. Rep. 701; Kehr v. Snyder, 114 Ill. 818, 55 Am. Rep. 866.

In this case the court, in effect, instructed the jury that, if this was accretion to plaintiffs' land on their river front, they were entitled to it, and declined to instruct that if the accretions began on defendant's land, and extended north in front of plaintiffs' lands on the river, defendant was entitled to it, though its effect might be to cut off plaintiffs from their water boundary and rights. We think the circuit court was correct, under the facts of the case. Plaintiffs were the exclusive riparian proprietors, as to these accretions that formed on the east of their land, on the Missouri river, and were most clearly entitled to recover them. As was said in Manchester v. Point Street Iron Works, 13 R. I. 355, and approved in Kehr v. Snyder, 114 Ill. 818, 55 Am. Rep. 866, "one common principle, which pervades all modes of division [of accretion or alluvion], is that no regard is to be paid to the direction of the side lines between contiguous proprietors." "In all cases when practicable, every proprietor is entitled to a frontage of the same width on the new shore as on the old shore, and at low-water mark as well as at high-water mark, without regard to the side lines of the upland." Gould, Waters, § 162. Giving plaintiffs their original river front would necessarily secure them the land in suit.

We have examined the other assignments but find no substantial error, and the judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

RE Rachel A. BRAMBERRY'S ESTATE.

(October 2, 1893.)

APPEAL OF H. James BRAMBERRY.

(156 Pa. 628.)

1. A conveyance of land to a husband and wife in consummation of their joint purchase of it during coverture vests in them an estate by entireties.
2. A mortgage taken in the joint names of husband and wife on the sale of land held as tenants by the entirety is presumed to be held by the same estate.

APPEAL by H. James Bramberry, administrator of the estate of Rachel A. Bramberry, deceased, from a decree of the Orphans Court for Chester County dismissing exceptions to the report of an auditor surcharging him, in the settlement of his accounts as administrator, with one-half of the amount of a certain mortgage given jointly to himself and his wife, which he claimed as his individual property. Reversed.

The material portion of the auditor's report was as follows:

NOTE.—Tenancy by the entireties, in personal property.

The decision in the above case, that a mortgage taken in the joint names of husband and wife on the sale of land held as tenants by the entireties is presumed to be held by the same estate, is a very important one, considering the number of decisions which hold that this kind of tenancy is not abolished by the married women's statute. This is, we believe, substantially, if not entirely a pioneer decision. Although the opinion in the case states that a tenancy by the entireties may exist in personal as well as real property, this can be true only in a modified sense, in the absence of statutes abolishing the common-law disabilities of married women. The power of the husband at common law to reduce to his possession all choses in action of the wife, and, in the case of securities taken in their joint names, to dispose of them and appropriate the proceeds, clearly prevented the existence at common law of a tenancy by the entireties in its true sense in personal property.

The case of Gillan v. Dixon, 65 Pa. 306, cited in the main case as authority for the doctrine that a tenancy by entireties may exist in personal property, is one of a class of cases holding that choses in action owned by husband and wife jointly would survive to the wife on the husband's death, in case they were not reduced to his possession during his lifetime. But these cases do not restrict his right to cut off the wife's interest entirely by reducing the choses in action to his possession. Therefore, the joint interest of husband and wife is not, in the strict sense, a tenancy by the entireties.

In Gillan v. Dixon, supra, choses in action belonging to a daughter, which on her death passed to the father and mother jointly, were held to survive to the wife, where the husband died before administration and distribution of the daughter's estate, as in that case it was impossible for him to reduce them to possession during his life.

To the same effect it is held in Frankenfield v. Gruver, 7 Pa. 448, that personal estate passing to father and mother of an intestate survives to the mother, if not reduced to possession by the father during his life.

The same is true of a bequest to a husband and wife. Hamm v. Melsenheiter, 9 Watts, 349.

And a recognition in an orphans' court for the wife's share of land taken in the name of both husband and wife, survives to her, if not reduced into

"The exceptions to the account are merely formal, and state that the accountant has not charged himself with all the money that has come, or should have come, into his hands, but the chief contention is in relation to the supposed interest of the decedent in a certain bond and mortgage in the possession of the accountant, and the facts relating to them are as follows, viz.: Lewis Seal and Susan W., his wife, by deed dated March 28, A. D. 1865, conveyed certain premises therein mentioned to Henry James Bramberry and Rachel A., his wife, which said premises they conveyed to Dr. Benjamin Thompson by deed dated March 11, A. D. 1890, and recorded in the recorder's office of Chester county in Deed Book T 10, vol. 241, page 18, and secured on the said premises the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, by the bond and mortgage of the said Dr. Benjamin Thompson for that amount, dated March 28, A. D. 1890, drawn to H. James Bramberry and Rachel A., his wife, payable in five years at five per cent interest, payable half-yearly, the mortgage being found on record in the recorder's office aforesaid in Mortgage Book M 4, vol. 86, page 91, and was given to secure a part of the purchase money of the said premises. This mortgage is not yet due, and a part only of it, with accrued interest, has been paid, and no part of either principal or interest is found in the administrator's account. The claim made by the party excepting is that one half of this sum, viz. seven hundred and fifty dollars, with one half of the interest thereof, belongs to the estate of the said decedent, and should be accounted for by her administrator. The position taken by the accountant is that as the land sold by Lewis Seal and wife was conveyed to the said Henry James Bramberry and Rachel A., his wife, they, under the provisions of the common law, fortified by a long line of decisions of our own courts, took an estate by entirety, and not by moieties, and that, in the event of the death of either of them in the lifetime of the other, the whole estate would immediately vest in the survivor; and when they sold this land to Dr. Thompson, and took a purchase-money mortgage to both of them as husband and wife, the same principle would follow the mortgage, and, when Rachel A. Bramberry died, her interest in the mortgage immediately vested in her surviving husband. If this position is the true one, then the accountant is right in not taking into his account one half of said bond and mortgage debt and its interest. But is the husband's possession or disposed of by him. Lodge v. Hamilton, 2 Serg. & R. 498.

So notes taken in the name of both husband and wife go the survivor on the death of either. Shields v. Stillman, 48 Mo. 86; Abshire v. State, 53 Ind. 64.

In Re Albrecht, infra, it is said: "We are aware that there are many authorities holding that where the husband purchases a security, or makes a deposit, or subscribes for stock in the joint name of himself and wife, and pays therefor with his own funds, upon his death the entire security belongs to the wife, if she survives him. But the decision in all these cases is put upon the ground that it is apparent from the character of the transaction that the husband intended to give the property to his wife in the event of her survivorship, and hence the transfer possesses all the essential qualities of a gift causa mortis which he may revoke in his lifetime, and which does not take effect until his death, if not previously recalled." These cases evidently have no real bearing on the question of a tenancy by the entirety in such personal property.

In this class of cases also are Sanford v. Sanford, 45 N. Y. 723; Craig v. Craig, 3 Barb. Ch. 104, 5 L. ed. 835; Johnson v. Lusk, 6 Coldw. 113, 38 Am. Dec. 445; Borst v. Spelman, 4 N. Y. 288; Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum v. Strain, 2 Bradf. 84; Re Brooks, 5 Dem. 226; Platt v. Grubb, 1 N. Y. S. R. 484; Draper v. Jackson, 16 Mass. 498.

It is expressly stated in Abshire v. State, supra, that personal property is not subject to a tenancy by the entirety, and this statement as we have seen, must be regarded as correct, where the wife's common-law disabilities and the husband's control over her whole property exist. But under the modern statutes existing in most states, allowing a married woman to hold separate property, and in some states freeing her from all restrictions, a tenancy by the entirety might be possible. So that the decision in the main case may be more important than it would appear to be at first thought. It is conceivable that under these modern statutes the doctrine of tenancy by the entirety might be applied to personal as well as real property, but the few decisions really touching the question have not fully settled the law on the question.

Surplus moneys arising out of a foreclosure sale of premises held as tenants by the entirety are regarded as real estate, subject to the same tenancy. Germania Sav. Bank v. Jung, 28 Abb. N. C. 81. But this decision is based expressly on the theory that such surplus proceeds are not to be regarded as personality.

In Patton v. Rankin, 66 Ind. 245, 34 Am. Rep. 254, a crop raised on land held by an estate in entirety is regarded the same as the land, so as not to be subject to a levy against the husband alone. But in these cases as well as in Re Bramberry, the main case the property held by this estate is connected with, and in some sense derived from, land thus held and there seems to be no case in which personal property, under modern statutes, has been held to be the subject of a tenancy by the entirety, where it did not in some way grow out of, or represent, real property held by that estate.

Tenancy by the entirety does not exist in a bond and mortgage executed to husband and wife for moneys, of which each individually contributed a part, but upon the death of either his or her share vests in his or her personal representatives. Re Albrecht, 18 L. R. A. 329, 136 N. Y. 91.

Under a statute providing that a wife shall have her separate property to the "same extent as before marriage," an investment by husband and wife in securities to which they contribute equal shares of the funds, taking their securities in their joint names, is held to belong to them equally and not to be subject to survivorship. Wait v. Bovee, 35 Mich. 425.

So, under the statute giving a wife her separate estate, an annuity charged on land in favor of husband and wife for their joint lives and to the survivor for life, does not give the husband the entire interest during the joint lives, but they take by moieties, and the husband, if he receives the whole annuity during his wife's lifetime, is a trustee of her portion. Sloan v. Frothingham, 72 Ala. 589.

Husband and wife may also be tenants in common of personal property. Chambovet v. Cagney, 3 Jones & S. 474; Kaufman v. Schoffel, 46 Hun, 571.

B. A. R.

this position the true one? and will the common-law doctrine governing estates by entireties of husband and wife apply to the case now on hand? There can be no doubt about the common-law principle relating to cases where land is conveyed to husband and wife, which declares that they take by entireties, 'per tout et non per my.' See 2 Chitty, Bl. 147, 148. This principle, while repeatedly affirmed and reaffirmed by our supreme court, is very clearly stated in the late case of Fleek v. Zillhaver, 117 Pa. 213, and it is unnecessary to spend further time in the investigation of a principle so thoroughly established in our law. This principle, then, while it may be now, as it was before the passage of the Married Persons' Property Act of June 8, A. D. 1887 (Pub. Laws, 1887, p. 883), held to be indisputable, of which your auditor has serious doubts, still the principle or doctrine cannot, in the opinion of your auditor, be made to apply to the case in point. In this case the real estate held by husband and wife by entireties was by their joint and mutual action sold, and the realty was thereby converted into personalty, and after this conversion they invest $1,600 of the proceeds of the sale in the same land, and secure their investment by bond and mortgage. By doing this they obtain a lien upon the land, but no interest in it. In Craft v. Webster, 4 Rawle, 255, the supreme court says: 'A mortgage in Pennsylvania is literally and legally now understood to be but a bare security for the payment of the money, or the performance of other acts therein mentioned;' and a number of cases are cited by the court in support of this doctrine. It is clear, then, that at this stage of the case the property is personalty, and not realty. Now, if the property is personal estate at this stage of the case, whose personal estate is it? Does it belong to the husband, to the wife, or to both together? The testimony of E. B. Speakman, who, being an interested witness, was called only to testify of matters occurring since the death of the decedent, said 'he [H. J. Bramberry] told me that it [the mortgage] was one half hers and one half his, and Mr. Bramberry stated that his opinion before he consulted counsel was that one half of the mortgage would go to his wife's estate.' Your auditor is convinced that one half of the money secured by the Dr. Thompson bond and mortgage was and is the separate personal property of the decedent.

"This fact being established, the next point to be considered is this: If husband and wife, each owning respective sums of money in their own right, place them together in one loan, and secure the same by bond and mortgage drawn to both of them, in which they are designated as husband and wife, will the adoption of this form of security carry with it the common-law principle of an estate by entireties in the whole sum invested, with the incident of survivorship, so that, in the event of the death of either before the mortgage is collected, the survivor will take the whole amount? The counsel for the accountant argues affirmatively, and cites in support of his position the case of Donnelly's Estate, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 196; but in that case there is no evidence of who was the owner of the money, and, in addition to that, the case was clogged with a special agreement which controlled it, and upon which it could not but be decided. That case, then, gives us no light, and your auditor is of the opinion that the investment in manner aforesaid would not deprive the estate of one half of the amount invested. This is not the case of a conveyance of land to husband and wife, nor the case of a devise of land to husband and wife, nor where personal estate is bequeathed to husband and wife, nor where realty or personalty falls to husband and wife under the provisions of the intestate laws of the state; but it is the case where a married woman possessing separate personal estate invests it upon real-estate security, and takes a bond and mortgage, drawn to her and her husband, who has invested a similar sum, and which is secured by the same mortgage. Why, in the event of her death before the mortgage matures, should her estate be swept away from her children, and the whole of it given to her surviving husband? If H. J. Bramberry and Rachel A. Bramberry had been brother and sister, then no one would for a moment suppose that the estate of either would lose anything in the event of the death of either before the collection of the debt. Then, if a different state of affairs exists in this case, it must be because they are husband and wife. Now, the Married Persons' Property Act of 1887 expressly says that hereafter marriage shall not be held to impose any disability on or incapacity in a married woman as to the acquisition, ownership, possession, control, use, or disposition of property of any kind, in any trade or business in which she may engage, or for necessities, and for the use, enjoyment, and improvement of her separate estate, real and personal, etc. This law, in the opinion of your auditor, controls the present case; and one half of the Dr. Thompson bond and mortgage being the separate personal estate of the said Rachel A. Bramberry, and the investment having been made since the passage of the Married Persons' Property Act of 1887, the money belongs to the estate of the said decedent, and must be accounted for by her administrator."

Mr. George B. Johnson, for appellant:

Husband and wife both hold real and personal estate which is in their joint names by entireties and not by moieties; and therefore, by right of survivorship, upon the death of either, the survivor takes the whole.

The principle of tenancy by entireties in real estate and the right of survivorship between persons jointly possessed of any chattel interest, created by the common law (2 Bl. Com. pp. 182-183, 399), has always been recognized and applied, as an established rule of construction, to all grants of real estate or personal property, or titles to choses in action, vested in a husband or wife during coverture, in Pennsylvania. No distinction seems to be made in this respect between personality and realty.

McCullum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming that the auditor's findings or deductions of facts were warranted by the evidence before him, we have a purchase by and a conveyance to husband and wife of seventeen acres of land, a payment by the wife from her separate estate of one half the purchase money, and a payment by the husband of the other half of it. The grantees held the land so purchased and conveyed twenty-five years, when they sold it, and took from their vendee his bond and mortgage to secure to them a portion of the purchase money. Ten days after this sale was consummated by a conveyance the wife died, and the question now presented for our determination is whether one half the sum so secured belongs to her estate, or her husband, as survivor, is the owner of the whole of it. The learned auditor's view, approved by the learned court below, was that, inasmuch as the wife's money was blended with the husband's in the purchase of the land, one half the proceeds arising from the sale of it belonged to her estate, although the obligation for such proceeds, like the conveyance of the land, was made to the husband and wife. It was also thought by the learned auditor that tenancy by entireties was abolished by the Act of June 3, 1887, relating to the property of married women and their control of it. A tenancy by entireties arises whenever an estate vests in two persons, they being, when it so vests, husband and wife. It may exist in personal as well as real property; in a chose in action as well as in a chose in possession. Freem. Coten, §§ 68, 69; Gillan v. Dixon, 65 Pa. 395. The common-law rule is that the words which, in a conveyance to unmarried persons, constitute a joint tenancy, will create, if the grantees are husband and wife, a tenancy by entireties. The tenancy established by a conveyance to husband and wife is not destroyed or affected by the Act of March 31, 1812, which abolished survivorship among joint tenants nor does the rule referred to yield to an express provision in the deed that the grantees shall hold the estate granted as tenants in common. Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397. It has been contended, and in some jurisdictions held, that the legislation which secures to the wife the enjoyment of her separate estate is destructive of the legal unity of husband and wife on which tenancies by entireties depend, but the better view is that such tenancies are not destroyed or impaired by it. 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 851, and cases cited. In Diver v. Diver, 56 Pa. 106, it was expressly decided that the Act of April 11, 1848, did not in any manner affect the creation and enjoyment of estates by entireties; and Strong, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "To hold it as operating upon the deed conveying land to a wife, making such deed assure a different estate from what it would have assured without the act, is to lose sight of the legislative purpose. Were we to do so it would become in many cases a means of divesting her of her property, instead of an instrument of protection. In the present case, if it has converted the estate granted to Diver and his wife into a tenancy in common, it has taken from her her ownership and enjoyment of the entirety during her husband's life, and her right of survivorship to the whole. We hold, then, that no such effect is to be given to the Act of 1848, or any of its cognate acts. The legal unity of husband and wife still remains, and consequently Mrs. Diver, on the death of her husband, succeeded to the whole estate granted by the deed." We think this language in reference to the Act of 1848 and tenancy by entirety is applicable to the Act of June 8, 1887, and the case under consideration. The Act of 1887, like the Act of 1848, was "intended to protect the property of the wife from the dominion or control of the husband, but not to change the nature of her estate, or to destroy the legal unity of person which characterizes their relations to each other." Gillan v. Dixon, supra. Prima facie the conveyance of the land in 1865 to H. James Bramberry and Rachel A. Bramberry, they being at the time husband and wife, vested in them an estate by entirety; and when, on the sale of the land in 1890, they accepted from their vendee his bond and mortgage to secure to them a portion of the purchase money, they held the sum so secured, not as joint tenants or tenants in common, but as tenants by the entirety. Freem. Coten. § 68, and cases cited. If either had died before the land was sold, the survivor would have held it against any claim of the heirs or creditors of the decedent and no valid reason appears for applying a different rule to the chose in action taken by them in their joint names for a portion of the purchase money. There is certainly nothing on the record to indicate that the parties intended a division of the sum between them, or to repel the presumption arising from the form of the obligation given to secure it. These obligations conform to the ownership established by the conveyance, and we may fairly conclude from them, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that it was the purpose of the vendors to hold the purchase money as they held the land.

We cannot say that the auditor erred in finding that the husband and wife were joint purchasers of the land, and that the wife paid from her separate estate one half the sum or price they gave for it. This finding was based on the declarations of the surviving husband, and, in a contest between him and the heirs of the wife, he ought not to complain that what he said about the purchase was accepted by the auditor as true. The facts so found did not change the character or qualities of the estate granted; they merely showed that the husband and wife were jointly entitled to the land which was conveyed to them. If, as in Trimble v. Reis, 37 Pa. 448, and Dexter v. Billings, 110 Pa. 135, the wife alone was entitled to the land, or, as in McKinney v. Hamilton, 51 Pa. 63, the mortgage was for purchase money due on a sale by the wife of land she inherited from her father, a different question would be presented. But a conveyance of land to husband and wife in consummation of their joint purchase of it during coverture vests in them an estate by entirety; and when, on a sale of the land so held, they take in their joint names an obligation for the purchase money, the presumption is that they intend to hold the latter as they did the former. It follows from these views that the appellant, as survivor, is the owner of the fund secured by the bond and mortgage, and that it was error to surcharge him as administrator with one half thereof, and to award the same to the heirs of the decedent.

Decree reversed, at the cost of the appellees; and it is ordered that the record be remitted to the court below, with instructions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate. Reversed.

The action was presented to the court upon an agreed case in which it was stated: that "the question intended to be presented by this case agreed is whether C. A. Moore, trustee, and Robert C. Patterson and wife, Madara J. Patterson, had the power, under the deed of William A. Holland and wife, Mira McD. Holland, of date the 2d day of April, 1875, to pass the fee simple in the land in question as they undertook to do by their deed of the 21st day of March, 1878. If they were able to pass the fee simple, and did pass it, by their said deed, or if the same passed by operation of law, then the plaintiff shall recover, and the defendant shall accept the plaintiff's deed, and pay the purchase money agreeably to said contract; otherwise, the defendant shall recover his costs, and be discharged from his obligation to purchase the land in question."

It was further agreed that the facts set forth in the pleadings were true. That C. A. Moore, Robert C. Patterson and his wife were all living, and that the Pattersons had several living children. That the fee simple to the land in question was in William A. Holland and wife at the date of their deed. That the R. O. Patterson mentioned in the deed was identical with Robert C. Patterson who contracted to sell the land in this case; and that Robert C. Patterson paid the purchase money to the Hollands in consideration of which their deed was made to C. A. Moore, trustee, et al.

The deed from William A. Holland and wife, the construction of which is the subject of this controversy, is as follows:

"This indenture, made this 2nd day of April, A. D., 1875, between Wm. A. Holland and wife, Mira McD. Holland, of the county of Buncombe, and state of North Carolina, of the first part, and C. A. Moore, trustee, of the second part, witnesseth, that whereas, on the — day of July, 1874, the said Wm. A. Holland and wife, Mira McD. Holland, bargained and sold to R. O. Patterson, for and in consideration of one thousand dollars ($1,000) to them in hand paid on said last-named day, the lot hereinafter described, and, by writing under their hands and seals, agreed to convey to the said R. O. Patterson, by good and sufficient deed, the same; and whereas, the purchase money has been paid in full, and the said R. O. Patterson has directed that the deed be made to C. A. Moore, the party of the second part, for said lot, for the use and trusts and purposes hereinafter mentioned: Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and the further consideration of the sum of one dollar to said parties of the first part in hand paid by the said party of the second part, the said parties of the second part do hereby give, grant, bargain, sell, and convey, and by these presents have bargained, sold, and conveyed, unto the said party of the second part, and his heirs, forever, a certain lot in the town of Asheville, county of Buncombe, and state of North Carolina, on the north side of Patton avenue, leading from the public square towards Smith's bridge, across the French Broad river; said lot containing about three and one third acres, and being the lot lately conveyed to the said Mira McD. Holland by C. M. McLoud,—beginning at a stake on said Patton avenue, within the limits of the town corporation, being the southwest corner of lot No. 1, and runs south, 73 west, 32 poles, to a stake; thence north, 17 west, 16 poles, to a stake; then north, 73 east, 34 poles, to a stake; then south, 17 east, to the beginning, 18 poles. To have and to hold to the said party of the second part and his heirs forever, in special trust and confidence, however, that the said C. A. Moore and his heirs will hold the same to the use of Madara J. Patterson for and during the time of her natural life, and, in the event that the said R. O. Patterson shall outlive his said wife, Madara J., that the said C. A. Moore and his heirs will then hold the same to the use of said R. O. Patterson for and during the term of his natural life, and, after the termination of the said life estates, that the said C. A. Moore and his heirs will then hold the same to the use of the heirs of the said R. O. Patterson, and them and their heirs forever. And the said William A. Holland and wife, Mira McD. Holland, for themselves and their heirs, do hereby covenant to and with the said C. A. Moore and his heirs that they are seised in fee simple of the said premises, and that they have right and full power to convey the same, and that the same is free from all incumbrances; and they do further covenant, for themselves and for their heirs, to and with the said C. A. Moore and his heirs, that they will warrant and defend the title to the said premises against the lawful claims of all persons whatsoever. In witness whereof, the said parties of the first part, and C. A. Moore, trustee, as aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands and seals this day and date above written.

"Wm. A. Holland. [Seal.]

"Mira McD. Holland. [Seal.]

"C. A. Moore. [Seal.]"

On the 21st of March, 1878, the above-described land was conveyed, for a valuable consideration, by C. A. Moore, trustee, and said Robert O. Patterson and wife, Madara J., to one F. E. A. Roberts, in fee; the deed containing the following covenant: "And the said Robert O. Patterson, for himself and his heirs, covenants to and with the said F. E. A. Roberts and his heirs that he and the said Madara J., his wife, and the said C. A. Moore, trustee, as aforesaid, are seised in fee of said lands, and have the right to convey the same; and the said Robert O. Patterson, for himself and his heirs, for the consideration aforesaid, unto the said F. E. A. Roberts, his heirs, will forever warrant and defend the title to the said lands against the claims and demands of all other persons whatsoever." It further appears that the plaintiff thereafter purchased the said land of the said Roberts, and on the 16th of October, 1891, entered into a contract with the defendant whereby the defendant contracted to purchase the same of the plaintiff for the sum of $20,000, executing his note to plaintiff for said sum, payable on the 18th of November, 1891. This action is brought by the plaintiff to compel specific performance of the contract, and the defendant resists the same on the ground that the plaintiff is unable to execute to him a title in fee to the premises, alleging in his answer "that the title to the land acquired by the plaintiff, and offered by the plaintiff to this defendant, is materially defective and imperfect, and that the plaintiff, on account of said defects, has no valid title whatsoever to said land, and cannot specifically perform his agreement to convey to this defendant said lot of land, by a good, perfect, and valid title, and that, therefore, the defendant ought not, in equity and good conscience be compelled to specifically perform his contract to purchase the land, and to pay said note for twenty thousand dollars, executed for the purchase money thereof."

Messrs. Gudger & Martin for appellant.
Mr. W. W. Jones for appellee.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is well settled that "in limitations of a trust, either of a real or personal estate, . . . the construction of limitations ought to be made according to the construction of limitations of a legal estate, unless the intent of the testator or author of the trust plainly appears to the contrary." Fearne, Remainders, p. 125. As there is nothing in the deed from W. A. Holland and wife to C. A. Moore, trustee, from which we are at liberty to infer an intention that the terms therein employed were to be understood in any other than their technical sense, it must follow, in accordance with the foregoing principle, that the limitations under consideration must be determined by the rules of the common law applicable to limitations of a strictly legal character. Under the provisions of the deed, the said C. A. Moore was seised in fee to the use of Madara J. Patterson, during her natural life, and, in the event that R. O. Patterson should outlive the said Madara, his wife, then to the said R. O. Patterson, for and during the term of his natural life, and, after the determination of the said life estates, then "to the use of the heirs of said R. O. Patterson, and them and their heirs forever." The deed under which the plaintiff claims purports to convey a fee simple, and was executed by the said trustee and Madara J. and R. O. Patterson, all of whom, together with several children of the said Patterson and wife, are now living. We are called upon to define the interests of the various parties under the said limitations, and more especially to determine whether the parties to the deed just mentioned could convey an indefeasible fee in the premises. It is insisted by the plaintiff that R. O. Patterson took a vested remainder for life, and that, as the limitation over was to his heirs, he was, under the rule in Shelley's Case, seised of an absolute estate in fee simple. On the other hand, it is argued by the defendant that the life estate of the said Patterson was contingent upon the event of his surviving his wife, and that until the happening of such event no interest vested in him which, under the said rule of law, could unite with the inheritance so as to destroy the remainder limited to his heirs, who would otherwise take as purchasers, if he failed to survive his said wife.

In support of the plaintiff's contention, we are referred to the principle laid down by Mr. Fearne, supra (page 217), in a passage which has often been quoted in text-books and judicial opinions, but seldom accompanied with the explanation of the learned author in its immediate connection. Id. pp. 216, 217. The language is as follows: "The present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, and not the certainty that the possession will become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, universally distinguishes a vested remainder from one that is contingent." It is urged that inasmuch as the death of Madara J. is an event which must happen, and, as R. O. Patterson is a person in esse, the latter would have the capacity of taking the possession, should the preceding estate of the said Madara J. be presently determined by her death, and therefore, under the foregoing rule, his estate would be a vested remainder. Conceding what does not seem altogether free from doubt, that the rule is applicable to a limitation like the present, the fallacy of the argument may be found in the failure to observe that at common law the particular estate may be determined during the lifetime of its tenant, as by forfeiture or surrender (Fearne, supra, p. 217; Tiedeman, Real Prop. 401; 4 Kent, Com. 254), in which case it is entirely clear that the remainder to R. O. Patterson would be defeated, because the event upon the happening of which his interest was to vest, to wit, the survival of his wife, would not have transpired during the continuance of the particular estate (Fearne, Remainders, p. 217; 2 Minor, Inst. 170, 171); and it is common learning that the contingency must happen during the continuance of the particular estate, or eo instante it determines (2 Bl. Com. 168). If it be granted, for the purposes of this argument, that no merger or surrender can have the effect of destroying the particular estate in this instance, and if it be said that, under the modern system of tenures, such estate may no longer be forfeited, as in feudal times, the answer is that the rule which distinguishes a vested from a contingent remainder has for centuries been a rule of property of the common law, and "to disregard rules of interpretation sanctioned by a succession of ages, and by the decisions of the most enlightened judges, under pretense that the reason of the rule no longer exists, or that the rule itself is unreasonable, would not only prostrate the great landmarks of property, but would introduce a latitude of construction boundless in its range, and pernicious in its consequences." 4 Kent, Com. 231. "We have many laws," says Mr. Fearne, "the origin of which cannot at this distant period be traced at all, yet justly should we laugh at the man urging that as an argument against the present validity of such laws; and surely a law for which no reason at all now appears has no more original ground, in the present state of things, than a law whose origin may be traced up to a circumstance which does not now exist." Fearn, supra, p. 87. In Perrin v. Blake, 1 W. Bl. 672, and note i, 4 Burr. 2579, Judge Blackstone remarked: "There is hardly an ancient rule of property but what had in it more or less of feudal tincture." And, after instancing several, he observes "that, whatever their parentage was, they are now adopted by the common law of England, incorporated into its body, and so interwoven into its policy that no court of justice in this kingdom had either the power or [he trusted] the inclination to disturb them." In view of the fact that, except where changed by statute, the rule of the common law which we have been discussing is generally recognized and acted upon in all its rigor, regardless of the fact that some of its reasons no longer exist, there can be no serious doubt of the entire applicability of the language of the distinguished jurists from whom we have quoted.

We return to the rule as laid down by Fearn. This may be illustrated by a limitation to A. for life, and then to B. for life. Now, here B. may die before A., in which event he would never actually enjoy the possession; but during his life he has "a fixed right of future enjoyment" (4 Kent, Com. 203), which, upon the determination of A's estate, whether by death or otherwise, entitles him to the immediate possession, irrespective of the concurrence of any collateral contingency, and his remainder is therefore vested. In other words, the term "vested remainder" imports, ex vi termini, "a present title" in the remainderman. So that, if the limitation in the above illustration had been to B. and his heirs, the latter would have taken, although B. had died before A. In Gray, on Perpetuities, 68, the learned author thus distinguishes a vested from a contingent remainder: "A remainder is vested in A. when, throughout its continuance, A or A. and his heirs have the right to the immediate possession whenever and however the preceding estates determine; or, in other words, a remainder is vested if, so long as it lasts, the only obstacle to the right of immediate possession by the remainderman is the existence of the preceding estates; or, again, a remainder is vested if it is subject to no condition precedent save the determination of the preceding estates." Fearn, Remainders, p. 217; 1 Cruise, Dig. 211; Tiedeman, Real Prop. 401; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 595. In accordance with these principles, Blackstone (vol. 2, p. 171) puts a case "on all fours" with the one before us, and declares the limitation to be a contingent remainder. "A remainder," he remarks, "may also be contingent where the person to whom it is limited is fixed and certain, but the event upon which it is to take effect is vague and uncertain as where land is given to A. for life and, in case B. survives him, then with the remainder to B. in fee. Here B. is a certain person, but the remainder to him is a contingent remainder, depending upon a dubious event,—the uncertainty of his surviving A. During the joint lives of A. and B., it is contingent; and if B. dies first it can never vest in his heirs, but is forever gone. But if A. dies first the remainder to B. becomes vested." 1 Cruise, supra, p. 205; Boone, Real Prop. 174; Bamforth v. Bamforth, 123 Mass. 282. It is true that the law favors the vesting of estates, and in many instances the courts have construed limitations to be conditions subsequent instead of conditions precedent. Thus, "on a devise to A. for life, remainder to his children, but, if any child dies in the lifetime of A., his share to go to those who survive, the share of each child is said to be vested, subject to be divested by its death. But on a devise to A. for life, remainder to such of his children as survive him, the remainder is contingent." Gray, supra, p. 108. The distinction, says the same author, is that, "if the conditional element is incorporated into the description of the gift to the remainderman, then the remainder is contingent; but if, after the words giving a vested interest, a clause is added, divesting it, the remainder is vested." Several of the authorities cited by counsel fall within the latter branch of the proposition, and clearly have no bearing upon this case, as no ingenuity is equal to the task of construing the present limitation as one vesting a present interest subject to be divested upon a condition subsequent. It is plain that, if it vests at all, it must remain vested.

The cases cited from our Reports do not in the least impinge upon the principle we have stated. In McNeely v. McNeely, 82 N. C. 188, a testator, "after devising to his wife for life, gave all the lands that I have to my son Billy at the death of his mother, by him seeing to her." The court held that the words, "by him seeing to her," were not operative as a condition precedent, but were the mere expression of a wish that he should take care of his mother. It was therefore properly held to be a vested remainder. In Brinson v. Wharton, 45 N. C. 80, the decision was influenced entirely by the construction of the will. It was declared that the testator intended to give the property to his wife during her life, and then to his children, to be equally divided between them, with a proviso that, if his wife should marry, her particular estate in the whole should determine, and she would be entitled to a child's part. Under this construction it was, of course, held that the children took a present interest, to be enjoyed in the future,—that is, after the determination of the estate given to the wife,—subject only to the contingency of letting in the wife, as to one share, if the particular estate determined by her marriage. "This contingency," says the court, "not having happened, is out of the case; and it is the ordinary one of a gift to a widow for life, and then to the children, to be equally divided." We are unable to see how this case is authority for the position that a remainder limited upon a precedent condition can be vested until such a condition is fulfilled. In Rives v. Whizzle, 48 N. C. 237, the court simply decided that the words "after" or "upon" the death of a person "do not make a contingency, but merely denote the commencement of a remainder in point of enjoyment." There could hardly be found in the language words which more aptly express a contingency than those used in the present case. In Ellwood v. Plummer, 78 N. C. 392, the land was devised in trust for "two of the testator's daughters during their natural lifetime, to be equally divided, and, after the death of either, in trust, in part, for her three grandchildren until the death of the other daughter, at which time said plantation is to be equally divided between said three grandchildren, of whom R. A. Plummer was one." The court said that "both the object of the gift, and the event of its full enjoyment, are certain, which makes a vested remainder." Here there was no condition precedent to the vesting of the remainder, and there was a present capacity to take effect upon the determination, in whatever manner, of the life estates. We cannot see how any of these decisions are in point. Neither do we find anything in the other cases to which we have been referred that can be regarded as authority against so well settled a principle of the common law as that which we have stated. In Den v. Sherrerd, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 288, 18 L. ed. 580, cited for plaintiff it was said that "where an estate is granted to one for life, and to such of his children as should be living after his death, a present right to future possession vests at once in such as are living, subject to open and let in after-born children, and to be divested as to those who shall die without issue." Similar decisions were made by the supreme courts of Alabama and Illinois, and all of them have been severely criticised by eminent authority. Mr. Gray, supra (page 107, note 2), suggests that in these cases "an expression of opinion upon the point in question was not really necessary to a decision upon the merits. At any rate," he remarks, "it would seem that these decisions as well as those in Indiana and New York present an exceptional view of the common-law conception of a remainder in other jurisdictions." While the cases are not directly in point it may be well to add that their reasoning seems to be identical with the New York decisions based upon statutory definitions and in reliance upon Chancellor Kent's statement that the statutory definition expressed the common-law notion of a vested remainder. Mr. Gray (supra) further remarks that it is doubtful whether such legislation was intended to change the common law; but he says "the courts have decided, and it would seem correctly, that it has done so." This latter view seems to be the correct one (Moore v. Little, 41 N. Y. 66), and therefore destroys the force of decisions based upon or influenced by such statutory definitions and practically leaves nothing which seriously conflicts with the common-law principles which we have enunciated.

We are therefore of the opinion that R. O. Patterson took but a contingent remainder, and that until the happening of the contingency the rule in Shelley's Case could not operate so as to defeat the contingent remainders of his heirs as purchasers. Granting, however, that the limitation could possibly be construed to vest in him a present interest, so as to put in operation the rule in Shelley's Case, still he would take but a defeasible estate as, under all of the authorities, his failure to survive his wife would operate (if we can venture to use such an expression in reference to such a limitation) as a condition subsequent, by which his estate would be divested in favor of the said heirs. So, treating the limitation either way, the plaintiff has not acquired such an absolute estate in fee as is necessary to enable him to comply with the terms of the contract which he seeks to enforce against the defendant. It may further be observed that the position that the warranty in the deed of the life tenant can defeat the remainder of the said heirs, by way of rebutter, is wholly untenable. Code, § 1334; Moore v. Parker, 34 N. C. 123.

We will now endeavor to ascertain the interests of the parties in the event that R. O. Patterson should survive his wife; and while, under the view we have taken, we might abstain from doing so, yet, as the answer denies that the plaintiff has any "valid title whatever to the land," and the parties may be left somewhat at sea in respect to their rights under the limitations in the deed, and a construction at this time may avoid future litigation, we have concluded to proceed further in the discussion, and pass upon the remaining questions presented in the record. We are all the more inclined to pursue this course because it involves the consideration of a question which was thoroughly argued by counsel, and the determination of which is of very great importance to the profession. The question is whether the rule in Shelley's Case still obtains in North Carolina. It is insisted that this ancient rule of law was abolished in 1854 by section 5, chap. 43, of the Revised Code, which provision was brought forward, and now constitutes section 1329 of the present Code. As the existence of the rule has for many years been unquestionably recognized in North Carolina as one of the "ligaments of property" (the only doubt upon the subject having been suggested by dicta of comparatively recent date), and under it many titles have vested, and been transferred, the question now presented is one of very great importance, and demands the most serious consideration of the court. Before attempting a construction of the provision referred to, it may be well to make some general observations upon the probable origin and policy of the rule, in order to ascertain, if we can, whether it be in accord with the general drift of enlightened jurisprudence in modern times, and more especially with the policy of our own laws. It is believed that such an inquiry may lend us valuable aid in our efforts to discharge the delicate and responsible duty of interpreting the legislative will.

The rule under consideration takes its name from an early case decided in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (Shelley's Case, 1 Coke, 94), though it was at that time considered as an ancient dogma of common law, and has been traced by Justice Blackstone to a case decided in the reign of Edward II. The earliest intelligible decision upon the subject, however, is to be found in the Case of the Provost of Beverly, in the time of Edward III., and reported in the Year Books, in which the rule is substantially declared as in Shelley's Case. Various theories have been suggested as furnishing a reason for the rule in the first instance; some authors, with much plausibility, tracing it to the same principle which applied originally to "heirs" when used in a conveyance. "It was at first understood that in case of such a limitation the estate was in fact to go to the heirs of the grantee named; that, though he had a right to enjoy it during life, he had no right to cut off the descent by alienation; and that when, therefore the word 'heirs,' in the progress of estates, came to be regarded as a mere term of limitation, giving the grantee a complete ownership, with an unrestricted right of alienation, it was not easy to distinguish between a case where the limitation was to one and his heirs, and that where it was to him for life, and after his death to his heirs: the effect at common law being the same in both forms of limitation." 2 Washb. Real Prop. 647; Wms. Real Prop. 254. Nor does it seem that this result worked any particular hardship to the heir, as in those days ready money was extremely scarce, and the alienation of lands assumed the form of perpetual leases, granted in consideration of certain services or rents reserved to the grantor and his heirs: and, as such services or rents descended to the heir, it was not so great a disadvantage to him as at first might be supposed. Wms. Real Prop. 89. It is not to be doubted that this construction was aided and greatly strengthened by other considerations, such as the prevention of frauds upon the feudal lord and specialty creditors (2 Fearn, Remainders, chap. 12, § 8), the prevention of the inheritance from being, as was supposed, in abeyance (Justice Blackstone's argument in Perrin v. Blake, in Exchequer Chamber, 4 Burr, 2579); and to preserve the marked distinction between title by descent and purchase (Hargrave, Law Tracts). "But, whatever may have been the grounds of the rule in its origin, another reason subsequently existed as an inducement to the preservation of the rule from legislative abolition and judicial discouragement after the feudal reason had ceased with the feudal system itself; and that subsequent reason is the desire to facilitate alienation, by vesting the inheritance in the ancestor, instead of allowing it to remain in abeyance until his decease." 2 Fearn, Remainders, § 421. In Perrin v. Blake, supra, Justice Blackstone said: "Another foundation of the rule, probably, was laid in a principle diametrically opposite to the genius of feudal institutions, namely, a desire to facilitate the alienation of land, and to throw it into the track of commerce one generation sooner, by vesting the inheritance in the ancestor." See also Kawle's note, Wms. Real Prop. 258. In Polk v. Paris, 80 Am. Dec. 400, Reese, J., in a very able opinion in vindication of the rule, uses this language: "It is a rule or canon of property, which so far from being at war with the genius of our institutions, or with the liberal and commercial spirit of the age, which alike abhor the locking up and rendering inalienable real estate and other property, seems to be in perfect harmony with both. It is owing perhaps to this circumstance that the rule, a Gothic column found among the remains of feudality, has been preserved in all its strength to aid in sustaining the fabric of the modern social system." In Hileman v. Bouslaugh, 53 Am. Dec. 474, the distinguished Chief Justice Gibson says: "Though of feudal origin, it is not a relic of barbarism, or a part of the rubbish of the dark ages," etc. It has other than feudal objects, to wit, the unfettering of estates, by vesting the inheritance in the ancestor, and making it alienable a generation sooner than it otherwise would be.

That this result accords most thoroughly with the general tendency of juridical evolution is apparent from the progress of the law, and the gradual falling away of entails, and other restraints on alienation, from the times of Henry I. to the present. It seems clear that in a highly complex state of society, with greatly diversified industries, and immense commercial activities, it would be desirable to remove every clog on the free and easy alienability of all kinds of property; and that such has been the spirit of the legislation in this state is manifest from a perusal of the various statutes enacted upon the subject. We are not unaware of the fact that in some of the states the rule has been partially, if not wholly, abolished. Such legislation was probably influenced by the presumed lack of conformity with the supposed intention of the grantor or testator. But to this it has been answered that "when a case arises, fulfilling the requirements for the application of the rule, it is not against the intention of the testator. It is only applicable when the intention of the testator has been discovered by the ordinary canons of descent." 2 Fearn, Remainders, § 434. "The rule is not a means to discover the intention of the grantor or testator, but, supposing the intention ascertained, the rule controls it, so far as it is repugnant to the policy of the law, giving effect to the general and legal, rather than the more particular and prescribed, intent. The party making such a limitation has in his mind two purposes, which are legally in conflict. One is to give the ancestor only a life estate; the other, to limit the land to his heirs collectively, and in indefinite succession. These two intents cannot stand together without more or less of general mischief to the public welfare; and the rule prevails simply to subordinate the particular, and apparently less important, design, of limiting the ancestor's interest to a life estate, to the more comprehensive, and probably the preferred, purpose, of transmitting the inheritance in the manner indicated." 2 Minor, Inst. 395, cited with approval in Leathers v. Gray, 96 N. C. 548.

As the courts are astute in discovering the intention from the context of the conveyance, and readily give effect to every word from which such intention can reasonably and legitimately be inferred, it does not often occur that the application of the rule has the effect of subverting the real intention of the grantor or testator. But, granting that it does, it is urged with great force that particular instances of hardship can better be endured than the uncertainty and confusion of titles resulting from sudden and radical changes in well-settled rules of property. In reference to this very question, Chancellor Kent remarks that "it is a question for experience to decide, whether the attainable advantages suggested by a change in the law will overbalance the inconvenience of increasing fetters upon alienation, and shaking confidence in law, by such an entire and complete renunciation of a settled rule of property, memorable for its antiquity, and for patient cultivation and discipline which it has received." 4 Kent, Com. 283. "Certain established maxims as to the legal import and effect of technical expressions will render the decisions of titles to property as little dependent as the nature of things will admit upon the occasional opinion, humor, ingenuity, or caprice of the judge, and are therefore the most proper and sure grounds for titles to rest and depend upon. Titles so founded may be easily and clearly ascertained and under them a permanent, peaceful enjoyment may be expected." 1 Fearn, Remainders, p. 171. It may be further observed that the rule in Shelley's Case is by no means the only principle of law which may thwart the intention of the grantor or testator in the interest of public policy, as, for instance, the intention cannot change the rule against perpetuities, nor impose a general restraint upon alienation. If the views of the eminent jurists and authors from whom we have so liberally quoted be sound, there is certainly no reason for looking upon the rule with disfavor; but, on the contrary, it is highly useful, and should be jealously guarded and preserved.

But, whatever may be the better policy (and this it is not our province to determine), its great antiquity and general prevalence, as well as its earnest indorsement by so many great lawyers of the present as of past centuries, should alone be sufficient to entitle it to a fair and patient hearing, when the question of its abolition arises upon the construction of a statute which, for the particular purpose for which it is now invoked, must be regarded as obscurely worded, and sufficiently ambiguous to admit of an entirely different application. This "ancient land-mark of the law" was, we believe, on a celebrated occasion, shown but slight respect by so great a judge as Lord Mansfield, but the controversy which immediately sprang up between his lordship and Mr. Fearn did not, it is said, result to the advantage of the former, and the rule was more firmly settled than ever in the jurisprudence of England. See Campbell's Life of Mansfield.

We will now attempt a construction of the act in question: "Any limitation by deed, will, or other writing, to the heirs of a living person shall be construed to be the children of such person, unless a contrary intention appears by the deed or the will." Rev. Code, chap. 43, § 6; Code, § 1329. The word "limitation" has two well-known and distinct meanings. In the one, the primary meaning, it signifies a marking out the bounds or limits of the estate created; in the other, it signifies simply the creation of an estate (2 Fearn, Remainders, § 24), and it is evidently used in the secondary sense in the above act. It will appear hereafter that its framers had a very definite purpose in view; and it seems that, in effectuating this purpose, they endeavored to avoid any interference with the rule in Shelley's Case. This must be apparent, because the rule has nothing whatever to do with limitations to the heirs of a person unless there is a precedent limitation of a freehold estate to that person, and yet the act does not make the slightest reference to this essential element of the said rule. It is impossible to suppose that the gentlemen who prepared the Revised Code, and incorporated this section, should have been inattentive to this defect, if it had been their purpose to abrogate the rule. Their abilities and learning need no eulogy from us. They are a part of the heritage of the legal profession of this state, and of which it may be justly proud. And this is a point which may be very strongly insisted upon,—that, if these commissioners had intended to abolish the rule, they could have done it, and would have done it, in such a manner as to leave no doubt upon the subject. That there is a doubt is the most powerful reason for sustaining the rule. Acts abridging the common law must be strictly construed (1 Kent, Com. 464), "for it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to make any innovation upon the common law, further than the case absolutely required. The law rather infers that the act did not intend to make any alteration other than what is specified, and besides what has been plainly pronounced; for, if the parliament had had that design, it is naturally said, they would have expressed it." Potter's Dwar. Stat. 185; Brown v. Barry, 8 U. S. 8 Dall. 865, 1 L. ed. 638; Shaw v. Merchants Nat. Bank of St. Louis, 101 U. S. 557, 25 L. ed. 892. The very important omission to which we have adverted is rendered still more significant when it is considered that in all of the statutes abolishing the rule, which we have been able to examine, there is an express reference to the precedent life estate given in the same conveyance in which there is a limitation to the heirs of the life tenant. This will strikingly appear from an examination of the statutes, of which we give the following as illustrations: The Virginia Code (1850) enacts that "when any estate, real or personal, is given by deed or will to any person for his life, and after his death to his heirs, or to the heirs of his body, the conveyance shall be construed to vest an estate for life only in such person, and a remainder in fee simple in his heirs, or the heirs of his body." In New York it is provided that "when a remainder shall be limited to the heirs, or heirs of the body, of a person to whom a life estate in the same premises shall be given, the persons who on the termination of the life estate shall be the heirs of the body, or heirs of such tenant for life, shall be entitled to take as purchasers, by virtue of the remainder so limited to them." 4 Kent, Com. 232. In Maine, New Hampshire, and several other states in which the rule has been abolished, the statutes, while differing in phraseology, all contain provisions substantially similar to those we have reproduced.

Another argument against the construction contended for is that in a large number of cases arising under the rule,—perhaps the majority,—the words of the act can have no operation. As an illustration of our meaning, take the case of a limitation to A. for life, and after his death to his heirs. A. never has any children, and consequently there are no heirs (of that sort) to be construed into children. It is plain that the case must be left as at common law; that is, A. will take a fee. In other words, the rule in Shelley's Case is applicable to every case where an estate is limited to one for life, with a remainder to the heirs of the first taker, whether the tenant for life has children or not; but the act, by its very terms, can only extend to those cases, if to any, in which the first taker has children. The alleged abrogation, therefore, is by no means coextensive with the rule as is the effect of the statutes to which we have referred. These statutes are framed so as to prevent any enlargement of the life estate, even if there be no children, and to confer a remainder upon such persons as shall, in any sense, be the heirs of the life tenant. Can it be inferred that such profound lawyers as our code commissioners would attempt to abolish such a well-known and firmly established principle of the common law by an act, the words of which they knew could reach only a few of the great number of cases under the rule, and especially when the words can find a much more direct and natural interpretation, as we will presently attempt to show? The inapplicability, however, of the words of the act to the rule under consideration, seems to us to be placed beyond question by the fact that they are equally applicable to ordinary limitations in fee simple; and we do not suppose that any one will seriously contend that the act abolished fee-simple estates generally. If an estate to A. for life, remainder to the heirs of A., he having living children, is converted into an estate for life in A., with a vested remainder in his children, by the words of an act, which says that, "in every limitation to the heirs of a living person the word 'heirs' shall be construed to mean, 'children,'" why, may it be asked, does not the same act convert an estate to A. and his heirs, he having living children, into an estate in common in A. and his children? Certainly a limitation to A. and his children, he having living children, will create a tenancy in common in A. and his children, and surely the commissioners did not intend any such startling result. Courts will restrain the literal meaning of a statute if its words would extend to cases not intended by the legislature. "Scire leges, non hoc est verba eorum tenere sed vim ac potestatem," and the reason and intention of the lawgiver will control the strict letter of the law, when the latter would lead to a palpable injustice, contradiction, and absurdity." 1 Kent, Com. 463; Potter, Dwarr. Stat. 209, note; Brewer v. Blougher, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 178, 10 L. ed. 408; Lieber, Hermeneutics, 45. And here it may not be inappropriate to say that it seems to be the opinion of many of the ablest law-writers that the act does not necessarily abolish the rule. Thus, Mr. Washburn, in the fourth edition of his work on Real Property (vol. 2, p. 607), undertakes to give a list of the states with reference to the acts which have abolished the rule; and he does not include North Carolina, although he was familiar with our act as is shown by a reference to section 8, chap. 43, of the Revised Code. The same observation applies to Mr. Rawle, the learned editor of Williams on Real Property. He also gives a list of the states which have abolished the rule, without including North Carolina. The same may be said of Mr. Freeman, the very able and discriminating editor of the American Decisions, in a note to 30 Am. Dec. 415, and also of the editors of Jarman on Wills and Lawson's Rights and Remedies.

We will now attempt to give our construction of the act. It seems to us that its main object (and its phraseology nicely adapts it to the purpose) was to convert a contingent into a vested remainder, under certain circumstances. For instance, an estate to A. for life, remainder to the heirs of B.; B. living, and having children. Now, at common law, this created a contingent remainder in the heirs of B., for nemo est heres viventis; and, if A. died before B., the heirs or children of B. took nothing. Under the act in question the children of B. would take a vested remainder, and upon the death of A. would get the estate, whether B. was living or not. And it is singular that the only case which we have been able to find in our Reports, in which the court has adjudged the act to be applicable, was similar to this. In Smith v. Brisson, 90 N. C. 284, the limitation was as follows: "To Rowland Mercer, and the heirs of his body; and, if the said Rowland Mercer should have no heirs, the said land shall go to the heirs of my son James A. Mercer." Rowland Mercer died without ever having had children. James A. Mercer was living at the date of the deed, and had children at that time; and the court held that the Act (Code, § 1329) applied, and construed the deed as if the limitation over had read, "the said land shall go to the children of my son James A. Mercer." It seems also to have been the purpose of the act to sustain a direct conveyance to the heirs of a living person. As there can be no heirs during the life of the ancestor, such a conveyance, at common law, would have been void, unless there was something in the deed which indicated "that by 'the heirs' was meant the children of the person named." 8 Washb. Real Prop. 282. The act in question provides that in such a case the word "heirs" shall be construed to mean "children," and the limitation, therefore, would be good.

Our construction that the act does not affect the rule in Shelley's Case finds strong support from its position in the Revised Code, which we are at liberty to consider under the maxim noscitur a sociis. Indeed, the whole structure of chapter 43 seems to have for its prime object the greater alienability of estates than existed at common law. Section 1 converts fee tails into fee-simple estates, and uses no ambiguous terms. Section 2 converts joint tenancy into tenancy in common. Section 3 makes certain contingent limitations vest much sooner than at common law; and then comes section 5, the provisions of which we have under consideration. This object was further advanced by the Act of 1879 (Code, § 1280), providing that "all conveyances shall be construed to be in fee simple, unless otherwise plainly expressed," showing plainly the legislative policy. The construction insisted upon by the defendant would, it seems, run counter to the general trend of our policy, which favors the early vesting of estates (Hilliard v. Kearney, 45 N. C. 221); and it would also place the act entirely out of harmony with its environment.

We do not regard it as serving any useful purpose to refer to the queries thrown out in various cases extending from King v. Utley, 85 N. C. 59, to the present time, because the point did not arise, and the question is expressly reserved, in all of them. It is often remarked that great legislative changes in the law are usually preceded by some decision of the courts, of a novel or striking character, calculated to arrest public attention; and we have made such investigation as we could with a view of discovering such a case as would probably cause the passage of the act. In this we have not been particularly successful. Certainly, we find nothing which indicates that courts, lawyers, or laymen were dissatisfied with Shelley's Case, or that the question was particularly interesting at that time. We do find a case or two in which the court applied the rule, but there is nothing unusual to distinguish them from the thousands of similar cases decided within the last four or five hundred years. It is possible, however, that the act grew out of the discussion arising upon the much-litigated case of Ward v. Stow, 17 N. C. 509, 27 Am. Dec. 288, which came several times before the court, and which seems to have established the proposition that in a legacy to the "heirs" of a person, which person the will itself recognizes as living, the word "heirs" is to be construed "children." While supported by authority, it seems rather arbitrary that the construction of the word

"heirs" in a will should depend upon whether the will recognizes the ancestor as living, and not upon the fact of his being alive. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the discussion in this case may have influenced the action of the commissioners; but, however this may be, we are entirely satisfied, from the language used, that it was not their purpose to work so great a change in the law governing the limitations of property. The importance of the question, involving, as it probably does, the validity of the titles to a large amount of real estate, has induced us to discuss the subject at a somewhat unusual length, and we are glad that our conception of the law is in harmony with the views so long entertained and acted upon by the profession.

The rule in Shelley's Case being still in force in North Carolina, its application to the present case will be as follows: If R. O. Patterson should survive his wife, he will take a vested, equitable freehold estate; and as the limitations apply to interests of the same quality, and the trusts are not executory (Fearne, Remainders, pp. 51, 55, 90; 2 Co. Litt. 145), the inheritance will, under the said rule, unite with the said estate, and he will then be seised of an indefeasible, equitable estate in fee simple. This estate will inure to the benefit of the plaintiff, by way of feeding the estoppel worked by the covenants of warranty in the deed of the said R. O. Patterson. Bell v. Adams, 81 N. C. 118; Southerland v. Stout, 68 N. C. 446; Fortencus v. Satterthwaite, 28 N. C. 566; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 9, 10, notes. Until the contingency happens, the "heirs" of R. O. Patterson have a contingent remainder in fee, expectant upon the determination of the life estate of Madara J., she surviving her said husband. In this event they will take, not under the said Patterson, but as purchasers; the word "heirs" being descriptio personarum only. We think his honor was correct in holding that the rule in Shelley's Case had not been abolished; but for the reasons given, we think he erred in holding that the defendant was compelled to accept the title offered by the plaintiff.

Error. Reversed.

Note. It may not be improper to say that since the preparation of this opinion the writer has been assured by Ex-Justice Rodman, the distinguished survivor of those connected with the supervision and publication of the Revised Code, that it was not the purpose of the commission to abolish the rule in Shelley's Case.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Michael O'TOOLE, Appt.,

PITTSBURGH & LAKE ERIE R. CO.

(158 Pa. 90.)

1. Negligence is the absence of care according to the circumstances.

2. A passenger upon a street-car approaching a railroad crossing which has stopped 75 feet away from the crossing and again started, is under no duty to be on the lookout to learn if the railroad track can be safely crossed and to jump off, if he discovers an approaching locomotive, especially where he is crippled.

(October 30, 1898.)

NOTE.—The above decision seems to be as novel as it is just. To hold a passenger liable for negligence in remaining on a public conveyance under 22 L. R. A.

the control of the carrier's servants or agents trusting to their management would surely require a strong case.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lawrence County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The material parts of the charge of the trial court were as follows:

Did Michael O'Toole contribute in any way to the injury that he received that morning? Being upon the car of the street railway company he would not be required to exercise the care that the law lays down as the rule with a person going along a highway coming to a railroad crossing,—he must stop and look and listen. There could be no reason for that rule under the circumstances in this particular case. A person in a street railway car going along the highway cannot know where a railroad crosses the line of the street railway. And if they did know where the railroad and the railway cross it would be impossible for them to stop and look and listen to comply with the rule that binds all other persons in going along public highways. They have no control of the carriage in which they are riding; they cannot control its movements; they cannot stop and look and listen unless at the will of the carrier company. So that that rule becomes meaningless when you apply it to passengers in a railway car, and it should not be applied to the plaintiff in this case.

If Michael O'Toole upon that street-car could have seen the engine, and did not undertake to see it, or did not exercise reasonable care for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could proceed across the street railway track in safety, then he would be guilty of contributory negligence. And that, I say to you, would be the rule applicable to him, for the reason that it is in evidence that he knew well the point at which this railway crosses the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad. And he has testified that he had gone backward and forward quite frequently as a passenger on the line of the street railway company, and that he knew the point at which they crossed the line of the Lake Erie Railroad. He tells you further he was looking at the safety gates that morning, that he was watching them. If he was looking at the safety gates that morning he knew where the railroad was. If he knew the point at which the safety gates were erected, he knew the purpose for which they were erected. If he looked at those safety gates for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could proceed safely across the line of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad, then he could at the same time and with the same effort have looked up the track of the railroad to see whether or not an engine was approaching. And if at the time the car in which he was traveling stopped, it stopped at such a place that he could have looked up the railroad, and if by looking up the railroad at that time he could have learned whether this engine was or was not approaching, and could at that time have gotten off the car if he discovered an engine approaching, and did not do that, then he would be guilty of contributory negligence and could not recover in this case. Whether he could have done that or could not have done that is a question for you. And the point where the street-car stopped is a question for you to determine from the evidence. If in considering this case, under all the testimony that has been offered, you conclude that Michael O'Toole in any way contributed to the accident—if his conduct in any way contributed to the receiving of the injury which he did receive, then he is guilty of contributory negligence. And a person who is guilty of contributory negligence in any degree cannot recover in a proceeding of this kind. If you conclude that he was guilty of contributing in any way to this accident, then you must find a verdict for the defendant.

These safety gates are erected for the protection of the traveling public. But the fact that the safety gates are erected does not affect in any way the responsibility or the liability of the railroad company in the operation of its railroad or in the management of its trains. These safety gates are erected, and it is customary to have them lowered when a train is passing in order that the public may have notice that a train is about to pass, and when the train has passed the gates are raised. Persons going along a public street or along a public road where there are safety gates have still incumbent upon them the duty imposed by law to stop and look and listen—to exercise ordinary care for their own safety and to ascertain by stopping, and looking and listening whether a train be approaching.

Even if the safety gates are not lowered, that does not relieve the person passing along the road from the obligation imposed upon him by the law to stop and look and listen for a train. He still has that obligation upon him; it is the duty, where there is an ordinance requiring safety gates, and safety gates have been erected, for the company to lower these gates at the approach of a train. If they fail to lower these gates they become liable to the penalty imposed by the ordinance, if there be such a penalty imposed. The failure to lower the safety gates does not of itself make the company negligent, so far as this case is concerned. The question of whether they were or were not lowered before this train came to the crossing is a question of fact for you. There is considerable testimony offered on that point and the testimony is conflicting, and it is for you to reconcile, if you can, and if you cannot reconcile it, then it is a question for you from the evidence in the case to conclude whether the safety gates were or were not lowered; and you come then to the credibility of the witnesses on that point. It is a question for you to say whom you will believe and whom you will not believe. But if you conclude that the gates were not lowered, that fact, of itself, is not sufficient to warrant you in finding a verdict for the plaintiff. Had the plaintiff been walking along the street, the fact that the gates were not lowered would not be an invitation to him to cross the railroad in violation of the rule of law, that he shall stop and look and listen when approaching a railroad crossing. And that rule is not taken away because the plaintiff happened to be in a street-car at the time.

Mr. Oscar L. Jackson, for appellant:

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant operates a steam railroad running through the borough of New Castle. Its road crosses at grade South Mill street, diagonally. The New Castle Electric Street Railway has its rails longitudinally on the same street. Hence, the two tracks cross each other at grade on this street. There are guard gates at the crossing, under the control of the defendant, to be raised or lowered on the approach of a locomotive to the crossing. On the 14th of March, 1891, the plaintiff, a shoemaker by trade,—a cripple from birth, in both feet,—took a seat in the street-car to go north through the town. When the car came to a point about 75 feet from the crossing, a locomotive approached, going south-west; the watchman lowered the gates; the street-car stopped; the locomotive crossed; the watchman raised the gates; the car started, and, as it reached the railroad track, was struck by another locomotive, following the one that had passed. There is some conflict in the testimony as to whether the gate was wholly or partly closed at the moment of collision. A house obstructs the view of the track in the direction from which the locomotive came, except when quite near the point of crossing. The plaintiff, in the collision, was thrown out, and seriously injured. Under the instructions of the court, the verdict was for the defendant. There was some evidence on the part of defendant that the collision was wholly the result of the negligence of the street-car company; that those in charge of the car disregarded the warning of the watchman and the lowering of the gate for the second locomotive to pass. But that the collision was the result of the negligence of one or other company, or of the concurring negligence of both, could not have been doubted, on the evidence. The learned judge of the court below, on the evidence, properly instructed the jury (1) that, if the collision was the result of negligence of both parties, each was answerable to plaintiff, and he could maintain his suit against either; (2) if the collision was the result, wholly, of the negligence of the street-car company, the defendant was not answerable. But the plaintiff, in his several assignments of error, complains of the instructions with reference to his duty as a passenger, under the circumstances here developed. The fifth and sixth assignments, in substance, embrace this alleged error. The court instructed the jury: "If Michael O'Toole, upon that street-car, could have seen the engine, and did not undertake to see it, or did not exercise reasonable care for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could proceed across the railway track in safety, then he would be guilty of contributory negligence; and if, by looking up the railroad at that time, he could have learned whether an engine was or was not approaching, and could at that time have gotten off the car if he discovered an engine approaching, and did not do that, then he would be guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover." Then, further on, is this instruction: "But the fact that safety gates are erected does not in any way affect the responsibility or the liability of the railroad company in the operation of its railroad, or in the management of its trains. But, if you conclude that the gates were not lowered, that fact, of itself, is not sufficient to warrant you in finding a verdict for the plaintiff. Had the plaintiff been walking along the street, the fact that the gates were not lowered would not be an invitation to him to cross the railroad, in violation of the rule of law that he shall stop, look, and listen, when approaching a railroad crossing; and that rule is not taken away because the plaintiff happened to be in a street-car at the time."

Defendant's counsel argues that these are mere excerpts from the charge, and, standing alone, do not fairly present the instruction really given to the jury; that this can only be properly understood when read in connection with what preceded and followed. Certainly, the charge must be taken as a whole, to arrive at the correct meaning. We have carefully read it, in the light of the evidence, and are forced to the conclusion the tendency was to mislead the jury. We find no evidence which warranted such instruction. Negligence is the absence of care according to the circumstances. There was evidence here from which the jury might have found there was no negligence on part of defendant, and that the street-car company was negligent. They might have found the defendant was negligent, and the street-car company was not. They might have found both were negligent. But a careful search for any evidence of negligence, under the circumstances, on part of plaintiff, has been fruitless. He was a passenger of the street-car company, which had contracted to carry him safely. He had a right to presume they would exercise the care required in this undertaking. When the car approached the crossing, it stopped. He was in no danger then, and had no reason to apprehend any. When it started, he had a right to believe it did so because the crossing was clear. Running a distance of about 75 feet, the collision occurred. In the very few seconds which were necessary to accomplish this distance, the court, in substance, instructs the jury that it was plaintiff's duty to be on the lookout to learn if the railroad track could be safely crossed, and if, by so doing, he could have seen the approaching locomotive, ordinary care required him to jump off. To impose such a duty upon a passenger, under these circumstances, is going much further than any court has yet gone. All experience has demonstrated that to get off a moving car is highly dangerous. Therefore, it is held that such an act is negligence per se, and the passenger, if thereby injured, except in very rare cases, is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover. Hence, here, if the plaintiff had been on the lookout, and had seen the approaching locomotive, ordinary care did not require he should make a dangerous jump to escape a problematical collision. Admit he had some reason to apprehend danger if he remained in the car. At the worst, this was only, to him, a possible danger. A careful man, ignorant of the power of control of the engineer over the locomotive, or of the motorman over the electric car, and knowing nothing of the rules governing them in approaching the crossing, might very well think one or the other would stop before reaching it. He had no right or power to control or direct those in charge of either. He was warranted in assuming that they knew their business better than a shoemaker, and would, by proper care, avert the possible collision. Therefore, holding him rigidly to the rule of ordinary care, at best, he had a choice of perils: a choice to be exercised on the instant by a man crippled in both feet, and consequently a not very agile jumper. He had been put in this position by no act of his own, but by the negligence of one or other, or both, of the railroad companies. We fail to see any evidence of absence of ordinary care here, under these circumstances. The instruction, in substance that ordinary care required plaintiff to perform the duties of conductor and motorman; that, practically, he was to exercise the same care as if he had been driving his own horse,—"stop, look, and listen,"—was erroneous, and calculated to mislead the jury. It would have been but a step further, and a short step at that, to have directed the jury to inquire whether plaintiff had not been guilty of contributory negligence in taking passage on a street-car, which he knew, in its route, would cross a steam railroad at grade. The law imposes no such duty upon the traveler by public conveyances laid down in this charge. The cases of Crescent Twp. v. Anderson, 114 Pa. 648, 60 Am. Rep. 867, and Dean v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 129 Pa. 514, 6 L. R. A. 148, cited and relied on by appellee as sustaining the instruction complained of, really recognized the opposite doctrine. Both are cases where the plaintiffs, when injured, were riding in private vehicles driven by another, and both were injured by the contributory negligence of the driver and a third party, the defendant. In both the decision was put on the ground that the negligence of the driver of the horse was apparent, and he was, to some extent, under the direction or control of the party injured. There was no attempt, by remonstrance or otherwise, by the party injured, to restrain the negligent driver. The negligence of the driver was not, in either case, imputed to an innocent plaintiff, but the latter was held to have participated in the negligence which caused the accident. Carlisle v. Brisbane, 118 Pa. 544, 57 Am. Rep. 488, is to the same effect; and the decision is expressly put on the ground that, although the conveyance was a private one, the injured party did not, to any degree, participate in the alleged negligence of the driver. The plaintiff here was a passenger in a public conveyance. He conformed to the rules of the company; kept his seat, relying on the vigilance and care of those in charge of the car, as his contract gave him the right to do. There was upon him no duty of moving the car with caution at dangerous crossings; no duty of watching for possible collisions, and jumping off in apprehension of them. Consequently the learned court below erred in its instructions embraced in plaintiff's fifth and sixth assignments of error.

The judgment is reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money loaned, and the price of chattels sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants. Affirmed.

Statement by Cassoday, J.:

This action was commenced November 18, 1889. The complaint alleges, in effect, that the defendants have been partners since June 1, 1886, doing business at Watertown; that between June 17, 1886, and December 6, 1888, the defendants, at sundry and divers times, borrowed money of the plaintiff, and purchased horses and hay of him, which money was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, and which horses and hay were sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants at their request, to the amount of $2,377.03, and demands judgment for the same with costs; that a bill of particulars is annexed to said complaint, covering the time between the dates named, amounting to $4,277.30, including $2,000 cash loaned to the defendants June 17, 1886, $300 cash loaned to the defendants June 28, 1886, and $800 cash loaned to the defendants September 10, 1886. The defendants, answering the complaint, admitted the partnership of the defendants, and allege, in effect, that between September 20, 1886, and April 1, 1889, they borrowed of the plaintiff $80, and bought of him one horse at the agreed price of $125, and also bought of him 16,325 pounds of hay at the agreed price of $8 per ton; but that long before the commencement of this action they repaid to the plaintiff the $80 so borrowed, and also paid him in full for said horse and said hay; and otherwise deny each and every allegation contained in the complaint. The answer also alleged, by way of counterclaim, in effect, that between November 1, 1886, and April 1, 1889, the defendants, as such partners, sold and delivered to the plaintiff, at his request, several pieces of property mentioned, and paid to him, or for his benefit, and at his request, several items of cash, amounting in the aggregate to $1,849.55. That no part thereof had been paid, except $271.28, and prayed judgment for the balance of $1,578.27, with a bill of particulars annexed to said answer. That thereupon the cause was referred to George Grimm, as sole referee, to hear, try, and determine this action, and of the issues therein. That said Grimm thereupon took the requisite oath, and, after hearing the witnesses, evidence, and proofs of the respective parties, and the arguments of their respective attorneys, pursuant to notice given, on June 11, 1892, the said referee made and filed his report, wherein he found as matters of fact, in effect: (1) That from May 1, 1885, to the commencement of this action, the defendants were partners, doing business at Watertown. (2) That the moneys described and charged in the plaintiff's bill of particulars, to wit, June 17, 1886, cash loaned to defendants, $2,000; June 28, 1886, cash loaned to defendants, $300; and September 10, 1886, cash loaned to defendants, $800,—were loaned by the plaintiff to the defendants, and were borrowed by the defendants of the plaintiff, with the mutual understanding that said sums should be repaid at the expiration of eight months. That the plaintiff so loaned to the defendants said money for the purpose of using the same in one certain exportation and importation of horses to be made by the defendants in the summer of 1886, with the mutual understanding that the same should be repaid at the end of the time necessary to complete such exportation and importation, which was fixed at eight months, and, in case said trip should be successful,—that is to say, profitable to the defendants,—then the plaintiff should receive a horse for the use of his money, and, if not successful, then he should receive nothing for its use. (3) That said trip was not successful, within the meaning placed upon that word by the parties, and that the defendants sustained a heavy loss, the amount of which the referee does not determine, as he deemed it immaterial. (4) That defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the other sums set out in the plaintiff's bill of particulars, with the exception of the item under date of December 6, 1886, cash $300, which he finds was paid by the defendants with the Farlow note of $400, and the balance of $100 charged by defendants against plaintiff; and with the exception of the last item on the plaintiff's bill of particulars, under date of December 6, 1886, one stallion, $300, which he finds should be $275, and which he further finds was paid by the defendants with the Wassow note of $575, and the balance of $300 charged to the plaintiff by the defendants, making the aggregate sum owing the plaintiff by the defendants $3,677.30. (5) That the plaintiff is indebted to the defendants upon their counterclaim in the sum set out in their bill of particulars, to wit, the sum of $1,849.55, and that the final balance due the plaintiff from the defendants upon said accounts is $1,827.75. And as conclusions of law the referee found that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendants for the sum of $1,827.75, with interest thereon from May 10, 1887, at the rate of 7 per cent per annum. That September 5, 1892, the plaintiff moved the court to confirm said report, and for judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, in accordance with the findings therein; that at the same time the defendants moved the court to alter and modify said findings of fact and conclusions of law; and, after hearing of said motions respectively, and the arguments of counsel for the respective parties therein, and after duly considering the same, the court, on March 27, 1893, ordered, those cited in the opinion in respect to trial by jury and the relation of law to equity jurisdiction, as well as to similar decisions of federal courts on those questions. The statute involved in the 22 L. R. A.

above case is noticeable in contrast with the legislation in other jurisdictions for the relief of overburdened courts of last resort.

adjudged, and decreed that said report of the referee be, and the same is, in all respects confirmed, and judgment for the plaintiff and against the defendants is thereby ordered in accordance with said report and findings, with proper costs and disbursements; and thereupon, and on the same day, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants for the sum of $3,774.30, damages and costs. From that judgment the defendants bring this appeal.

Mr. Harlow Pease, for appellants:

In this state it is quite immaterial how the referee rules upon objections to testimony, or that he fails to rule thereon, so long as he takes the testimony.

Kinney v. Archer, 80 Wis. 201.

In disposing of the case, this court considers all proper testimony, and rejects that which is improper, and decides the case without reference to the rulings of the referee or court, or their omissions to rule, on objections to testimony.

Mr. L. B. Caswell, with Mr. W. H. Rogers, for respondent:

The transaction was a loan of money.

Shoemaker v. Hinz, 53 Wis. 116.

The transaction, as claimed by the defendants, was not a partnership. The plaintiff was to receive a fixed compensation for the use of his money, if anything.

Cassoday, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff married the mother of the defendants in 1868, when the defendants were quite young. The boys both left home before they were sixteen years of age, and went to work for themselves. After they had accumulated a little money, and as early as 1884, the defendants, or one of them, went to Europe, bought some horses, shipped them to this country, and sold them. In the spring of 1885 they located at Watertown, and went into the business of buying and selling both imported and American horses, mostly for breeding purposes, but also on commission. The business of buying horses in Europe and shipping them to this country and selling them, by the defendants, appears to have been continued during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888. It is undisputed that the plaintiff from time to time let the defendants have money, to be used in such business. It would seem that some of the moneys so put in by the plaintiff were by way of a joint venture for a particular trip, whereby he was to have a certain share of the profits of the venture. It is conceded that the plaintiff let the defendants have, in June and September, 1886, the three items of cash mentioned in the findings, aggregating $3,100, to be used by the defendants in buying horses in Europe, and shipping to this country and selling the same. The defendants contend that the plaintiff so paid in the amount named in pursuance of an agreement or understanding that the defendants should put about $6,000 in for the same trip; and that, if the trip should turn out to be successful, then the plaintiff should have his money back, and one horse as his share of the profits; but, in case the trip should turn out to be unsuccessful, and a loss should occur, then the plaintiff was to stand his share of the loss in proportion to the respective amounts of money invested in such venture, and that the same should be deducted from the amount so advanced, and the plaintiff only to be paid the balance. On the other hand, the plaintiff claims that the amount of money named was loaned by the plaintiff to the defendants; that, if the trip was successful, he was to receive one of the horses for the use of his money, but that the amount thereof was to be returned to him within eight months in any event, as found by the referee. The question for determination is, which of these two theories is correct? The evidence is voluminous and conflicting. The determination of the question presented necessarily depended upon the credibility of the respective witnesses. The plaintiff appears to be a German, who speaks the English language very imperfectly, if at all. It appears also to be conceded that the referee was a lawyer of ability, thoroughly conversant with both the German and English languages, and personally acquainted with the parties and their witnesses. He possessed opportunities for determining the credibility of the witnesses, and the proper weight to be given to their testimony, which, from the very nature of things, this court cannot have. After full and apparently very deliberate consideration, the referee's report was wholly confirmed by the trial court. A detailed discussion of the evidence would only incumber the reports without being of any benefit to any one. It is enough to say that after a very careful examination and consideration of the whole record we have all come to the conclusion that the findings of the referee are sustained by the evidence. Certainly we cannot say that there is such a clear preponderance of the evidence against the findings as would justify a reversal. It is suggested, however, that the recent amendment to section 9070, Rev. Stat., by section 3, chap. 242, Laws 1893, makes it the "duty" of this court to review "all questions of law or fact presented by the record upon such appeal or writ of error," and "to examine and review the evidence when the same is preserved by a bill of exceptions, and give judgment according to the right of the cause, regardless of the decision upon questions of fact or law made by the court below, according to law and equity." This court has always sought to review "all questions of law or fact" properly presented for review by the record upon appeal or writ of error. It has, moreover, always sought "to examine and review the evidence when the same is preserved by a bill of exceptions," in a manner authorizing and calling for such examination and review, according to the established rules of "law and equity." Accordingly, this court has never felt bound by the findings of the trial court regardless of the weight of evidence, in an equitable action, or an action tried by the court without a jury, or even the verdict of a jury in an equitable action upon a feigned issue, whenever the record has properly presented the question of such weight of evidence, "according to law and equity." It has been suggested that the portion of the statute quoted was intended to impose upon this court the duty of examining and reviewing all questions of law or fact presented by the record upon such appeal or writ of error, and giving judgment as a court of original jurisdiction, according to the right of the cause, regardless of the decision of the trial court upon questions of fact or law. Undoubtedly, within certain limits, the legislature have power to regulate the practice of this court; but it must be remembered that this court, as well as the legislature, gets its judicial power and jurisdiction directly from the constitution. That instrument declares that "the judicial power of this state, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, courts of probate, and in justices of the peace." Section 2, art. 7. It, moreover, declares that "the supreme court, except in cases otherwise provided in this constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be coextensive with the state; but in no case removed to the supreme court shall a trial by jury be allowed." Section 3, art. 7. The case at bar is not one of those otherwise provided for in the constitution, and hence is not within the exception mentioned. In fact, there are but very few cases which do come within that exception. The duties of this court are confined almost wholly to an exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The constitution provides that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate; and shall extend to all cases at law." Section 5, art. 1. This court has uniformly held that this language imports that such right must remain as it existed when the constitution was adopted. Norval v. Rice, 2 Wis. 22; Gaston v. Babcock, 6 Wis. 503; Mead v. Walker, 17 Wis. 190; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Cross, 18 Wis. 109; Orocker v. State, 60 Wis. 555.

In State v. Cameron, 2 Pinney, 499, Stow, Ch. J., said: "The trial by jury, as it existed of old, is the trial by jury secured by our national and state constitutions. It is not granted by these instruments; it is more,—it is secured. It is no American invention. Our fathers brought it with them to this country more than two centuries ago, and by making it a part of the constitution they intended to perpetuate it for their posterity, and neither legislatures nor courts have any power to infringe even the least of its privileges." That language was quoted approvingly by Ryan, Ch. J., in Re Eldred, 46 Wis. 553, and it was again quoted in Jackson v. State, 81 Wis. 131. The writ of error mentioned in the act is to review the record properly made upon such a trial, and the constitution provides that in actions at law "writs of error shall never be prohibited by law." Section 21, art. 1. State v. Ryan, 70 Wis. 683.

It has been held that the legislature cannot authorize appeals to this court in certain cases from orders of circuit judges at chambers. Hubbell v. McCourt, 44 Wis. 584. To the same effect, State v. Brownell, 80 Wis. 568.

In Oatman v. Bond, 15 Wis. 20, the writer of this opinion attempted to sustain the validity of a legislative enactment which authorized, in a certain class of equity cases, a compulsory reference to take testimony, and gave a jury trial as a matter of right, and in some respects changed the established rule of procedure, the effect of evidence and judgment in such cases, and provided that certain matters not incorporated in the bill of exceptions should be considered by this court the same as though they were so incorporated; but the court properly held the enactment to be a nullity. So a statute requiring every issue of fact in an action to foreclose a mortgage executed to a corporation to be submitted to a jury on demand of either party was held to be invalid. Truman v. McCollum, 20 Wis. 360.

In Callanan v. Judd, 23 Wis. 343, counsel sought to maintain the validity of a legislative enactment requiring foreclosure cases, unless otherwise stipulated by the parties, to be tried by a jury, and giving the verdict the same force and effect as in actions at common law, but the act was held to be invalid, for the reason that the determination of questions of fact in such cases must remain as at the time of the adoption of the constitution.

In Deery v. McClintock, 81 Wis. 195, it was held that under the provisions of our state constitution, cited, the legislature cannot take anything from the original or primary jurisdiction of equity, and give it to the law, or the reverse.

It may be added that much less can the legislature take anything from the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts and give the same to this court in cases in which it has only appellate jurisdiction. We must hold that, in so far as section 2, chapter 242, Laws 1893, has attempted to give this court original jurisdiction in cases in which, under the constitution, it only has appellate jurisdiction, the same is null and void. This leaves the statute on that subject essentially the same as it was in Rev. Stat., § 3070. Counsel contends that upon the findings of fact the referee and trial court improperly allowed interest upon the balance due the plaintiff upon the accounts between the parties. But the referee found, in effect, that the $3,100 was loaned to the defendants with the mutual understanding between the parties, had in June, 1886, that the moneys so loaned "should be repaid at the expiration of eight months." It therefore became due at the end of the eight months, and would draw interest thereafter without any agreement. Besides, it appears from the defendants' bill of particulars that the amount was not very materially reduced by payments until long after the expiration of the eight months. We find no error in the record.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT

A. H. PORTER, Appt.,

v.

F. M. TULL, Reapt.

(6 Wash. 408.)

A tenant of a portion of a building may recover back rent paid in advance in accordance with the lease upon the total destruction of the building by fire.

(May 24, 1888.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover back the unearned portion of an advanced payment for rent of buildings which were destroyed by fire. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nash & Nash, for appellant:

A lease of land with buildings thereon, made in the country, holds the tenant to the payment of rent notwithstanding destruction of the premises during the term, because the land is the principal and the buildings the mere incidents and not the main thing upon which the parties predicated their agreement for a lease. But a different construction must be placed upon leases made in the country from those made in the city.

Doe v. Burt, 1 T. R. 708; Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 448, 45 Am. Dec. 220.

In cities the building becomes the principal and the land the incident.

A destruction of the building reaches to the subject-matter of the lease, or the thing that

NOTE.—Rights and liabilities of tenant on destruction of leased building.

Right of possession of rooms.

A tenant of rooms in a building destroyed by fire has no right of possession in a building erected by the lessor on the same property, unless under some covenant in the lease. Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 448, 45 Am. Dec. 220; Kerr v. Merchants Exchange Co. 3 Edw. Ch. 315, 6 L. ed. 672.

And he cannot retain possession by roofing basement walls. Winton v. Cornish, 5 Ohio, 477.

Nor by moving another building on the lot. Harrington v. Watson, 11 Or. 143, 50 Am. Rep. 465.

And where the question was one of repair, it was held that the tenant of a room had no right to have a building replaced by the landlord in the absence of contract. Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119, 6 Am. Rep. 47.

So a lease of a "message tenement and premises known as house No. 468 on —, in city of —," is construed not to include the ground, and the tenant has no interest in one rebuilt by lessor, especially where the lease required the tenant to rebuild in case of fire. Schmidt v. Petit, 1 McArthur. 179.

Possession of building.

A tenant of houses cannot recover in ejectment when such houses burned down and the landlord rebuilt but was under no obligation to rebuild. Ainsley v. Rutter, 1 T. R. 812, note.

But a lease of a building is not avoided by the destruction of the same under N. Y. Laws 1860, chap. 245, providing for a surrender, where no surrender is made and on rebuilding the tenant may retain possession. Smith v. Kerr, 108 N. Y. 31.

Continuance of rent for apartments and rooms.

The main case seems to be one of first impression as to the right of a tenant to recover back rent paid in advance for apartments, but somewhat similar decisions as to buildings were made in Cross v. Sutton and Smith v. Farnworth, infra, and in numerous cases it has been held that a lessee of apartments is not liable for rent after destruction of the building, without fault on his part. Parker v. Gibbins, 1 Q. B. 421, 1 Gale & D. 10, 5 Jur. 1088; McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 94 Am. Dec. 654; Graves v. Berdan, 29 Barb. 109, 25 N. Y. 498; Shawmut Nat. Bank v. Boeton, 118 Mass. 125; Womack v. McQuarry, 38 Ind. 103, 32 Am. Dec. 303; Austin v. Field, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 29; Ainsworth v. Ritt, 38 Cal. 89.

In Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 50 Ala. 530, and Buerger v. Bond, infra, it was held that the destruction of a building dissolves a tenancy as to a lease of a room, but this was not involved in the case.

Where the destruction was not irreparable, the lease was not terminated. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. United States, 21 Ct. Cl. 196; Smith v. McLean, 123 Ill. 210.

And the tenant of first floor and basement is not released from rent by the destruction of the rest of a four-story building above his floor except the walls, where the landlord used diligence in restoring. Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Shay, 37 Ill. App. 542.

And a tenant of an apartment was not released where the landlord rebuilt in seven months under 11 Geo. II. chap. 12, authorizing landlord to recover satisfaction for lands held or occupied, as this means power to occupy as far as the landlord is concerned. Ison v. Gorton, 5 Bing. N. C. 501, 3 Arn. 39, 7 Scott. 537, 8 Jur. 653.

The lessee of one room has no interest in the building after its destruction by fire, and it is no eviction to re-enter by the landlord to rebuild. Alexander v. Dorsey, 12 Ga. 12, 56 Am. Dec. 448.

This action was on a note for rent. The defense was eviction, and judgment was for lessor. The court does not discuss the question of abatement, failure of consideration, which seems not to have been raised but simply puts the decision on the above ground, and no authority is cited except on the ground of right to re-enter.

The tenant of a room was held liable for rent under Ga. Rev. Code, § 2207, providing that the destruction of rented premises by fire shall not abate the rent. Pope v. Garrard, 39 Ga. 471.

And Helburn v. Mofford, 7 Bush, 169, holds that a tenant of an apartment was liable on his covenant to pay rent after destruction of the premises. The court does not discuss the distinction generally made as to rooms, but bases the decision on a dictum of Redding v. Hall, infra.

So Marshall v. Schofield, 47 L. T. N. S. 406, 81 Week. Rep. 134, holds that a lessee of a room with steam power is liable for rent although the building was burned. The tenant did not file a counterclaim against the plaintiff for failure to furnish power and the court did not discuss the question as to rooms.

A lessee of three rooms and a piece of land must surrender all on destruction of building by fire, else he will be liable on his covenant to pay rent "so long as I shall be permitted to occupy the premises." Willard v. Tillman, 19 Wend. 358.

Continuance of rent for building.

At common law a lessee of premises is liable on his covenant to pay rent notwithstanding the destruction of the leased building without fault of lessee, in the absence of stipulation exonerating him. Philips v. Epp, 9 Lanc. L. Rev. 197, 6 Kulp, 406; Lanpner v. Glenn, 37 Minn. 4; Hallett v. Wylie, 3 Johns. 44, 3 Am. Dec. 457; Linn v. Ross, 10 Ohio, must be regarded as the consideration of the agreement to pay rent.

Coogan v. Parker, 22 S. C. N. S. 255, 16 Am. Rep. 674.

At common law it is held that if the leased property be destroyed by the act of God, so as to be incapable of any beneficial use or enjoyment to the tenant, the rent should be apportioned.

Rolle, Abr. 236; Graves v. Berdan, 26 N. Y. 498; Whitaker v. Hawley, 25 Kan. 675, 37 Am. Rep. 277; Ainsworth v. Ritt, 38 Cal. 89; Womack v. McQuarry, 28 Ind. 103, 92 Am. Dec. 306; McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 362, 94 Am. Dec. 654.

Where after destruction of buildings by fire the tenant of the property has endeavored to exert his title and dominion over the burned district, and has sought to keep the landlord off the premises, the leading case in Winton v.

Cornish, 5 Ohio, 477, holds that after the fire the tenant no longer has any legal interest in the soil.

See also Kerr v. Merchants Exchange Co. 8 Edw. Ch. 315, 6 L. ed. 672; Shawmut Nat. Bank v. Boston, 118 Mass. 125; Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 456, 45 Am. Dec. 220.

When the use of the premises is entirely lost to the tenant and destroyed, it is reasonable that the rent should be abated, because the title to the rent is founded upon the presumption that the tenant can enjoy the demised premises during the term.

Comyn, Land. & T. 218; Gilbert, Rents, 182.

The doctrine that the tenant shall pay rent although the premises be destroyed during the term has no foundation in natural justice, and the reasons for its existence, if it ever had any, have disappeared with the changed conditions of society.

And a tenant is liable on his covenant to pay rent where the building is destroyed by fire, although the lessor has obtained insurance money on the building. Leeds v. Cheetham, 18 Sim. 145; Bussman v. Ganster, 72 Pa. 285; Lofft v. Dennis, 1 El. & El. 474, 28 L. J. Q. B. 168, 5 Jur. N. S. 737; Magaw v. Lambert, 3 Pa. 444.

And a guarantor of lessee of lot with buildings is not released from payment of rent where the buildings are destroyed by fire, nor for past rent by surrender by lessee of lease in consideration of release by lessor of future rent, nor by lessor's obtaining full insurance and not rebuilding. Kingsbury v. Westfall, 61 N. Y. 356.

But Brown v. Quilter, 2 Ambl. 619, 2 Eden, 219, holds that the liability ceases in case the lessor obtains the insurance money; but in this case the landlord took possession.

The same doctrine was announced in Magaw v. Lambert, supra, to the effect if the landlord obtained insurance and took possession the lease would be at an end.

So where the lease required the landlord to rebuild or give the insurance to the lessee and the landlord retained the insurance and possession of the premises, the liability of the tenant ceased on the destruction of the building. Boyer v. Dickson, 7 Phila. 190.

And a tenant of building and contents is not liable for rent after the destruction of the building where he was required to insure for the benefit of the lessor, as this provision of the contract provides for the possibility of fire. Whitaker v. Hawley, 26 Kan. 675, 37 Am. Rep. 277.

And under N. J. Rev., 576, § 23, providing rent shall cease where building on leased premises is 22 L. R. A.

destroyed by fire without fault of lessee, and landlord fails to rebuild, a tenant is liable for rent where a barn was burned through his fault. Dorr v. Harkness, 49 N. J. L. 571, 60 Am. Rep. 654. See also Ely v. Ely, infra.

And a tenant is liable on his covenant to pay rent, on the destruction of the building by fire, although the lease may provide that he is not to repair in case of fire. Hare v. Groves, 3 Anstr. 687; Holtzappel v. Baker, 18 Ves. Jr. 118; Beach v. Farish, 4 Cal. 389.

Rent ceasing by terms of lease.

A tenant is not liable for rent after the destruction of the premises, where such a provision is made in the lease. Patterson v. Ackerson, 1 Edw. Ch. 93, 6 L. ed. 73; Rich v. Smith, 121 Mass. 323; Buschman v. Wilson, 29 Md. 553.

Or where such a clause is omitted from the lease by mistake. Wood v. Hubbell, 10 N. Y. 479; Gates v. Green, 4 Paige, 355, 3 L. ed. 468, 27 Am. Dec. 68.

And where some of the buildings burned, the tenant may have the rent apportioned, where such a provision was in the lease. Allen v. Culver, 3 Denio, 204; Bennett v. Ireland, El. Bl. & El. 323, 28 L. J. Q. B. 49, 4 Jur. N. S. 1104.

This may also be done under Louisiana Civ. Code, § 2067; Penn v. Kearny, 21 La. Ann. 21.

A lessee who gave a note for the privilege of surrendering a lease which provided for an abatement of the rent if the premises should be burned, is not entitled to an abatement for burning after the surrender, and before the note matured. Brooks v. Cutter, 119 Mass. 132.

A lease providing for a deduction in the rent in case of destruction by fire, is not a covenant to refund rent paid in advance. Cross v. Button, 4 Wis. 468.

So a tenant paying rent after the building has burned cannot recover it back where it is a voluntary payment and there is no claim of mistake. Regan v. Baldwin, 126 Mass. 435.

If the building is destroyed by fire before the term commences, the tenant is not liable for rent. Wood v. Hubbell, 5 Barb. 601.

And a landlord is liable to the tenant for repairs made by the tenant in advance on a contract to credit such repairs on the rent, where the premises are burned before the term. Smith v. Farnworth, 6 Hun, 598.

Any estate less than a freehold is called by writers on real property a chattel interest in lands, and the tenant the quasi bailee of the remainderman or reversioner.

His interest has more of the characteristics of bailments than of a freehold estate in real property.

Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 171; Washb. Real Prop. § 435; 1 Cruise, Dig. 224.

Messrs. Jones, Belt & Quinn, for respondent:

The only case which we have been able to find in which a suit had been brought to recover back rent paid in advance, is the case of Ward v. Bull, 1 Fla. 271. In that case the rent was payable yearly in advance. The tenant paid the rent when due. Subsequently the buildings were destroyed by fire. The landlord rebuilt them, and on the completion leased them to a third party, and refused to let the original lessees into possession. He sued to recover back a proportionate amount of the rent for so much of the term as run subsequent to the time when the landlord made the lease to the third party; and the court held that he was entitled to recover, not because the landlord had contracted to re-pay him anything, but because the landlord had been guilty of a wrong. But the court in that case would not listen to any claim for repayment of any part of the rent that accrued prior to the wrongful act of the landlord.

Dunbar, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the recovery of lease money paid in advance, according to the Abatement of rent by surrender of premises.

A tenant not surrendering possession of the premises where the buildings are destroyed during the term, is liable on his covenant to pay rent. Baker v. Holtzappel, 4 Taunt. 45.

And is so liable under a parol lease. Voluntine v. Godfrey, 9 Vt. 186.

And a tenant is liable for reasonable rent for retaining possession some time after the fire, where the lease provided "rent shall cease on destruction by fire." Wallace v. Coe, 13 N. Y. S. R. 546.

And the liability for rent on an appeal bond pending suit for possession still continues, notwithstanding the destruction of the building by fire. Davis v. Alden, 2 Gray, 309.

And the tenant cannot recover back rent paid in advance where he does not surrender, although lessor covenants in case of fire to refund so much for the unexpired term. Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 50 Ala. 590.

Under Minn. Laws 1883, § 1, chap. 100, authorizing an abatement of rent, where buildings are destroyed, a surrender must be made. Roach v. Peterson, 47 Minn. 291.

So under Ohio Rev. Stat., § 4113, which is a similar statute. Gay v. Davey, 47 Ohio St. 396, 24 Ohio L. J. 819.

The same was held in Boston Block Co. v. Buffington, 39 Minn. 386, but was not the point involved in the case.

And this was held under The New York Act of 1890 authorizing a surrender but was not the question involved. Danziger v. Falkenberg, 46 N. Y. S. R. 341; Pearson v. Gillotte, 15 N. Y. S. R. 395.

And under this act the tenant should have a reasonable time to remove. Zimmer v. Black, 37 N. Y. S. R. 312; Bassett v. Dean, 84 Hun, 250.

And he is discharged from further rent on such surrender. New York Real Estate & Bldg. Imp. Co. v. Motley, 3 Misc. 232.

But keeping the goods for sale on the premises, under a new contract with the lessor, will not defeat a surrender made under this statute. Kelly v. Partridge, 4 Misc. 205.

And lessee is not liable for further rent even if he did not surrender, where the lessor fails to replace the leased building and the lease provides, "lessee may at his option terminate this lease and shall no longer be liable for rent thereunder," if lessor fails to rebuild the premises destroyed. Philadelphia Trust, S. D. & Ins. Co. v. Purves (Pa.) May 7, 1888.

And lessee holding over is not liable for rent after the building is destroyed, where the new case was void because not signed as required by 22 L. R. A.

law. Cheesebrough v. Pingree, 1 L. R. A. 529, 73 Mich. 438.

The liability of the tenant for rent ceases where landlord re-enters, rebuilds and leases to others, and the former tenant may recover back rent paid in advance. Ward v. Bull, 1 Fla. 311.

So if the landlord pulls down a party wall rendering the leased premises untenable, the lease will be avoided under La. Code, § 2367. Coleman v. Haight, 14 La. Ann. 570.

And re-entry by landlord, will suspend rent. Hoever v. Fleming, 91 Pa. 322.

But not if tenant retains possession with some goods during the time of rebuilding by landlord. Townsend v. Hendrickson, 5 W. N. C. 422.

Surrender. See Williard v. Tillman, 19 Wend. 356; Smith v. Kerr, 106 N. Y. 31. See also Statutes, infra.

Liability of tenant to rebuild.

A tenant is not liable to rebuild structures destroyed during the term without his fault, where the lease provides merely for a surrender of the said premises but makes no provision for repair. Warner v. Hitchins, 5 Barb. 666; Maggort v. Hansbarger, 8 Leigh, 536.

Or to deliver in the same condition wear and tear excepted. Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446; Miller v. Morris, 56 Tex. 412, 40 Am. Rep. 814; Levey v. Dycas, 51 Miss. 501.

So under a similar lease having a clause "unavoidable casualty excepted." Kelly v. Duffy (Pa.) Oct. 31, 1887; Howeth v. Anderson, 25 Tex. 557, 78 Am. Dec. 538.

And the same is true even where there is a covenant to keep in repair and yield up the same in like condition but with an exception as to damages by the "elements" and the buildings are burned. Van Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 393, 47 Am. Rep. 582.

And even where under a similar covenant the exception was only for "natural wear and tear and fire," and the building fell down from its own defective construction the tenant was not required to rebuild. Hess v. Newcomer, 7 Md. 325.

So it was held that a tenant will not have to rebuild on a covenant to repair and maintain, where the house had to be pulled down because it is condemned as dangerous in consequence of its inherent defects caused by rotting of foundations. Lister v. Lane, C. A. [1893] 2 Q. B. 212.

This is based on the doctrine that the age and condition of a house when the tenancy begins is to be considered in construing such covenants.

But the general rule is that a covenant to repair requires a lessee to rebuild in case the premises leased are destroyed or burned. Bullock v. Dommett, 6 T. R. 650; Hoy v. Holt, 91 Pa. 88, 36 Am. Rep.

terms of the lease. The respondent, F. M. Tull, the owner and lessor of the leased premises, rented and leased to A. H. Porter and C. F. Jackson certain rooms and portions of the building known as the "Tull Block" in the city of Spokane. The lessees paid the stipulated rent, according to the terms of the lease, monthly, in advance, including the month of August, 1889. On the 4th day of August, 1889, the building was destroyed by fire, and Porter, for himself, and as the assignee of Jackson, brings this action to recover from Tull the money paid in advance for the remainder of the month of August, 1889. It

And the same was held under a covenant "to repair and deliver up." Nave v. Berry, 23 Ala. 383.

And the same was held under a similar covenant where the house burned down, after the term, but before the tenant had surrendered. Digby v. Atkinson, 4 Campb. 275.

A lessee's covenant "to keep the buildings and fences in good repair, except natural wear and tear" binds him to rebuild in case of accidental destruction by fire or otherwise. McIntosh v. Lown, 49 Barb. 550.

So in a covenant to keep premises in repair and at the termination of the lease to return the said house in as good condition and repair "as it was in when the lease was made," even if the tenant is a corporation. Abby v. Billups, 35 Miss. 630, 73 Am. Dec. 143.

And the same was held under a similar covenant containing also the words "reasonable wear and tear excepted." Phillips v. Stevens, 16 Mass. 238.

So where the covenant was to keep a bridge in repair and it was destroyed by a flood or cyclone. Brecknock & A. Canal Navigation v. Pritchard, 6 T. R. 750; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 440.

So where the lease required a tenant to rebuild and the lessee insured and collected the money when the building burned but failed to replace it. Hayes v. Ferguson, 15 Lea, 1, 54 Am. Rep. 393.

And under a covenant to "keep the premises in good and tenantable repair," and keep as long as he should think proper, the tenant must replace the premises if they are burned, and cannot escape liability by declining to keep. Gregg v. Coates, 23 Beav. 33, 2 Jur. N. S. 964; Bohannon v. Lewis, 3 T. B. Mon. 376; Meyers v. Myrrell, 57 Ga. 516.

And Singleton v. Carroll, 6 J. J. Marsh. 523, 23 Am. Dec. 95; Pym v. Blackburn, 3 Ves. Jr. 34, and Beach v. Crain, 2 N. Y. 86, 49 Am. Dec. 369, state that a tenant is bound to rebuild under a covenant to repair, but this was not the point involved in these cases.

Where the covenant required the tenant to repair and he was sued for not replacing a house that was burned, a plea that the house was rebuilt was bad as it did not show that it was rebuilt by the tenant. Walton v. Waterhouse, 2 Saund. 420; Walton v. Johnson, 2 Keb. 535.

And Rook v. Warth, 1 Ves. Jr. 462, holds that a tenant for years subject to the law in regard to waste must rebuild in case the premises are destroyed unless by lightning or by act of God, but this was not the question involved.

But a tenant is not liable to the landlord in the absence of any covenant, where the building burned without any fault on the part of the tenant. Wainscott v. Silvers, 13 Ind. 497.

Liability of landlord on destruction of building.

Landlord is liable to the tenant for failure to rebuild burned premises on express covenant to rebuild. Hadia v. Ott, 2 Wash. Terr. 165.

And his executor is also liable. Chamberlain v. Dunlop, 126 N. Y. 45, affirming 8 N. Y. Supp. 123.

But under such a covenant he cannot be compelled to replace additions to the leased premises that the tenant built. Loader v. Kemp, 2 Car. & P. 575.

22 J. R. A.

And the lessor is liable for refusal to rebuild where a carriage house fell down from weight of snow thereon, and the lessor covenanted to make all necessary repair on the outside of the building. Leavitt v. Fletcher, 10 Allen, 112; Crocker v. Hill, 61 N. H. 345, 60 Am. Rep. 322.

And the lessor is liable to the tenant for damages caused by the destruction of the building caused by negligence of the lessor in an attempt to repair. Butler v. Cushing, 46 Hun, 521.

And after a lease was surrendered under New York Act 1860, the lessor requesting the lessee to remove the debris of the burned building is liable to him for the cost. Fleischman v. Toplitz, 134 N. Y. 349.

And under the Pennsylvania Act of April 11, 1854, §4, providing that dangerous walls shall be removed by the owner, a landlord is liable to contribute to the tenant for removing such a wall after the premises burned. French v. Richards, 6 Phila. 547.

But the lessor is not liable for not rebuilding where the tenant had covenanted to rebuild and repair. Hartford & N. Y. S. B. Co. v. New York, 12 Hun, 550.

Even if the lessor obtains insurance. Ely v. Ely, 80 Ill. 532.

And a lessor acquiescing in the destruction of his buildings by the city is not liable to the tenant as in case of an eviction. Hitchcock v. Acon, 118 Pa. 272.

And under La. Code, art. 2609, providing for an annulment of the lease in case the thing ceases to be fit for the purpose for which it is leased, the lessee is not entitled to indemnity for injury to his plantation amounting to destruction of crops by flood. Viterbo v. Friedlander, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. ed. 776.

Liability of landlord. See Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119, 6 Am. Rep. 47.

Statutes.

In some states the statutes provide that a tenant may surrender the premises where the same has been destroyed without fault on his part, and the rent shall abate unless there is an express covenant to the contrary. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1942; Conn. Stat. 1888, § 2609; Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 75, § 38c; Miss. Code, §§ 2497, 2498; Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2303; N. C. Batt. Rev. 1872, p. 554; La. Civ. Code, § 2676; N. Y. Rev. Stat. Birdseye, vol. 1, p. 326; Laws 1860, chap. 345, § 1; Ohio Rev. Stat. § 4113.

And some states provide that a destruction of leased premises by fire without fault of lessee abates the rent. N. J. Rev. 1877; Va. Code 1867, § 2455.

And some states also provide by statute that a tenant will not have to rebuild premises destroyed by fire without fault on his part, unless he has expressly covenanted to rebuild. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1941; Dak. Code, § 1114; Ga. Code, § 2284; Ky. Gen. Stat. 1888, chap. 63, § 23; W. Va. Code 1891, chap. 72, § 22; Va. Code 1867, § 2454.

And some provide that mills are to be rebuilt and cost apportioned by judicial proceedings. Me. Rev. Stat. 1883, chap. 57; Mass. Rev. Stat. 1867, p. 1096.

And in North Carolina a tenant cannot be compelled to contribute more than one half the cost of rebuilding. N. C. Batt. Rev. 1872, p. 554.

As to rights of tenant where property is taken in condemnation proceedings, see note to Corrigan v. Chicago (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 213. L. T.

is contended by the appellant that the authorities in this country fully sustain the proposition that, when there is a total destruction of the subject-matter of the lease, the rent shall be apportioned, and the tenant is no longer liable on his covenant. This proposition is conceded by the respondent so far as it applies to rent that is due for periods subsequent to the term for which the rent is paid in advance, but he insists that a distinction must be made here, and that, inasmuch as the parties have contracted that the money must be paid in advance, it follows that they have apportioned the risk, or settled it between them; that the tenant assumes the risk of losing the rent for the time for which he has paid in advance, and the landlord assumes the risk of losing subsequent payment, besides the loss of his building. We are unable to discover any real foundation in logic, law, or justice for this distinction. The consideration for which the lessee pays a monthly rent in advance is not that he may be put in possession of the building for a day or two days or a week, but the real consideration is the use and possession of the building for a month. That is the valuable thing for which he contracts, and for which he parts with his money; and there is an implied contract on the part of the lessor to furnish him the use of the building for the time for which he pays for it. It cannot be presumed that, because a lessee pays in advance, he has in contemplation the fixing of a different degree of liability in case of the destruction of the leased premises by fire; neither is it so intended by the lessor. It is simply a prudential requirement on his part to secure the rent, and to protect himself against the chances of losing it, and the inconvenience and trouble of collecting it. Conceding that the lessee is not liable for the destruction of the leased building for the remainder of the period for which the building was leased, there must be something more to warrant the presumption that the parties intended to establish a different degree of liability than the mere fact that the money was paid in advance. What difference can there be in principle, so far as fixing liability is concerned, whether the contract is to pay the rent monthly in advance or monthly at the end of the month? Great stress is placed by respondent on the idea that the parties have made a positive contract, and that they are bound by its terms. The contract in one instance is as positive and binding as in the other, and the liability to pay at the end of the month is as much fixed by such contract as the liability to pay in advance is fixed by the contract; and the same reasoning that would prevent the recovery of the money paid in advance would compel the payment of the money under the other contract at the end of the month after the destruction of the building. We are not cited to any adjudicated cases on this point. The reason probably is that no one has ever questioned the right of the lessee to recover money paid for that which he never received. We think the complaint states a good cause of action, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer, and to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Manford HORN, Resp't.,

v.

Theodore HANSEN, App't.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. A unilateral promise or agreement, in writing, to pay for specified personal property, is binding if upon sufficient consideration; and, in a case not within the statute of frauds, the consideration may be shown by parol. But the writing may not be contradicted by oral evidence, though an issue may be raised in respect to the consideration, or the writing may, for other valid reason, be shown to be inoperative.

2. Where either of the parties to a suit is a stranger to the written agreement in controversy, and does not claim under one who is a party to it, the rule forbidding parol evidence to vary or contradict its terms does not apply. Otherwise when the question arises between those claiming under the original parties to it.

*Headnotes by VANDERBURGH, J.

NOTE.—The effect of a wheat ticket like the one involved in the above case in respect to contradiction by oral evidence presents an interesting question, especially in view of the fact learned from counsel that this is a test case to decide the rights 22 L. R. A.

3. A note or other instrument containing an express promise to pay money, without any time specified, is in law payable immediately, and interest runs from its date, while a promise to pay upon demand requires at least a judicial demand to set interest running.

(December 20, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Swift County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a wheat ticket. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. T. F. Young and Foland & McCune, for appellant:

The rule of law that when parties reduce their contracts to writing their terms cannot be varied by parol only applies when the action is between the parties to the contract or their privies.

The plaintiff in this case is a stranger to the contract and is not even an assignee, but of the parties in a large number of tickets. For the general rule as to contradicting a writing which states part of a contract only, see note to Ferguson v. Rafferty (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 44.

obtained his title thereto by forcible process of law. The reason for the rule does not apply to strangers except perhaps in the case of negotiable instruments.

Wilke*, 50 Cal. 250; Smith v. Moynihan, 44 Cal. 58; McMaster v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 55 N. Y. 222, 14 Am. Rep. 239; Brown v. Thurber, 77 N. Y. 618, 58 How. Pr. 95; Van Eman v. Stanchfield, 10 Minn. 255 (Gil. 197); Sanborn v. Sturtevant, 17 Minn. 200 (Gil. 174); Barry v. Ransom, 12 N. Y. 464; Coleman v. First Nat. Bank of Elmira, 53 N. Y. 388.

Volume 6, Gen. Dig. p. 772, § 1291, states the rule as follows: "The rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary a writing does not apply to controversies between persons not parties or privy to the writing or between parties to it and third persons.

Citing Robinson v. Moseley, 98 Ala. 70; Bruce v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. 87 Va. 381. See also Bishop, Cont. § 1824.

The wheat was delivered to Hansen by Sylte for storage. This ticket was issued and delivered to Sylte in pursuance of this parol agreement for the purpose of indicating the number of bushels of wheat so held by Hansen and does not contain all of the conditions of the actual agreement of the parties and is upon its face manifestly incomplete, and upon such an instrument the defendant had a right to introduce parol proof of the oral agreement even between the parties to it.

See Healy v. Young, 21 Minn. 389; Alexander v. Thompson, 42 Minn. 498; Boynston Furnace Co. v. Clark, Id. 385.

This instrument is incomplete for the further reasons: The court cannot say from an examination of the instrument that it is an agreement to pay currency for that wheat; no price is stated and no amount of money is mentioned though in the form used there is a blank space for each of these items, when that is agreed upon. Besides under this instrument it may be shown that currency was not meant at all.

Donley v. Tindall, 32 Tex. 43, 5 Am. Rep. 234.

Parties entering into an oral contract may employ written memoranda in aid of it; in which case, and in others wherein there are writings evidently not meant to be complete, the contract is oral, and as such is not prevented from being good by what is written.

Mr. E. T. Young, for respondent:

This action is, "between the parties to the contract or their privies." Plaintiff has legally succeeded to Sylte's rights, occupies the position of an assignee, and is in privity to the party to whose rights he succeeds.

The rule appellant attempts to invoke, applies only where a contract comes in question, to which at least one of the parties to the action is neither a party nor a privy.

Clerihew v. West Side Bank, 50 Minn. 538.

The only thing lacking in this written contract, to make it absolutely complete, is the omission of the price to be paid.

It is not claimed by either party that a price was expressly agreed upon. In such cases the law implies an understanding that the buyer shall pay what the article purchased is reasonably worth.

Benjamin, Sales, § 85; Accebal v. Levy, 10 Bing. 876; Lovejoy v. Michels, 18 L. R. A. 770, 88 Mich. 15; Hillestad v. Hostetter, 46 Minn. 894.

Where a contract is silent as to the time of performance the law conclusively presumes that it is to be performed within a reasonable time. And it is even held that oral evidence is not admissible to contradict this necessary legal inference, if the contract is in writing.

Liljengren Furniture & L. Co. v. Mead, 42 Minn. 420.

Any evidence to be admissible at all to add to or vary this contract would have to be consistent with the contract, and tend to aid and uphold it, and not evidence which if admitted would flatly contradict it.

Wemple v. Knopf, 15 Minn. 440 (Gil. 355), 2 Am. Rep. 147. See also Kessler v. Smith, 42 Minn. 494; Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 374.

If this ticket is evidence of anything it is that the transaction was a sale.

Tarbell v. Farmers Mut. Elev. Co. 44 Minn. 471.

Vanderburgh, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controversy in this case arises over a so-called "wheat ticket" issued by defendant, and now owned by plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges that one Sylte, under whom he claims, sold and delivered to defendant 45 20-60 bushels of wheat, of the quality and amount designated on the ticket, on the day of the date thereof, and that he thereupon issued to Sylte the ticket, which is as follows: "Ex. A. No. 9,617. Date. Oct. 7, 1891. Theo. Hansen will pay to J. K. Sylte for forty-five 20-60 bushels, grade one N. wheat. Ole Saterbakken, Buyer." It is also alleged that the wheat, on that day, was worth 81 cents per bushel. Judgment is accordingly asked for the value of the wheat. The defendant, in his answer, admits issuing the ticket, and the delivery of the wheat described therein, at that date, but alleges that he did not purchase the wheat, but received the same to hold for plaintiff as a bailment. The defendant does not deny that the "ticket" was issued for that number of bushels of wheat left with him, or that it was connected with that transaction, or that it was the evidence of his liability therefor. Indeed, defendant admits and insists, in his argument, that it was given in part performance of the actual agreement. But he says that the writing does not contain all the agreement, and he claims the right, not only to supplement it by parol evidence of so much of the entire agreement as is not expressed in writing, but to contradict the terms of the writing, because it is informal, and not a complete agreement, and for that reason he is not bound by it. But we think the writing, on its face, is a valid unilateral promise or agreement, if supported by a consideration, which may, of course, be shown by parol, since the agreement is not within the statute of frauds. The common-law rule permits this, and permits a contract to rest partly in writing and partly in parol, so that it may accordingly be proved by the writing and by parol. Wright v. Weeks, 25 N. Y. 158; Cummings v. Dennett, 26 Me. 397; Arms v. Ashley, 4 Pick. 74.

In this case the writing is silent as to the fact or time of the delivery of the wheat; and it might, therefore, be shown that the wheat therein referred to was actually delivered when the written promise was made, as admitted here, or at a subsequent day. In the latter case the writing would be construed as an offer or proposition good while it remained open; and if acted on, and the wheat delivered and accepted before it was withdrawn, the promise would thereupon become binding. 1 Story, Cont. § 572. But the written proposal or promise could not be contradicted by parol, though it might be shown that it was or was not accepted, or that the stipulated quantity of wheat was or was not in fact appropriated to the agreement. The general rule is that the omitted portions of a contract which does not appear to be complete may be proved by parol, but so much of the contract as is in writing must be proved by the writing. Thomas v. Scutt, 127 N. Y. 138. See Smith, Cont. *78; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 804.

It is true that in some instances an instrument purporting to be a contract, and actually signed by parties, may be shown not to be operative, for various reasons, or it may be controlled by an independent agreement not in writing. A conspicuous instance is the case of Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Anderson, 23 Minn. 57. No reason appears in this case why the writing in question should not be operative according to its terms. It is not claimed to have been issued through fraud, mistake, or inadvertence. For aught that appears, it is the conclusion of the parties in respect to so much of the agreement as is in writing, viz. that part of it which defines the defendant's relation to the contract as that of purchaser, and not simply that of bailee.

The defendant's principal assignment of error relates to the ruling of the court rejecting his offer to show that, upon the date named in Exhibit A, said ticket was issued to the parties thereto for a portion of a larger quantity of wheat delivered, "and for the purpose of indicating that the said wheat was held by the said Hansen subject to the order of Sylte." So much of the offer was objected to as tending to contradict the writing, and the objection was sustained. The ruling extended no further. For reasons already stated, we think the court ruled correctly. It did not, however, preclude the defendant from introducing evidence in respect to other matters embraced in his general offer, or permissible under the rule above stated. The defendant, however, introduced no other evidence.

The defendant raises no question as to the plaintiff's title to the wheat ticket, or the indebtedness represented thereby. And, there being no special agreement as to the price, the law will imply that the price to be paid was the fair market value of the wheat on the day of the delivery, being the date of the writing. He does not deny that plaintiff claims under, and has succeeded to the rights of, the original payee, Sylte. He stands in the shoes of the latter; and the rule therefore applies, that as between parties to a written agreement, or their privies, parol evidence cannot be received to contradict or vary its terms. Strangers to a contract are, of course, not bound by it, and the rule excluding extrinsic evidence in the construction of writings is inapplicable in such cases; and it is relaxed where either one of the parties between whom the question arises is a stranger to the written agreement, and does not claim under or through one who is a party to it. In such case the rule is binding upon neither. But it is manifestly inapplicable in this case. It was admitted at the trial that the market value of the wheat on the day of its delivery—the date of the writing—was 80 cents per bushel.

We think the court properly allowed interest from the date of the writing, the wheat having been already delivered. No date of payment is fixed in the writing. No credit is contemplated and it was due presently. Had there been simply a cash sale and delivery of the wheat, the amount due would have borne interest from the day of the delivery, and there is nothing in the writing qualifying such rule of liability. It is distinguished from a promise to pay upon demand, which requires a demand, at least a judicial demand, to set the interest running. This distinction is recognized by the authorities. The rule, summarily stated, is that a note or other instrument containing an express promise to pay money, without any time specified, is in law payable immediately, and interest runs from its date. Farquhar v. Morris, 7 T. R. 124; Francis v. Castleman, 4 Bibb, 282; Rogers v. Colt, 21 N. J. L. 19; Purdy v. Philips, 11 N. Y. 406, 1 Duer, 369; Selleck v. French, 1 Am. Lead Cas. 4th ed. 507.

Some authorities also distinguish between an express promise to pay money, and a mere acknowledgment of indebtedness, or an I. O. U. (Gay v. Rooke, 151 Mass. 115, 7 L. R. A. 392),—a point unnecessary to inquire into here.

Judgment affirmed.

Giffillan, Ch. J.:

I dissent. The ticket is not a contract. A contract not within the statute of frauds may be shown partly by writing, as letters, for instance, and partly by oral testimony; but in such case I do not think the writings, they not being a contract, exclude oral testimony of what the parties actually agreed on, though it may be contrary to what the writings, standing alone, might indicate, as to some of its terms.

1. The opinion of a witness on the question whether or not it was possible for a person if standing to have fallen in the position in which he was found, is not admissible.
2. The question whether or not a person could have rolled from a certain place where he was sitting to that where he was found in a stream is not one on which an opinion of a witness can be given.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan, Southern Division, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

This was a writ of error brought to reverse a judgment of the United States circuit court for the western district of Michigan, southern division, in favor of Susan E. Dorgan, for $5,200, on an accident insurance policy or a certificate of membership issued by the defendant company upon the life of Thomas Dorgan, husband of the plaintiff. By the terms of the policy, $5,000 was payable to Susan E. Dorgan, the plaintiff below, "within ninety days after receipt of satisfactory proof to this company of the death of the above-named member, effected through external, violent, and accidental means, within the extent and meaning of this contract and the condition hereunto annexed, and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death within ninety days of the happening thereof."

The evidence tended to show the following facts:

Early in May, 1890, Thomas Dorgan, the insured, left his home in Kalamazoo, Mich., with three or four companions, on a fishing excursion to a place not many miles distant. The party took with them wine, whiskey, and beer, and provisions. They arrived at their destination in the afternoon, made a camp near the brook in which they intended to fish, slept on cots under a tent, and arose early the next morning, about 3 or 4 o'clock, to go fishing. They fished from that time until shortly before noon, when the members of the party came into camp for lunch. The weather was not very cold, and there was some sunshine in the middle of the day. Dorgan spoke of having some difficulty with his throat and chest before going out on the trip. He took something for breakfast. He

NOTE.—The question when disease is the cause of death within the meaning of a life insurance policy is well illustrated by the case in which the authorities on the subject seem to be very fully presented. The case is of more than usual interest also for the decision on the question what constitutes a disease or bodily infirmity within the meaning of such a policy.

came in to lunch. The evidence does not disclose how much he ate, if anything. He went back to an island in the brook, where, shortly afterwards, he was seen playing a trout. Twenty minutes later he was discovered lying in the brook, with his face downward, and submerged in six inches of water, dead. The bank was about eighteen inches above the water, and there were in the water stones, egg-size and smaller, upon which he might have struck his head. There were two bruises on his forehead. There was some little froth of a yellowish color about his mouth, and his face was purple. His tongue was somewhat inflamed. An autopsy was held on the evening of the day following the death. The blood in the corpse at the autopsy was rather fluid, and had not coagulated. The brain, the heart, and other vital organs were found in a normal and healthy condition. The autopsy was performed by one physician in the presence of two others. Evidence was introduced by the defendant tending to show that the deceased had suffered from defective action of the heart in its aortic valve. The autopsy failed to reveal any such structural defect, but all the tests were not applied. The evidence as to the defective action of the heart was given by the physician who had examined the deceased during his lifetime, and who testified to a murmur accompanying the beat of the heart, which was said to reveal such structural defect, though he admitted such a murmur is sometimes present when the action of the heart is normal, but the beat and circulation are feeble. There was also some evidence tending to show that the deceased had suffered from dizziness caused by this defective action of the heart.

Section 8 of the certificate of policy provided "that the benefits under this certificate shall not extend to hernia, orchitis, nor to bodily injury of which there shall be no external and visible mark upon the body of the member; nor shall they extend to or cover accidental injuries or death resulting from or caused, directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, by or in consequence of fits, vertigo, somnambulism, or any disease existing prior or subsequent to the date of this certificate, or by blood poisoning, or by coming in contact with any poisonous substance, or by poison in any form, or by inhalation or otherwise of any form of chloride gas, nitrous oxide gas, or any other form of gas or gases of chloroform or ether, or by or in consequence of any surgical operation or medical or mechanical treatment, or by lockjaw, nor to any cause excepting where the injury is the sole cause of the disability or death. No claim shall be made under this certificate . . . where the death or injury may have happened in consequence . . . of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, hazard, or perilous adventure, . . . or where death or injury may have happened while the member was, or in consequence of his having been, under the influence of intoxicating drinks. . . . And that these benefits, shall not be held to extend to disappearances, nor to any cause of death or personal injury, unless the claimant under the certificate shall establish by direct and positive proof that the said death or personal injury was caused by external, violent and accidental means, clearly within the intent and scope of this policy, and was not the result of design, either on the part of the member or any other person."

In the application which Dorgan made for membership in the company (that is, for a policy), he used this language: "Inclosing $5 for admission fee, I hereby apply for membership, to be based upon the following statement of facts, which I hereby warrant to be true. Certificate to be subject to all its conditions and provisions. . . . (18) I have never had, nor am subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, or any bodily or mental infirmity, except as herein stated. . . . (15) My habits of life are correct and temperate, and I understand that the certificate will not cover any accidental injury which may happen to me either while under the influence of intoxicating drinks (or any other narcotics), or in consequence of having been under the influence thereof. (16) I am aware that the insurance will not extend to hernia, orchitis, nor to any bodily injury of which there shall be no external and visible sign; nor to any bodily injury happening directly or indirectly in consequence of disease; nor to death or disability caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities, or by disease, or by the taking of poison, or by any surgical operation or medical mechanical treatment; nor to any case except when the accidental injury shall be the proximate and sole cause of disability or death."

At the end of the application, Dorgan signed the following: "Declaration: I, Thomas Dorgan, being desirous of becoming a member of the Manufacturers' Accident Indemnity Company, do hereby warrant the above statements to be true; and I hereby agree that this declaration and warranty shall be the basis of the contract between me and the said company, and that the certificate hereby applied for is accepted subject to all the conditions, classifications, and provisions contained or referred to therein."

The company pleaded the general issue, and gave notice of the intention to prove, under that issue, that Dorgan was, at the time he made the application for the policy, subject to fainting spells or fits, disorders of the brain, heart disease, disease of the throat and chest, and that the statement to the contrary in paragraph 18 of his application above was false and untrue, rendering the policy void. The defendant also gave notice of the intention to prove that Dorgan did not die in consequence of any bodily injury in which there was any external and visible sign, but he died in consequence of disease, and that his death was not caused by any accident or accidental injury which was the proximate and sole cause of his death.

The jury, under charge of the court, returned a general and special verdicts. The special verdicts were as follows: "First. Was Thomas Dorgan afflicted with heart disease at the time he made his application for the insurance policy issued by the defendant company, and at the time the policy in evidence in this suit was issued? Answer. No. Second. Was the death of Thomas Dorgan occasioned solely by accident, or was it occasioned or contributed to by disease or undue and imprudent exposure? Answer. Solely accidental. Third. Was Thomas Dorgan conscious at the time his body entered the waters of Spring brook, where he was found dead? And, if unconscious, was such unconsciousness occasioned by disease or undue and imprudent exposure? Answer. First, unconscious; second, occasioned by some temporary affliction, without undue and imprudent exposure."

Before Jackson and Taft, Circuit Judges, and Barr District Judge.

Messrs. Osborn & Mills, for plaintiff in error:

The question involved in the first assignment of error was not subject to the objection made to it and sustained by the court.

The information sought was not immaterial or irrelevant and the question called for an answer that would be the assertion of a fact, dependent perhaps in some measure upon opinion, but still competent.

Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463, 55 Am. Dec. 514; Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S. 430, 30 L. ed. 708; Com. v. Sturivant, 117 Mass. 122, 19 Am. Rep. 401; Patrick v. The J. Q. Adams, 19 Mo. 73.

The evident purpose of the inquiry of the doctor was to prove, by the use of a hypothetical question, an allegation without first introducing in evidence facts from which such a state of affairs might legitimately have been found.

This was not permissible, for a hypothetical question should be based on what has been proved in the case; and there should be evidence before the jury in support of the hypothesis of such probative strength that the judge would be warranted in submitting such facts to the jury for their finding.

Nase v. Tucker, 70 Ind. 15; Dexter v. Hall, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 9, 21 L. ed. 73; Hathaway v. National L. Ins. Co. 48 Vt. 336; 1 Greenl. Ev. 531, note D.

All the plaintiff's rights in this action arose under the certificate of insurance and under the contract as the parties thereto made it, and in the light of all the testimony the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Tennant v. Travelers Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 822; Richardson v. Travelers Ins. Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 848.

If Dorgan was intoxicated at all, or under the influence of liquor to such an extent as to cause him to fall into the creek and so be drowned, the plaintiff could not recover.

Any degree of intoxication greatly enhanced the liability to accident, and defendant had a right to contract against the assumption of such a risk, and did so.

Shader v. Railway Pass. Assur. Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 3 Hun, 424; Duran v. Standard L. & Acc. Ins. Co. 18 L. R. A. 637, 63 Vt. 442; Bayless v. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, 14 Blatchf. 143; Macarobie v. Accident Ins. Co. 28 Scot. L. Rep. 291.

Messrs. Irish & Knappen, for defendant in error:

The surgeon who operated at the autopsy was properly asked: Q. Supposing a person to have fallen and been stunned in shallow water where he made very little struggle, state whether what you found to be the condition of the lungs would be what would be expected where a man came to his death in that manner.

Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S. 430, 30 L. ed. 708.

The theory of the plaintiff in the court below is that Dorgan fell and stunned himself, probably on some of the stones, before he rolled into the water, and, being unable to help himself, was drowned. If the accident occurred in this manner, it was the proximate cause of the injury.

Barry v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 23 Fed. Rep. 712; Trew v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 6 Hurlst. & N. 839; Winspear v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 42; Mallory v. Travellers Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. 52, 7 Am. Rep. 10.

If no permanent disease is shown to have been upon Dorgan, a mere temporary ailment would not have been a defense to the policy.

Brown v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 306.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

There are twenty-five assignments of error. Of these, eleven relate to rulings upon evidence. The court refused to permit defendant to ask this question of a witness who found the body of the deceased in the water: "If he had been standing, in your judgment would it have been possible for him to have fallen in the water in the position in which you found him?" We think the objection to this question was properly sustained. It asked for an opinion of the witness on facts which it was quite possible for the witness to have detailed to the jury, so that the jury might have drawn its own inference. That there are cases where the judgment of a witness as to distance and other circumstances may be directly asked him is true, but such questions are not permissible when it is practicable to draw out with exactness the data upon which such judgment must be founded. Parker v. Boston & H. S. B. Co. 109 Mass. 499. It must be left somewhat to the trial court, and in the exercise of its discretion upon this question we do not think the court erred. The same objection was properly sustained to the question: "Had Mr. Dorgan rolled from the position that he was found sitting in at the point of the island to the right in the stream, what would the position of his body have been with reference to the position it was in when you found it?" This was to ask the witness the question whether, in his opinion, Dorgan might have rolled from the place where he was sitting to the place where he was found, and called for an inference which it was proper that the jury alone should draw.

On the other hand, the following question was properly allowed to be put to the physician who performed the autopsy: "Supposing a person to have fallen and been stunned in shallow water, where he made very little struggle, state whether what you found to be the condition of the lungs would be what would be expected where a man came to his death in that manner." Answer: "I say, yes. It was precisely what we would have expected under all the circumstances. We all agreed to that." The witness was an expert, and it was proper to ask his judgment of the conditions which he found in the body of the deceased, and what they indicated as to the cause of death.

The fourth assignment of error was that the court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony of the plaintiff below when the plaintiff rested her case. This was equivalent to a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant on the plaintiff's evidence. It has been decided a number of times by the Supreme Court of the United States that if, after making such a motion, the defendant introduces evidence, he waives any error which the court may have made in not sustaining the motion. Accident Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Orandal, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. ed. 740; North-ern Pac. R. Co. v. Mares, 123 U. S. 710, 31 L. ed. 296; Union Ins. Co. of Philadelphia v. Smith, 124 U. S. 405, 31 L. ed. 497.

The sixth and seventh assignments of error are based on the refusal of the court to permit questions which had been previously answered, and which were leading in form. We fully approve the action of the court in refusing to allow these questions to be put after a similar one had been once answered. The practice of counsel in repeating the question for the purpose of emphasizing the answer with the jury is not to be encouraged.

The eighth assignment of error is based on the action of the court in refusing to allow the following question: "You have heard the testimony in this case about the autopsy? Answer. I have. Question. In your judgment, from that testimony, doctor, would you say that the autopsy was such as to enable a physician to state with any degree of certainty the cause of the death of Mr. Dorgan?" This question was clearly incompetent, because it asked the witness, who was a physician, to make his own inference as to what the evidence of the other witness tended to show, and then, upon such inference, to give his opinion. To properly elicit his opinion as to the character of the autopsy, and its usefulness in showing the cause of the death, counsel should have stated the scope and character of the autopsy as he understood it, so that the jury, in weighing the answer of the witness, could know exactly upon what facts it was based. The difference between this question and the one put to the physician performing the autopsy is that here the witness was asked to weigh other men's evidence, a function peculiarly belonging to the jury, while there the witness was asked an expert opinion of bodily conditions which he saw with his own eyes. Had the physician whose judgment of the autopsy was asked been present at the autopsy, a question calling for his opinion as to its evidential weight in determining the cause of death would have been a proper one.

The ninth and tenth assignments of error are based on the ruling of the court allowing the physician who made the autopsy to answer the question whether there was any occasional for making what was called an air or water test with the heart of the deceased. He stated that there was no need of such a test. We think that this was competent, because the sufficiency of the autopsy to show the normal or abnormal condition of the heart had been questioned by evidence introduced for the defendant, and it was, of course, proper to show that the test suggested by the defendant's witnesses were in this case not necessary.

The eleventh assignment of error was based upon the action of the court in sustaining the objection to this question put to the physician making the autopsy: "Had it been intimated to you in any way that Thomas Dorgan had been drinking that day?" Answer: "It had." The witness had stated previously that he had examined the stomach to see if there was any trace of alcohol in it. It was an issue of fact as to whether he cut open the stomach or not. He said that he did, and, as a circumstance tending to corroborate him, it was here sought to show that his intention had been directed to the question whether Dorgan had been drinking that day. This question was clearly admissible and relevant. It was no more than to ask the witness what the purpose and scope of his investigation was.

The twelfth assignment of error was based on the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that on the undisputed evidence in the case the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. We are very clear that this request was rightly refused.

The defendant made two issues. The first issue was that the policy was void by reason of the alleged misrepresentation by the insured that he had not had, and was not subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, or any mental or bodily infirmity. The evidence of the autopsy at the time of his death was that his vital organs were in a normal condition, though he was suffering from a slight cold in the bronchial tubes. The evidence of two witnesses introduced by the defendant was that he had a structural defect of the heart which caused dizziness. The normal condition of the heart, as testified to by the physician performing the autopsy, tended to rebut this evidence, and the question of fact was for the jury, the burden being upon the company to show a breach of the warranty.

The second issue was as to whether the manner and cause of the death brought it within the policy. The burden of proof on this issue was upon the plaintiff. The deceased was found in the water, with his face in such a position that death might have come from suffocation by drowning, if he had been rendered unconscious before or after striking the water. There were bruises upon the forehead of the deceased, indicating that his head had struck something hard, and the bruises were of a character sufficient, as testified to by an expert witness, to have produced unconsciousness. The circumstances surrounding the death, therefore, were consistent with the theory that the deceased had slipped and fallen in such a way as to strike upon his head against a hard substance, producing unconsciousness, in which helpless state suffocation by drowning followed. This was one explanation of the death consistent with the absence of disease as a moving or contributing cause to the accident, and certainly brought the case within the terms of the policy. Then there was another possible view which the jury in fact took, and which will be discussed hereafter. Whether one or the other theory, or still another, satisfied the circumstances of the case, it was for the jury to decide. The court had no right to usurp the functions of the jury in this respect.

The sixteenth assignment of error is based on the following charge to the jury. "I have been requested by the plaintiff's counsel to instruct you something in regard to the inferences to be drawn from the condition of Dorgan at the time of this insurance, or about that time, as disclosed by the testimony about the condition of the heart, as is covered by the physicians, as giving out the alleged rattle or murmur. Now, gentlemen, if the murmur or sound of disordered action which were indicated at or before the time when Dorgan made this application for insurance was simply an occasional consequence or mere debility,—an 'anaemic condition' they term it in scientific language (which means the same thing, more or less); no more or less than a debilitated, enfeebled condition, lacking of strength and vitality,—if that was the case, if what Dr. Pratt heard, and afterwards what Dr. Osborn heard, was simply an anaemic murmur, an occasional result only of a weakened and enfeebled condition of the body, that would not, be such a disease or bodily infirmity as is warranted against. This is but an amplification of what I have already explained to you, and is a mere continuation by parts of the general proposition which I have laid down to you, namely, that the defect or disease must be one of a definite and somewhat permanent character."

The charge was in relation to the warranty that the insured had never had, and was not subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, or any bodily and mental infirmity.

The court had charged the jury previously that it was not material whether the insured knew his actual condition or not at the time he made his application, if in fact his warranty was not true. The court told the jury that in determining the question whether the insured was or was not inflicted with any disease or bodily or mental infirmity they were to inquire whether he had some specific ailment; that it would not come within the scope of this warranty that he might, like other men or the generality of men, have been subject to occasional attacks of the kinds that are specified, "but there must have been some specific determination towards such condition of the body, or some part of it, as would amount to a disease or a bodily infirmity."

It seems to us that the court accurately stated the legal effect of the contract contained in the application and the policy. An anaemic murmur, it was admitted, indicated no structural defect of the heart, but arose simply from mere temporary debility or weakened condition of the body. We do not think that this comes within the definition of "bodily or mental infirmity," as the term is used in the application. The statement in the application by the insured did not, either in his contemplation or that of the company, refer to any mere temporary ailment or indisposition which did not tend to weaken and undermine the constitution at the time of taking membership. Pudritzky v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 76 Mich. 428; Brown v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 306; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Daviss, 87 Ky. 541; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Francisco, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 672, 21 L. ed. 698.

The seventeenth assignment of error is based on the following charge of the court: "If the condition of Dorgan contributing to his death was produced by imprudent and wanton exposure of himself to the perils of the day,—the cold,—and such exposure was grossly imprudent, in consequence of any physical condition that he may have been in, then his death, if that imprudence contributed to his death, would not be within the scope of his policy or entitle a recovery."

This should be taken in connection with the part of the charge recited in the twenty-second assignment of error: "It is not such exposure as men usually are going to take; such as is incident to the ordinary habits and customs of life. Such an exposure as that does not come within the range of a defense. An exposure, in order to have been a contributing cause, and so defeat the plaintiff's right to recovery in this case, must be something beyond the ordinary, or a wanton, a piece of gross, carelessness, as we would term such in our designation of a person's conduct in the usual walks of life. If Dorgan was at the time in an enfeebled physical condition, that circumstance may be taken into account in determining whether he was making an imprudent, wanton, and reckless exposure of himself,—of his life and health; but if the exposure to which he submitted himself was of a less degree than that, and such as I have described, then it is not within the terms of the policy."

We think the language of the court properly explained to the jury what was meant by the words "voluntary exposure, unnecessary danger, and hazardous adventure." It is questionable whether there was anything in the evidence requiring the plaintiff to exclude the possibility that death might have occurred by reason of exposure.

The eighteenth assignment of error was based on this charge of the court: "If you are satisfied from the evidence that he was at the time intoxicated, so as not to be able to manage himself,—that is, not the result of simply taking a drink, one or more, perhaps, but if he was so intoxicated, as that he was not fairly able to take care of himself prudently and properly,—and that contributed to the result, then such a result would not be within the scope of the policy."

It is objected to this charge that by the policy, if the death happened while the insured was under the influence of intoxicating drinks, no recovery could be had, even if such condition did not contribute to the result. It is not necessary for us to answer the question of construction thus suggested, because of the evidence as to intoxication. There was no evidence that the insured was intoxicated, except so far as two circumstances tended to show it. These were—First, the opportunity to drink afforded by the liquor which the fishing party brought with them; and, second, the circumstances of the death, which were of such a character that the result might have been contributed to by the intoxication of the deceased. Without this latter possibility there would have been no evidence of any intoxication which the court could have submitted to the jury. Unless the intoxication did contribute to the death, therefore, no ground existed for saying that insured was intoxicated at all. Hence the plaintiff in error was not injured by the failure of the court to cover in his charge a hypothetical case which there was no evidence to support.

The twentieth and twenty-first assignments of error are based on exceptions taken to the following charge of the court: "If you find that branch in favor of the plaintiff, you will then pass on to the second, and inquire whether or not this death resulted from some accident; simply as from, well, being in the brook, stumbling there and falling down, and becoming unconscious, and then drowning. Was that the fact, or was it, or might it with equal probability have been, the truth that from some condition that he was in, either one of considerable long continuance or short duration, it is no matter which, he fainted away, and fell into the brook? Whether he fell in before or after his death would be of no consequence. Inquire what was the fact in reference to that. You must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence, gentlemen, before you can render a verdict for the plaintiff in this case on that branch of the case; you must be satisfied that a preponderance of the evidence establishes the fact that the death was the result of an accident only, without the concurrence of any cause resulting from any disorder or disease or infirmity or deformity of Dorgan's vital organs."

We think this correctly stated the law of the case. The language expressly excepted to, namely, "Whether he fell in before or after his death would be of no consequence," had application to what the court stated immediately before, namely, that if his fainting away and falling into the brook had been the result of his bodily condition, whether of considerable long continuance or short duration, the death would not be within the policy, and that, no matter whether he fell in before or after his death, he could not recover. As the charge is printed, the sentence is separated from that to which it evidently belongs, and a different sense at first is given to it. We have no doubt that in the charge to the jury the sentence was put where it really belongs, as a mere qualification or explanation of the sentence immediately preceding.

The twenty-third assignment of error is based on the language of the court given to the jury in answer to the question put by them. The language was as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, I received a communication from your foreman that you wish instructions upon this question of whether deceased, when he was on the bank of the brook, was overtaken with some temporary trouble that caused him to fall in and was drowned, would that be considered only accidental? I instruct you, if he was at that moment overtaken with a trouble of which he was subject,—that is, from a recurrence of a trouble to which he was subject,—and he then fell in the brook and was drowned, that that would not be a case where a recovery could be had upon the policy because his physical condition was a part of the causes contributing to the death; but if the temporary trouble spoken of in this question was one of which he was not subject, but was something entirely unusual and uncommon with him, and that he at that time fell into the brook and was drowned, that would be an accident, and the death would be accidental only."

The jury found that the insured was unconscious when he fell into the brook, and that the unconsciousness was due to a temporary affliction, in accordance with this charge.

The twenty-fifth assignment of error is based on the refusal of the court to vacate and set aside the verdict on the ground that the three special findings of the jury could not sustain their general verdict.

Upon these two assignments of error arises the main, difficult, and doubtful question in the case. The policy provided, as we have already seen, that the benefits under it extended to the death of the insured through external, violent, and accidental means, and that it should not cover accidental injuries or death resulting from or caused directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, by or in consequence of fits, vertigo, somnambulism, or any disease existing prior or subsequent to the date of the certificate, or to any cause excepting where the injury was the sole cause of the disability or death. In the application the deceased stated that he was aware that the insurance would not extend to "any bodily injury happening, directly or indirectly, in consequence of disease, or to death or disability caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, or to any case where the accidental injury was not the proximate and sole cause of disability or death."

It is well settled that an involuntary death by drowning is a death by external, violent, and accidental means. Trew v. Railway Assur. Co. 6 Hurlst. & N. 838; Winspear v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 42; Reynolds v. Accidental Ins. Co. 22 L. T. N. S. 820.

We are of the opinion that in the legal sense, and within the meaning of the last clause, if the deceased suffered death by drowning, no matter what was the cause of his falling into the water, whether disease or a slipping, the drowning, in such case, would be the proximate and sole cause of the disability or death, unless it appeared that death would have been the result, even had there been no water at hand to fall into. The disease would be but the condition; the drowning would be the moving, sole, and proximate cause.

In Winepear v. Accident Ins. Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 42, the terms of the policy provided "that it should cover any personal injury caused by accidental, external, and visible means, if the direct effect of such injury should occasion his death; and it provided, further, that it should not extend to any injury caused by or arising from natural disease or weakness, or exhaustion consequent upon disease." The insured was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into a stream, and was there drowned while suffering from a fit. It was held that the death was within the risk covered by the policy, and that the proviso did not apply.

In Lawrence v. Accidental Ins. Co., L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 216, the policy provided: "This policy covers injuries accidentally occurring from material and external cause operating upon the person of the insured, where such accidental injury is the direct and sole cause of the death to the insured, but it does not insure in case of death arising from fits, . . . or any disease whatsoever, arising before or at the time or following such accidental injury, whether consequent upon such accidental injury or not, and whether causing such death directly or jointly with such accidental injury."

The insured, while at a railway station, was seized with a fit, and fell forward off the platform across the railway, when an engine and carriages which were passing went over his body, and killed him. It was held that "the death of the insured was caused by an accident, within the meaning of the policy, and that the insurers were liable."

Mr. Justice Watkin Williams said in this case: "The true meaning of this proviso is that, if the death arose from a fit, the company are not liable, even though accidental injury contributed to the death in the sense that they were both causes, which operated jointly in causing it. That is the meaning, in my opinion, of this proviso. But it is essential to that construction that it should be made out that the fit was a cause, in the sense of being the proximate and immediate cause of the death, before the company are exonerated, and it is not the less so because you can show that another cause intervened and assisted in the causation."

After giving some illustrations, the learned justice continued: "I therefore put my decision on the broad ground that, according to the true construction of this policy and this proviso, this was not an act arising from a fit, and therefore whether it contributed directly or indirectly, or by any other mode, to the happening of the subsequent accident, seems to me wholly immaterial, and the judgment of the court ought to be in favor of the plaintiff."

These cases are referred to with approval by Mr. Justice Gray in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in case of Accident Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527-532, 20 L. ed. 740-742. They sufficiently establish the proposition that, if the deceased in this case died by drowning, then drowning was in law the sole and proximate cause of the disability or death.

We now proceed to inquire whether, if the fall of the deceased into the water was caused by fits, vertigo, or any disease, such accidental death could be said, within the meaning of the policy, to have been "caused directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, by or in consequence of such fits, vertigo, or disease." In our opinion the adjective "accidental" qualifies not only "injuries," but also "death," and therefore an accidental death by drowning does result from, and is caused indirectly by, fits, vertigo, or other disease, if the fall into the water, from which drowning ensues, is caused by such disease. The exception is broader than the exceptions in the policies considered in the Winepear and the Lawrence Cases, and is made so by the use of the word "indirectly." As can be seen from the words of Mr. Justice Williams quoted above in the Lawrence Case, if that policy had provided that it should not apply to an accident to which a fit contributed indirectly, the company would not, in his opinion, have been liable.

We are therefore finally brought to the question what the words "disease and bodily infirmity" include. We think the charge of the court below upon this point must be sustained. In a broad, generic sense, any temporary trouble by reason of which a man loses consciousness is a disease. It is a condition of the body not normal, and produced by the imperfect working of some function, but as the imperfect working is not permanent, and the body returns at once, or in a short period of time, to its normal condition, it does not rise to the dignity of a disease. A fainting spell produced by indigestion or a lack of proper food for a number of hours, or from any other cause which would not indicate any disease in the body, but would show a mere temporary disturbance or enfeeblement, would not come within the meaning of the words "disease and bodily infirmity," as used in this policy.

It is a well-settled rule in the construction of insurance policies of this character, which the insured accepts for the purpose of covering all accidents, to construe all language used to limit the liability of the company, strongly against the company. Policies are drawn by the legal advisers of the company, who study with care the decisions of the courts, and, with those in mind, attempt to limit as narrowly as possible the scope of the insurance. It is only a fair rule, therefore, which courts have adopted, to resolve any doubt or ambiguity in favor of the insured and against the insurer. Fitton v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 17 C. B. N. S. 122; Accident Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527-532, 30 L. ed. 740-743; United States Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Newman, 84 Va. 52; Healey v. Northwest Mut. Acc. Assn. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L. R. A. 371. Our view of what the word "disease" must be limited to in this policy is sustained by the decisions of the supreme court of Michigan in Fudritsky v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 76 Mich. 428, and Brown v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 806, and also by Mutual Benefit L. Ins. Co. v. Davies, 87 Ky. 541.

In Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Francisco, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 672, 21 L. ed. 698, a physician testified that the person, who had died twenty-four days after the policy issued, had the disease of indigestion, torpid liver, and colic, and that he died from acute hepatitis; whereas several acquaintances of the deceased testified that they had never known him to be unwell, or if so more than very slightly, and that they considered him to be a healthy man. The defense of the insurance company was that the decedent had answered, in reply to the usual questions, that he had no sickness or disease. In reference to this issue the court instructed the jury that it was for them to determine from the evidence whether the person whose life was insured had, during the time mentioned in the questions propounded on making the application, any affliction that could properly be called a "sickness or disease," within the meaning of the term as used, and said: "For example, a man might have a slight cold in the head or slight headache, that in no way seriously affected his health, an affliction which might be forgotten in a week or a month, which might be of so trifling a character as not to constitute a 'sickness or disease,' within the meaning of the term as used, and which the party, would not be required to mention in answering questions."

This charge was held good.

The point made under the twenty-fifth assignment of error is that there was no evidence to sustain the finding of the jury that the unconsciousness of the deceased, during which drowning ensued, was caused by a temporary affliction. There certainly was no direct evidence of this cause. No one was present to see how the death in fact did occur. The conclusion of the jury in any case must be based upon inference from circumstances, and not from direct evidence. There was the circumstance that the deceased was found dead, with his face submerged in water, in such a position that drowning might have caused his death. There was the expert evidence of the physician who performed the autopsy to the effect that the condition of the body of the deceased after death indicated death by drowning, and was what might be expected if the deceased had been drowned. There was the evidence of the same physician that the vital organs of the deceased were normal, and indicated the presence of no disease. Assuming these facts proven (and, there having been evidence to prove them, the jury had a right to conclude that they were facts), it would be a very reasonable inference that a man would not drown in water only six and a half inches deep unless he were unconscious as he lay in the water. Something must have produced the unconsciousness. It was not produced by disease, because the autopsy tended to show that the deceased was not suffering from disease likely to cause unconsciousness, and the jury might well have inferred that the bruises upon the head did not indicate a sufficient concussion to produce unconsciousness. Reasoning by exclusion, therefore, the jury might from the circumstances properly have found the verdict which they did find, namely, that the unconscious and helpless condition of the insured in which drowning ensued arose, not from disease, but from indigestion or want of food, or some other temporary cause.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Malvina T. WHITE, Appl.,

v.

NORTHWESTERN NORTH CAROLINA RAILROAD.

(118 N. C. 610.)

4. An abutting owner is entitled to damages for the diminution of the value of the property caused by reducing the width of the street, or by excavations rendering it unsafe and dangerous, in constructing a steam railroad therein.

(December 5, 1893.)

1. The presumption in the absence of evidence is that the fee of a street remains in the abutting proprietor.

2. The use of a street for a steam railroad is a perversion of the street from its original and proper public purpose.

3. An abutting owner, whether owning the fee in a highway or not, has certain proprietary rights which cannot be taken away without compensation, even under the authority of the legislature.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County in favor of defendant in a proceeding to recover damages alleged to have resulted to plaintiff's property by reason of the construction of defendant's railroad. Reversed.

The action was to recover for damages caused by blasting during the construction of the road and for damages for the interference with the street in front of plaintiff's property.

NOTE.—The more liberal doctrines which have steadily gained ground in recent years as to the property rights of abutting owners which are in the nature of easements, independent of the ownership of the fee and the nature of a "taking" within the law of eminent domain are both well illustrated in the above case.

As to what constitutes a taking, see, in connection with the above case, St. Louis v. Hill (Mo.) 21 L. R. A. 226; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Birmingham S. & T. R. R. Co. (Ala.) 18 L. R. A. 166, and reference note thereto; also Vanderlip v. Grand Rapids (Mich.) 3 L. R. A. 247.

The court refused to submit to the jury the question of damages for interference with the street and the plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit and took this appeal.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. E. B. Jones, for appellant:

When a street has been dedicated or condemned by a city for use of the public, the further appropriation of the same street by a railroad is the imposition of a new servitude for which the owner is entitled to compensation.

2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 724.

Municipal or state legislatures have no authority or power to authorize the taking of highways by a railroad company, without compensation to owners.

2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 740.

The owner of an abutting lot injured by the construction of a railroad track in a street may recover compensation from the railroad, notwithstanding the grant of right of occupancy by the municipal authorities.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 532.

In Moose v. Carson, 7 L. R. A. 548, 104 N. C. 431, this court has declared that a statute or ordinance which attempts to divest a person or corporation of private property for private purposes, or for public purposes, unless upon just compensation, and in a manner provided by law, is unconstitutional.

Messrs. Glenn & Manly for appellee.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the owner of a lot abutting upon one of the streets of the city of Winston, and brings this action to recover damages for various injuries to her said property, inflicted by the defendant by reason of its having entered upon and constructed its railroad through the said street. It appears from the complaint that prior to the plaintiff's purchase of the property, in 1879, the street had been "located and opened for the use and benefit of plaintiff and others, and the public generally, who owned property north of Liberty street, which was almost inaccessible by or over any other street." It also appears that in the construction of its road the defendant made an excavation in front of said property 223 feet in length, and 35 or 40 feet in depth and width, and thereby reduced the width of the street from 30 to 18 feet. It is further alleged that by "reason of the nature of the soil and the proximity of the cuts, travel along the said street is rendered dangerous, and that, in order to sustain the width of the same 15 to 18 feet, the defendant has put in pillars or posts to hold and retain the earth composing the street in position, which plaintiff alleges is insecure and unsafe, and liable to destroy and render useless the said street." It is furthermore alleged that by reason of such excavation and occupation by the defendant the street at certain points along the line of plaintiff's property is almost entirely destroyed, and that plaintiff is greatly endamaged. These allegations, extracted from the complaint, must, for the purposes of the appeal, be taken as true, as no evidence seems to have been introduced on the trial; and his honor rejected the issue as to the alleged damages sustained by the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant "had a license from the city to construct its road, and use the street if necessary." The questions presented, therefore, are whether, as against the abutting owner, the city can authorize the use of its streets for the purposes of an ordinary steam railroad, and whether such abutting owner has any proprietary rights, for the violation of which she can maintain an action. It does not appear how the city acquired its title to the street in question, nor do we learn from the record whether it owns the fee in the soil, or simply an easement therein. In the absence of evidence, however, the presumption is that the city has an easement only, and that the fee remains in the abutting proprietor. Elliott, Roads & Streets, 110; Rich v. Minneapolis, 37 Minn. 423; 3 Kent, Com. 432. In such a case "the abutting owner is entitled to every right and advantage in that part of the street of which he owns the fee, not required by the public. The easement of the public is the right to use and improve the street for the purposes of a highway only." Lewis, Em. Dom. 113. It must follow, therefore, that if the city perverts the streets to illegitimate purposes, it is an interference with the proprietary rights of the abutter, and that he is entitled to relief at the hands of the courts.

This introduces us to the very important question, never before passed upon by this tribunal, whether or not the use of a steam railroad is a perversion of the street from its original and proper public purposes. There has been much discussion, and not a little conflict of judicial decision, upon this subject; but it is believed that the weight of authority greatly preponderates in favor of the affirmative view of the proposition. Judge Dillon, after a careful investigation, states his conclusion as follows: "The weight of judicial authority undoubtedly is that where the public have only an easement in the streets, and the fee is retained by the adjacent owner, the legislature cannot, under the constitutional guaranty of private property, authorize an ordinary steam railroad to be constructed thereon, against the will of the adjoining owner, without compensation to him. In other words, such a railway, as usually constructed and operated, is an additional servitude." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 725. In Mills on Eminent Domain (sec. 204) the same doctrine is laid down, and it is said: "The legislature may authorize the use of a street by the railroad, so as to make the entry lawful; but the use is an additional burden, and the right will not become fixed in the company until compensation is made. If no remedy is provided, there is remaining the remedy at common law." In Lewis on Eminent Domain (sec. 111) the able and discriminating author remarks: "To us it seems so clear that a railroad is foreign to the legitimate uses of a highway that we never have been able to understand how a court could reach a contrary conclusion." After stating that highways have from time immemorial been devoted to the common use of every citizen, and that no one had a private right or any exclusive privilege therein, the author proceeds: "The railroad does not fall within the scope of such uses. It requires a permanent structure in the street, the use of which is private and exclusive. It gives to an individual or corporation a franchise and easement in the street inconsistent with the public right. To hold that a railroad is one of the proper and legitimate uses of a street leads to the absurd consequence that a street might be filled with parallel tracks, which would practically exclude all ordinary travel, and still be devoted to the ordinary uses of a highway. The law ought not to tolerate such a consequence." In Elliott on Roads & Streets (page 528) the author cites many authorities, and concludes by saying that the weight of authority is that such an appropriation of a street is "a new and additional burden," for which the abutter is entitled to compensation. In support of his proposition he quotes the following language of Judge Cooley: "Neither can the use of the highway for the ordinary railway be in furtherance of the purpose for which the highway is established, and a relief to the local business and travel upon it. The two uses, on the other hand, come seriously in conflict. The railroad constitutes a perpetual embarrassment to the ordinary use, which is greater or less in proportion to the business that is done upon it, and the frequency of trains. When, therefore, the country highway or the city street is taken for the purposes of a railroad company engaged in the business of transporting persons and property between distant points, the owner of the soil in the highway is entitled to compensation, because a new burden has been imposed upon his estate, which affects him differently from the original easement, and may be specially injurious." Const. Lim. 3d ed. 688. In Hare on American Constitutional Law, 361, the foregoing doctrine is fully approved, and it is said: "It is immaterial, as regards the principle, whether the land is given voluntarily or taken under the right of eminent domain. If the owner dedicates the land, it is for the continuing uses of a street; if it is condemned, such also is the end in view. To convert a common highway over a man's land into a railroad is, therefore, to impose an additional burden upon the land, which greatly impairs its value, considered as a whole; and if the owner is not compensated his consent must be proved. It cannot be said with truth that in assenting to the laying out of the highway upon his land he consented to the building of a railroad upon it, because they are essentially different. The one benefits his lands, renders access to it easy, and enhances the price; while the other makes access to it difficult and dangerous, and renders it comparatively valueless.

Nor can it be justly contended that a railway is merely an improved highway.

Were the transaction between individuals, every one would see the injustice of such a conclusion. The doubt arises from the supposition that the public interest is involved; and it was to guard against the bias arising from this source that the constitution interfered to protect the citizen. It follows that the dedication of land as a street does not preclude the owner from bringing trespass or ejectment or obtaining an injunction against a railway company which is about to enter upon and occupy the way, and that the company cannot (in the absence of the exercise of the right of eminent domain) rely upon a grant from the legislature and the license or consent of the municipality as a justification." Booth, in his work on Street Railways (sec. 78), after stating that in the early history of commercial railroads the current of authority was contrary to the views above stated, remarks: "But, according to the weight of judicial opinion as expressed during the last thirty years, where the fee of the street remains in the adjoining owner, such use is inconsistent with the purposes of the original acquisition, and, without compensation, can only be acquired by the exercise of the power of eminent domain."

In the discussion of the question, we have preferred to reproduce the conclusions of eminent text-writers, rather than attempt a review of the numerous decisions upon which they are founded. These decisions and others we could cite fully establish, upon principle and by weight of authority, the proposition, that, where the public have only an easement in the street, and the fee of the soil of the street is retained in the abutting owner, a steam railroad cannot, under the constitutional guaranty of private property, be lawfully constructed and operated thereon against his will and without compensation. *Grand Rapids & I. B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493. The principle, then, being established that the use of a street for steam railroads is not a legitimate use of the street for public purposes, it must, of course, follow that the city had no right, in the exercise of its usual and ordinary powers relating to its highways to authorize the entry and occupation of the same by the defendant, and that the bare license of the city can afford no justification for the infringement of the rights of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, therefore, taking her allegations to be true as to the damage inflicted upon her property, very plainly has a cause of action against the defendant. If, however, we are wrong in the assumption that the plaintiff is the owner of the fee in the said street, and if it should appear upon another trial that the city has acquired it either by dedication, grant, or condemnation, it will be necessary to determine whether the plaintiff has an easement in said street to the extent that it shall be used only for street purposes, and whether her rights are "property rights," which cannot be impaired or destroyed except under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Distinctions based upon the legal ownership of the fee in respect to the rights of the abutting proprietor have produced much confusion, resulting in many conflicting decisions; but the true principle, which has been slowly but surely evolved from protracted discussion and experience, is that in respect to the use of the soil for the purposes of a street (and apart from those reversionary or other rights peculiar to legal ownership) it is wholly immaterial where the legal title resides. The very power to take private property for public use, as well as the capacity of a municipal corporation to acquire it in any way, necessarily implies that it is to be held in trust for public purposes; and in the case of land acquired for the purposes of a street there is something in the nature of a contract, under which two coexistent and inviolable rights are created,—one belonging to the public to use and improve the street for the ordinary purposes of a street; the other, to the abutting owner to have access to and from his property, and to enjoy such use of the street as is customary and reasonable. If the owner voluntarily dedicates or grants a strip of land to a city for a street it must be presumed that he does so in consideration of the contemplated benefits accruing to his adjoining property by reason of the strip being used for the legitimate purposes of a street only. If the grant be made upon a pecuniary consideration, it is also fair to assume that in estimating the amount to be paid the value of the benefits above mentioned were likewise considered. In such cases, says Mr. Lewis (Em. Dom. § 114): "To make the right a part consideration of the grant, and then allow the public to invade or destroy it at pleasure, would be a fraud, which the law will neither impute nor allow. Therefore, in the case of such a grant there arises by operation of law a private right to use the street in connection with the lot of the proprietor, which is as inviolable as any other right of property." So, if the city acquire the land by condemnation, such advantages or benefits to the adjoining property are usually assessed at a fixed value, and deducted from the estimated damages; and it would, says the above author, be "the grossest inequity to compel a man to pay for advantages, whether in the form of deductions from the price to be paid, or of an assessment of benefits, unless those advantages are secured to him by a clear title. . . .

The existence of these private rights and easements is strictly independent of the mode in which the highway is established, or of the estate or interest which the public acquires in the soil of the street."

The true principles applicable to this question have been declared by the court of appeals of New York in Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146, and Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268. These cases have been followed by subsequent decisions of other states, and their doctrine has been approved by the most prominent writers upon the subject. The opinions are very elaborate, and we cannot do better than to adopt Judge Dillon's summary of some of the principles enunciated: "These judgments, and those that follow them, rest upon the foundation principle that whether the fee in the street is in the abutter, subject to the rights of the public,—that is, to the paramount rights of the public for street uses proper,—or whether the fee is in the public for street uses proper, in either case, and generally in both cases, the abutter is entitled to the benefit of the street for all uses except street uses proper, subject, of course, to legislative and municipal regulations; and that such rights are property or property rights in the abutter, which can only be taken away by the legislature on the condition of making compensation. And the abutting owner's rights in the street are not affected by the source from which he derives his title. . . . If the abutter owns the fee of the street, his rights may be said to be legal in their nature. If he does not own the fee, those rights are in the nature of equitable easements in fee,—the soil of the street being the servient, the abutting owner's lot being the dominant, tenement. Among the most important of such rights or easements is the abutter's right to access, to light, and to air. The court accordingly held that, so far as the elevated railway structures interfered with such rights or easements, while the legislature might authorize their erection and use, yet this could only be done as respects the abutter by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, viz. on condition of making compensation to the abutting owner for the damage which his property actually sustained." "The result of the author's reflections upon this subject is that the views of the court of appeals are sound and just,—sound, because they recognize the paramount nature of the public right to put the street to this new and necessary form of public use; just, because they recognize and declare that the abutter has special proprietary rights or easements in their nature which he is not called upon unequally to sacrifice without compensation for the public use. In effect, the court says the just and true doctrine is, "Take, but pay." 1 Hare, Am. Const. L. 370, 375; Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 114, 115; Booth, Street Railway Law, § 81; Barney v. Keokuk, supra; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74; 1 Rorer, Railroads, 524; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. supra; Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 38; South Carolina R. Co. v. Steiner, 44 Ga. 546; Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. supra. The contrary view, laid down in Wood's Railway Law (vol. 2, p. 727), seems to be based upon the restricted interpretation of the word "taken;" it being applied by some of the courts only to property actually taken and occupied, and all incidental damages to adjoining proprietors are regarded as "consequential" in their character, and damnum absque injuria. The learned author admits that such would not be the case if the words used were "taken or damaged," but by a reference to the opinion in Staton v. Norfolk & C. R. Co., 111 N. C. 278, 17 L. R. A. 838, it will appear from the cases cited that this restricted meaning of the word "taken" is not in accord with the more recent and better authorities, and is being rapidly submerged by the steady and increasing current of judicial decision. Lewis, Em. Dom. 58; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557; Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147.

The result of the numerous authorities is that in either view of the case—that is, whether the fee is in the plaintiff or in the city—the plaintiff has certain proprietary rights, of which she cannot be deprived, even under the authority of the legislature, without compensation. If her property is in any way injured by the use of the street for legitimate purposes, she cannot complain. But if the enjoyment of her private rights in the street is interrupted by a perversion of the street to uses for which it was not intended, and which the public right does not justify, and her property is thereby injured, and its value impaired, she may maintain an action, and recover such damages as she may have sustained. These proprietary rights in the use of the street for proper public purposes are practically, as we have seen, the same irrespective of the ownership of the soil, and are not confined to the mere right of access, since this may not be disturbed although the street may be reduced in width to 10 or 15 feet. This view is well sustained in the leading case of Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 39 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493, in which the court said: "Take a case in one of the states where the fee of the street is in the state or municipality, and of a street 60 feet wide. The abutting lot owners have paid for the advantages of the street on the basis of that width, either in the enhanced price paid for their lots, or, if the street was established by condemnation, in the taxes they have paid for the land taken. In such a case, if the state or municipality should attempt to cut the street down to the width of 10 or 15 feet, would it be an answer to objection by lot owners that the diminished width would be sufficient for mere purposes of access to their lots? It would seem as though the question suggests the answer." The interest of the abutting owner in the entire width of the street, subject to the proper uses of the public, upon the authority of the above decision, has been declared by this court in Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 481, 7 L. R. A. 548, and cannot be regarded as an open question. See also Haynes v. Thomas, supra. If, then, the value of the property is lessened by reducing the width of the street, or if such damage is caused by excavations rendering it unsafe and dangerous, as stated in the complaint, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. It will be observed that the defendant did not introduce its charter, or show that it had condemned any part of the street or the rights or easement of the abutting proprietor. It justifies its conduct solely upon the mere license of the city of Winston, and in this view of the case its occupation, in so far as it affects the plaintiff, must be regarded as unlawful. If this be so, the plaintiff may maintain a common-law action for damages to be assessed up to the time of the trial; or it seems she may sue for the permanent damage, if any, which has been inflicted upon her property by reason of the location and construction of the defendant's road, and by so doing confer upon the defendant (so far as she is concerned) an easement to occupy the street. Had the defendant entered under some statutory authority, it would be important to consider whether the plaintiff would not be confined to the statutory remedy; but, as it does not appear to have entered under any other authority than the bare unauthorized license of the city, and as the ruling of the court is based expressly upon the validity of such license, we must conclude that the plaintiff has a right to maintain the present action, and that the issue as to the damages actually sustained should have been submitted to the jury. As the facts were not fully developed on the trial, we do not deem it proper to further pursue the discussion.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Selig G. PUTZELL, Appt.,
v.
DROVERS & MECHANICS NATIONAL BANK OF BALTIMORE.

(.....Md.....)

A wall standing partly on the premises of each of adjoining owners, the portions of which are owned by them in severalty with an easement for the support of the building of one of them, may be removed by the other for the purpose of erecting a new and better wall, although some inconvenience is thereby occasioned to the other owner, provided a new one is built within a reasonable time and with the least inconvenience to the other party and which shall furnish him the same right of support, and that he shall be indemnified for necessary expenses thereby occasioned him in consequence of the removal of the wall.

(January 12, 1894.)

APPPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore City dismissing the bill in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from taking down a wall which supported one end of complainant's building. Affirmed in part. Reversed in part.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard M. Venable and Lewis Putzell for appellant.

Messrs. James McColgan and Bernard Carter, for appellee:

Appellant has not attempted to show, either by himself or his witnesses, any exclusive use of this wall such as required by the rule in Casey v. Inloes, 1 Gill, 500; Armstrong v. Risteau, 5 Md. 275-279, 59 Am. Dec. 115; Walsh v. McIntire, 68 Md. 418.

The appellee in this case is pecuniarily able to pay any damages that may be recovered against it; and if the appellant suffers any damages or inconvenience from the acts or negligence of the defendant, he has a full and adequate remedy at law, and a jury would certainly give him ample compensation. This alone would disentitle him to an injunction.

Whalen v. Delashmutt, 59 Md. 258; Hamilton v. Ely, 4 Gill, 38; Amelung v. Seekamp, 9 Gill & J. 472.

The acts of possession relied on to make out an adverse holding must be sufficient to establish ouster or disseisin.

To establish such ouster or disseisin, the acts of possession must be hostile, open, notorious, and exclusive, and must have been continuous for twenty years. They must be such as unmistakably indicate a claim of the absolute title in fee.

Walsh v. McIntire, Armstrong v. Risteau, and Casey v. Inloes, supra.

The occupation of the ground covered by the said wall was not, and could not be, on the part of appellant, and those under whom he claims, exclusive, hostile, and notorious, as required by the rule laid down in the above cases.

Phillipson v. Gibbon, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 428.

If there be a party wall between two houses, and the owner of one of the houses pulls it down in order to build a new one, and with it he takes down the party wall belonging equally to him and his neighbor, and erects a new house and new wall, he is bound on his part to pull down and reinstate it in a reasonable time, and with the least inconvenience.

No such easement can be acquired by any lapse of time.

Solomon v. Vintners' Co. 4 Hurlst. & N. 590; Peyton v. London, 9 Barn. & C. 734.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Selig G. Putzell filed a bill in equity against the Drovers & Mechanics Bank of Baltimore. It was alleged that the defendant without right or justification was about to tear down the rear wall of the complainant's dwelling house and thereby render it untenable and to do him irreparable damage. The bill prayed an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding as alleged and it was accordingly granted before answer. There was also a prayer for general relief. After answer, the defendant moved a dissolution of the injunction. Testimony was taken on both sides, and when the cause came to final hearing the injunction was dissolved, and the bill dismissed. Complainant appealed.

We think that a statement of the material facts of the case as they appear to us will sufficiently show the grounds of our opinion, without the necessity of a discussion of the testimony of the different witnesses. Putzell, the complainant, is the owner of a leasehold interest for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, in a lot of ground in the city of Baltimore, on the west side of Eutaw street, between Fayette and Lexington streets. He acquired this property in the year 1866. For many years before his purchase, and ever since then, there has been on this lot a substantial brick dwelling house, which extended back to its westernmost boundary. The Drovers & Mechanics Bank, in the year 1888, became the owner of a leasehold interest in a lot of ground fronting on Fayette street and running back northly to Marion street, and binding for a portion of its easterly line on the westernmost boundary of Put-zell's lot. It is not distinctly stated in the record, but this leasehold interest is evidently for ninety-nine years, renewable forever. The bank's lot and Putzell's lot are separated by a division wall, which, by the measurements proved in the case, is shown to be built partly on the ground of one of these parties, and partly on the ground of the other. This wall has been standing for a very long time, certainly for more than thirty years before the transactions which are the subject of complaint in this case.

NOTE.—The above case is in some respects a peculiar one. As to the right of one owner of a party wall to make changes therein, see Graves v. Smith (Ala.) 5 L. R. A. 298; Matthews v. Dixey (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 102; Everett v. Edwards (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 110. 22 L. R. A.

As far as we can ascertain from the testimony Putzell's house, as originally built, had this division wall as its rear wall; but the rear wall was not built higher than the top of the division wall. In eighteen hundred and seventy Putzell put an additional story on the back building, placing its rear wall on the top of the division wall. This division wall was used by the owners and occupants of the lot now owned by the bank for the purpose of designating the boundary line between it and the Putzell lot. There was evidence of the use of it also for a series of years as a support for the frame of a grape arbor. The bank in the year eighteen hundred and ninety-two commenced the erection of a large six-story building for the purposes of its business, and in the prosecution of the work proposed to take down the entire wall separating the two lots, and erect on the same line another wall of sufficient strength and thickness to support the new building, not encroaching on Putzell's lot, and offering to give him the benefit of the new wall as a partition wall for the benefit of any building to be erected on his lot. The question in the case is whether this action on the part of the bank would be a legitimate exercise of its rights of property.

No one seems to know when the wall in question was built; in all probability the time was beyond the limit of living memory. There is some reason to think so from the fact that the deeds which created the leasehold interests in these lots were executed towards the close of the last century and early in the beginning of the present. It seems to have been erected for the purpose of making the boundary between the lots and to have been always used for that purpose. The soil of the respective owners was covered by it; and this was the use of his soil which each owner elected to make for his own benefit. Each one owned the portion of the wall which was on his own ground. There seems to have been no cessation of the use of it, in the way in which it was intended to be used; that is to mark the boundary line. There was no ouster of the possession of the soil. Each coterminal proprietor owns the portion of the wall which rested on his ground, as he had continued to own it from the beginning; and he has actual and beneficial possession of the soil by reason of the occupation and use of it by means of his portion of the wall. Surely there could not be a more distinct and unequivocal exercise of the right of ownership than to build on one's own land, a house, or a wall, and to use it continuously for the purposes to which it is suitable. It is hardly necessary to refer to decided cases; 22 L. R. A.

but one case was cited in the argument having such peculiar features, that it may well be mentioned while we are considering this subject. The question was about the title to certain property in the city of London, which was occupied by a brick house. In the south wall of the house there was a stone tablet bearing an inscription which stated that when New street was widened, nearly a century before the time in question, this wall had been built by the East India Company, and that it remained their property.

The house had been claimed by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title, and occupied by their tenants for thirty-eight years, and during all that time there had been no acknowledgment of the title of the East India Company, upon these facts the question of adverse possession was presented. The court, however, speaking of the inscription on the tablet, said: "It was, in truth, a statement on the wall itself, that the wall forming a substantial part of the property, had been erected by and was the boundary wall of the adjoining owner, for the East India Company, of course, continued to be the owner of the soil of the street, although dedicated to the public. There was nothing, therefore, whatever to lead to the presumption that any title had been gained adverse to that of such adjoining owner by adverse possession. Where there is a boundary wall, and that boundary wall remains undisturbed, and an inscription is allowed to remain on it which states that it is the boundary wall of the adjoining property, it seems to us idle to suppose that any question of the statute of limitation or of adverse possession or of cause of cessation of possession could properly arise. It was, therefore, manifest that the wall belonged to the East India Company." Phillipson v. Gibbon, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 428. We pass by the use of the wall as a support for the grape arbor, because that was significant only as tending to show an act of ownership, and we think that the ownership is fully maintained on the grounds already stated. But, although there was no mention of the possession by the owners of the bank lot, it does not follow that Putzell had not acquired some rights to the use of the division wall. He had used this wall for more than twenty years as a support to his house; the enjoyment of it for this purpose had been notorious, peaceable, uninterrupted, and "as of right." Under these circumstances the law considers that he had a prescriptive title to the use of it in the manner in which he had enjoyed it.

It is conducive to the peace of society that the claims of right, which for a long time, have been acquiesced in and regarded as settled, should be protected by the law, and the space of twenty years has been adopted as the period for ripening claims of this description into titles. Putzell used this division wall as the rear wall of the lower part of his house, and also used it as a support for the wall of an additional story. To the extent of such use his title is clearly established. We have said that this use was not an ouster of the coterminal owner from the possession of the soil. It was an easement for the support of the rear wall of the house. By the common law easements must be established against an owner of an estate of inheritance, although they may arise from user, such user is regarded by fiction of law only as evidence of a grant, and as the right claimed is of a permanent nature, it is said that the supposed grant could have been legally made only by a party who could impose a permanent burden on the servient tenement; that is to say, by the owner of an estate of inheritance. But in this case we have no concern with this principle of the common law, and need not inquire into its application, or into seeming modifications of it. Both of the lots in question are held under leases for ninety-nine years, renewable forever; and it is well settled that the holders of such leases have the absolute control and management of the property; they usually have, in point of fact, far more valuable interests in it than the reversioner who holds the estate of inheritance. Crouce v. Wilson, 65 Md. 481, 482, 57 Am. Rep. 843. The bank retained all its rights in the division wall, which are not inconsistent with the enjoyment of the easement. It was bound to permit it to be used as a support for Putzell's house in the accustomed manner; but this is the limit of its obligation. It would be unreasonable to deny to it the right to improve its own property according to its interests and inclinations; provided it did not infringe the rights of other persons.

In fact the wall which it proposed, to take down was insufficient to support the building which it desired to erect. If this should be taken down and another larger and stronger one built in its stead; it would thereby exercise its own legitimate rights of property, and if it gave to the adjoining house the same right of support in the new wall, which it had in the old one, it would not injure its neighbor. This seems to us the just settlement of this controversy. Putzell may be put to some inconvenience while the building is going on, but this is one of the unavoidable consequences of living in a closely built city. We have said that each portion of this division wall belonged in severalty to the proprietor on whose ground it stood, but even if these proprietors had been tenants in common of this wall, the result would not have been practically different. In Standard Bank of British South America v. Stokes, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 72, Sir George Jessel cites, with marked approval, Cubitt v. Porter, 8 Barn. & C. 257. He quoted as follows from the opinion of Mr. Justice Bayley: "There is no authority to show that one tenant in common can maintain an action against the other for a temporary removal of the subject-matter of the tenancy in common, the party removing it having at the same time an intention of making a prompt restitution. It was not a destruction. The object of the party was not that there should be no wall there, but that there should be a wall there again as expeditiously as a wall could be made." And in a subsequent part of his opinion, he says: "As I have read the law from the statement of eminent judges, he (that is a tenant in common) has a right to pull down when the wall is neither defective, nor out of repair; if he only wishes to improve it, or put up a better or handsomer one." Chancellor Kent was of the same opinion. In the following passage from his Commentaries (vol. 8, p. 437) he assumes the rights as settled: "If there be a party wall between two houses, and the owner of one of the houses pulls it down in order to build a new one, and with it he takes down the party wall belonging equally to him and his neighbor, and erects a new house and wall, he is bound on his part to pull down and reinstate it in a reasonable time, and with the least inconvenience." And from the remarks of Chief Justice Bartol in Glenn v. Davis, 35 Md. 219, it may be readily inferred that the opinion of this court was the same.

The allegations of the bill of complaint were sufficient to give a court of equity jurisdiction, and they justified the preliminary injunction. The complainant has not proved the precise title to the wall which is alleged; although he has proved a title to a portion of it, and an interest in the other portion by way of easement. For the reasons which we have stated we approve of the dissolution of the injunction, and to that extent the decree below will be affirmed. But the right to take down the wall is not absolute and unconditional; it is qualified in the manner which we have explained in a previous part of this opinion. The bank is bound to finish the division wall at its own expense, and to allow to Putzell's house the same right of support which it had in the old wall, and to indemnify him for the necessary expenses which he has incurred and may incur in protecting his property from the consequences of the removal of the old wall. For failure to do these things it would be liable to an action at law. But as a court of equity had jurisdiction of this case, although it could not give the precise relief prayed, it was proper, according to well-settled principles, to do complete justice between the parties, and thus avoid multiplication of suits in the future. It ought to have retained the bill for the purpose of settling and adjudicating any claim which may arise in favor of Putzell against the bank in accordance with the principles which we have stated. We disapprove of that portion of the decree which dismisses the bill.

Decree affirmed in part, and reversed in part, and cause remanded for further proceedings, the costs in this court to be equally divided between the parties.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Eugene AHERN, Respt.,
v.

OREGON TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH
CO., Appt.

(.....Or.....)

1. A variance between an allegation that a person came in contact with a wire in the dark while walking on the sidewalk and received a shock while attempting to remove it from his pathway, and evidence that he touched it in groping to find packages which he had dropped when he slipped and fell on the sidewalk, is not a failure of proof which is fatal, under Hill's Code, § 98.
2. It is negligence to allow a wire which from its environment is liable to become charged with electricity to hang over a street or sidewalk at such a height as to obstruct and endanger ordinary travel.
3. A telephone company which instead of removing its wire on taking it out of a residence leaves it hanging upon an electric light company's pole is bound to look after it and is liable for an injury to a traveler who comes in contact with it after it has been removed by employees of the electric light company and hung upon a telephone pole, where it is accidentally touched by a traveler on a sidewalk while it was charged by contact with an electric light wire or a street railway company's wire.
4. Negligence in leaving a telephone wire where it is touched accidentally by a traveler on a sidewalk is a proximate cause of an injury to him from an electric shock, although this was occasioned by accidental contact of the wire with wires of an electric light company or a street railway company, at least, where it does not appear that these were out of their proper position.
5. Charging that electricity requires the "utmost caution to control" is not erroneous in an action by one who, while passing along a sidewalk, was injured by contact with a telephone wire which was hanging near the walk and was heavily charged by an electric light wire, —especially where immediately afterwards the jury are told to measure defendant's conduct by that of a "cautious and prudent man."

(June 19, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. R. & E. B. Williams & Carey, for appellant:

Negligence in this case must be proved as a fact, and not presumed from the circumstance that plaintiff was injured.

When an injury may have come of either one of two causes, either of which may have been the sole proximate cause, it devolves on the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of evidence that the cause for which the defendant was liable was culpable, and the proximate cause.

In this case the accident must be ascribed to the circumstance that the wire had become charged with electricity, and not alone to the position of the wire at the sidewalk.

It cannot be said that the proof that the wire was charged for twenty-four hours previous to the accident is constructive notice or is evidence to go to the jury upon the question of negligence.

2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1088 et seq.; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 440.

Lord, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in permitting its wire to come in contact with an electric wire, whereby it became heavily charged with electricity, and in allowing such wire to hang down so near the ground at the corner of K and Twenty-First streets as to endanger the life and limb of those traveling upon such streets.

The errors assigned relate to the refusal of the trial court to grant a nonsuit, and to certain instructions given and refused. Upon the first point the contention is that the evidence does not prove the cause of action alleged, although it may be sufficient to constitute a ground of action, and consequently that the variance is fatal to the plaintiff's recovery. It is no doubt true that the plaintiff must state the facts which constitute his cause of action, and that he cannot state one and prove another. The Code, with all its comprehensive liberality, will not admit, as Sherwood, Ch. J., said, "a plaintiff to sue for a horse and recover a cow." Waldhier v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 71 Mo. 518. Such variance is fatal, for the reason that the cause of action is unproved in its entire scope.

The inquiry, then, is whether the testimony for the plaintiff establishes a cause of action different from the one alleged. That there is some variation between the evidence and the complaint may be conceded, but it consists only in matter of detail, or as to how the injury occurred. There is no absolute departure in the proof from the original theory of the case. The point to which the variance relates is this: The allegation, in substance, is that the plaintiff was walking along the sidewalk, and came in contact with the wire, which, owing to the darkness, he was unable to see; and that he attempted to remove the same from his pathway, and in doing so he caught hold of the wire, and the electricity with which it was impregnated passed into his body, etc.; whereas his testimony shows that he was walking along the sidewalk, and, it being dark, and, owing to the rain, the pavement slippery, that he slipped, and fell on his elbow, causing his hat to fall off, and some packages to drop out of his hands, and that in groping for his hat and packages his hand came in contact with the wire, which, being impregnated with electricity, "grabbed" it, and, as he could not let go, he put out his other hand to remove the same, when it "grabbed" that hand, etc. Plainly, the variation here is only of detail, or as to the circumstances under which the plaintiff came in contact with the wire and received the injury. The elements of negligence alleged, namely, in permitting its wire to come in contact with the electrical wire, and to hang so near the ground as to endanger life or limb, are present in either aspect of the case, or as much under the testimony as the allegation. Such variance does not present a case where the cause of action is unproved in its entire scope and meaning, within the construction of the Code. Section 98, Hill's Code. Hence there is not a failure of proof, and without such failure the variance is not fatal, or such as would entitle the defendant to a judgment of nonsuit.

The principal ground of complaint remains, however, to be considered. This is, Was the negligence of the defendant the proximate cause of the injury? There are some other minor questions suggested by way of criticism upon the charge of the court, but the remoteness of its acts, and the intervention of other agencies directly contributing to plaintiff's injury, are relied upon as its chief defense. It was the failure of the court, as indicated by the instructions given and refused, to properly apply the law in this regard that constitutes the main grievance of the defendant. To comprehend the force of this objection, we must first know and understand the facts. The plaintiff is a laboring man, and was employed by the gas company to shovel coal into its furnace. On the day of the accident he quit work after 5 o'clock P. M., and started for his home, but on his way went to market, made some purchases, and went out G street to Twenty-First, and, when passing down that street, near the corner of K, he slipped on the sidewalk, and fell on his elbow, his hat falling off, and the packages which he carried flying out of his hands. After he got up he groped for his packages and hat, when his hand rubbed against a wire, one end of which was hanging down over the sidewalk at the intersection of the streets. His testimony on this point is: "My hand rubbed against this wire, grasping hold of me fearfully. I then took the notion to put up this hand to hit this one away from there. It grabbed that one, and held on to it fearfully. I could not let go; it was too strong. I don't know what part of my hand caught hold of it. My fingers rubbed it first. It tore me fearfully, like machinery with about 200 pounds of steam. I was screaming awfully, and finally I saw people around the sidewalk; and this hand after a while dropped from the wire. That must have been the time my toes got burned. It whirled me up in all sorts of shapes. I don't know how I was. When this hand dropped I hung on with it until I was released. After this hand dropped I had no more memory at all. I lost my senses. I don't know what happened after that." Several persons hearing his screams for help, two men ran from J street to his assistance, and one of them slashed at the wire with his knife, and received a severe shock, but did not sever it. After some hesitation, he slashed it again, and succeeded in cutting the wire. The defendant was assisted to his home and put to bed, when it was found that three toes were badly burned. Afterwards he was taken to the hospital, and one toe was amputated and the others were trimmed off. It was after 6 o'clock, and quite dark, when the accident occurred, and the sidewalk was slippery from recent rain. The defendant could not see the wire, nor did he know that it was hanging down over the street, nor that it was charged with electricity. The wires of the telephone company were strung on K street, running east and west, and the wires of the electric light company and the electric street-railway company were strung along Twenty-First street, running north and south, so that the wires of the defendant were at right angles to the wires of the two electric companies.

The evidence further shows that the defendant had an arrangement with the electric light company by which either might use the poles of the other upon which to string a wire when it had no poles at the place, and only a short distance of wire was to be used; that the defendant used the poles of the electric light company when wiring the residence of a Mr. Bates, at the corner of H and Twenty-First streets, but that some three months before the accident the wire was disconnected from the telephone at his residence, and wrapped around the electric pole, and made fast by tying it on a bracket and winding around the pole and around itself; that such wire had not been used by defendant after it was so disconnected, nor had the company made any inspection of it from that time until the accident; that during this interim the electric company changed its poles and wires along Twenty-First street, and in doing so took down the pole belonging to it upon which the telephone wire was fastened as aforesaid, coiled up the wire, and hung it on a pole belonging to the defendant, near K and Twenty-First streets, where the accident happened; but that the defendant had no knowledge that the electric company had taken down its poles, or taken down its wire, and hung it on the pole as aforesaid. Richard Gerdes testified that he was in the employ of the electric light company, and that on the night of the accident he received a message by telephone that a man had been hurt by an electric light wire; that he went at once to the place where the accident occurred, and found the wire hanging on the pole; that he cut it above the coil; that it was heavily charged with electricity by contact with a wire belonging either to the electric street railway or the electric light company; that it must have been the wire of one or the other that charged it with electricity, as there was no other heavily charged wire in that vicinity. The evidence further shows that the day before the accident the wire was hanging in the form of a coil on a stick at the side of the telephone pole, and that the bottom of it was two or three feet from the ground; that it was heavily charged with electricity, and that one witness, who touched it with a wire, was thrown to the ground from the shock.

Among other things, the court, in substance, instructed the jury that the question here submitted is "whether it was negligence or not to leave a wire along a public thoroughfare, where it might be found in the way of pedestrians, or where it might be liable to be handled or interfered with by boys or by irresponsible persons." That it was for them to determine from the evidence "whether or not there was a proper inspection made of these wires, so as to know what their condition was, and to ascertain whether anybody had been interfering with them, making them more dangerous than they otherwise would be." That "the fact that this company used the poles of another company, and the fact that other electric companies had wires upon the same street, does not detract at all from the strict requirements which should be made of the defendant company. Unless it had loaned its wire to the electrical company, or the electrical railway company, and placed them under the control of that company, it could not be absolved from the duty of looking after them and ascertaining and knowing what their condition was, and of anticipating and foreseeing what might happen in connection with them; and that, unless you should find from the evidence that this defendant had turned over the use and control of its wires to these other companies on whose pole this wire was suspended, you have no right to say that those companies were liable, and not this company, if this company was guilty of any negligence. Unless this company was negligent, there could be no recovery on the part of the plaintiff. If you find that it was not guilty of any negligence, then your verdict should be for the defendant." The counsel for the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury finds that the defendant was not negligent in leaving its wire attached to the pole near Mr. Bates' house, as it did leave it, and that the wire was not dangerous as left by it, and could not and did not become dangerous except by the act or neglect of some other person or company, the defendant is not liable;" but the court refused to charge as requested, but gave it with the following modification: "I give you that in connection with the general instruction which I gave you that the defendant must have parted with the control of its wires in order to be exonerated by the reason of the negligent act of some other person." The defendant also requested the court to charge that "it is claimed by the defendant that it placed its wires in a safe and secure position, and that it did not become dangerous except by the acts and omissions of others, without its knowledge or consent. If you find this is true, the defendant is not liable, unless the intervening acts or omissions of such other persons should have been contemplated and guarded against by the defendant as consequences likely to follow, and which might have been reasonably anticipated." And again: "If it was not negligent in leaving the wire as it did, it is not liable, unless it could have reasonably foreseen that some one would take down the wire, and place it where it injured the plaintiff, and that it might come in contact with some other electric wire that was charged with a current of electricity that would make it dangerous." And again: "Even if the defendant had left its wire coiled up or hanging over the sidewalk, so that pedestrians might come in contact with it, it would not be liable for damages to the plaintiff for injury sustained by an electric shock from the wire unless the fact that the wire left there was the immediate or proximate cause of the injury, the wire not by itself being dangerously charged with electricity, and becoming so charged only by intermediate circumstances, namely, that of interfering with or crossing some heavily charged wire," etc. The court refused to so instruct the jury, and to its rulings thereon the defendant duly accepted.

It appears from the instructions that the theory of the law as applied to the facts by the trial court was that it is negligence to allow a wire, which, from its environment, is liable to become charged with electricity, to hang over the street at such a height as to obstruct and endanger ordinary travel. That it was the duty of the defendant, owing to the location of its wire and the use of the poles of the electric light company, to look after it, and see that it was in proper condition, and that, when the wire was disconnected from the Bates residence, if, instead of taking down the wire, the company chose to hang it upon the electric pole, the duty still devolved upon it to take care of such wire, and that this was a continuing duty, from which it would not be absolved unless it had parted from the control of its wire to the electric companies. This requirement imposed upon the defendant the obligation of looking after and ascertaining the condition of its wire, and of anticipating or foreseeing results which were likely to happen by reason of its connection or location as to the electric wires so as to avoid liability to danger arising therefrom. In this view of the law, the taking up of the pole by the electric light company and hanging the defendant's wire upon its pole at the intersection of K and Twenty-First streets would not authorize the jury to find that the electric companies were liable, and not the defendant, if it was negligent in not removing its wire when it ceased to use it at the Bates residence. It is earnestly insisted by counsel that this view of the law is a wrong conception of the defendant's duty, for the reason that it makes the company liable for the wrongful acts of third persons in taking down the wire and hanging it on the pole where it became charged with electricity, which he claims, are the responsible causes of the injury. This is based on the assumption that there intervened between the negligence of the defendant, if any there was, and the injury to the plaintiff, an independent, adequate cause of the injury, namely, the wrongful act of the electric company, which was the proximate cause of the injury. What is the proximate cause of the injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is only when the facts are undisputed that it becomes a question for the court. Wherever, therefore, there is any doubt, the question of proximate cause should be submitted to a jury to be decided as a matter of fact according to the circumstances of the case. To warrant a jury in finding that negligence is the proximate cause of the injury it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 475, 24 L. ed. 259. The question, therefore, whether the stretching of the defendant's wire on the electric poles instead of its own poles, and whether the omission of the defendant to remove the same when it ceased to use it at the Bates residence, was negligence, and, if it was, whether the intervening act of the electric company and its consequences were such as could have been reasonably anticipated and guarded against by the defendant, was for the jury to determine in the light of the facts and circumstances. The record discloses that the electric light company gave the defendant permission to use its poles upon which to string its wire when the defendant needed them to connect its wire to a residence where it had no poles. When the defendant disconnected its wire from the telephone at Bates' residence it had no longer any need to use the electric poles, and the permission or license given to use them ceased, or was at an end, and necessarily the defendant ought to have removed its wire from the electric poles; and if it did not do so, but coiled and hung it on one of them, where it had no right to be, the defendant was bound to look after it, and to expect, if it failed to do so, that the electric company would remove it when such wire incommodated that company, or its business required the removal of its poles, as did happen. The jury found that the stretching of the wire upon the electric poles was dangerous, and that the omission of the defendant to remove it, when it disconnected the same from the Bates residence, and ceased to use it, was negligence, and that the intervening act of the electric company and its consequences could have been foreseen as likely to happen, or possibly to follow, from leaving the wire coiled and hung upon the electric pole near the Bates residence, and necessarily that the defendant was responsible for its wire being coiled and hung upon its own pole at the intersection of K and Twenty-First streets. This responsibility is based on the principle that if the defendant, instead of removing its wire, chose to hang it upon the electric pole, where it had no right to be, it was bound to look after it, and that, if the defendant had done so, it would have discovered the removal of the same, and its condition, so that the injury might have been avoided, and consequently that the company must be taken to have foreseen as likely to happen, or possibly to follow, the consequences which resulted from its omission to remove the wire when it was disconnected from the telephone at the Bates residence. This is in accordance with the rule that a person guilty of negligence or an omission of duty "should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man, fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed, whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not, would have thought at the time of the negligent act reasonably possible to follow if they had been suggested to his mind." Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 29. But this phase of the case is met with the argument that the telephone wire itself is not dangerous, and that the main or efficient cause of the injury was the electric current from the wires of the electric companies, with the production of which the defendant had nothing to do. In other words, that, if the defendant was negligent, it was the dangerous force of electricity which intervened, and with the production of which the plaintiff had nothing to do, that communicated the injury to plaintiff, and therefore it was the proximate cause of the injury. It is no doubt true that where there is negligence, and injury following it, and there is also an intermediate cause, disconnected from the negligence, and the operation of this cause produces the injury, the person guilty of the negligence cannot be held responsible for the injury. The inquiry must always be whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary fault, and self-operating, which produced the injury. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, supra. If the intervening cause and its probable consequence be such as could reasonably have been anticipated by the original wrongdoer, the causal connection between the wrongful act and the injury is not broken, and the defendant is liable for the injury. In White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Richter, 2 Ind. App. 394, it is said: "Intervening agencies sometimes interrupt the current of responsible connection between negligent acts and injuries, but as a rule these agencies, in order to accomplish such result, must entirely supersede the original culpable act, and be in themselves responsible for the injury, and must be of such a character that they could not have been foreseen or anticipated by the original wrongdoer. If it required both agencies to produce the result, or if both contributed thereto as concurrent forces, the presence and assistance of one will not exculpate the other, because it would still be an efficient cause of the injury." The intermediate cause must supersede the original wrongful act or omission, and be sufficient of itself to stand as the cause of plaintiff's injury, to relieve the original wrongdoer from liability. "One of the most valuable of the criteria furnished us by the authorities," Mr. Justice Miller said, "is to ascertain whether any new cause has intervened between the fact accomplished and the alleged cause. If a new force or power has intervened of itself sufficient as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote." Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 52, 19 L. ed. 67.

There is no claim that the wires of the companies transmitting electrical power were not in their proper position, or that the companies were negligent in the use of their wires. We must take it, upon the facts as disclosed by this record, that their wires were where they had a right to be, and were not an obstruction, endangering the life or limb of any one traveling along the street. It was the telephone wire, suspended on a pole, as shown by the evidence, that furnished the means by which the currents of electricity passing over the electric companies' wires were diverted and conducted so close to the ground as to render passage along the public thoroughfare exceedingly dangerous. As a consequence, it was the defendant's wire so hanging upon the pole that furnished the means by which the electrical current was communicated to and injured the plaintiff. It is true that the electrical current was a new power which intervened, and with the production of which the defendant had nothing to do, but it was harmless, or could not have been communicated to the plaintiff, but for the suspended wire of the defendant. As an intermediate cause it was connected with the primary fault, and not self-operating, and therefore is not sufficient itself to stand as the cause of plaintiff's injury. The language of Mr. Justice Bruce clearly illustrates this point: "To say that the agency of the telephone wire in the production of the injury was inferior to that of the electric current, which was the main cause, is not satisfactory. It is, in fact, to admit that the company's displaced wire furnished the means by which the dangerous force was communicated to and injured the defendant in error. True, it was a new force of power which intervened, with the production of which the telephone company had nothing to do, but upon this point, in Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 52, 19 L. ed. 67, the court says: 'If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote.' The new force of power here would have been harmless but for the displaced wire, and the fact that the wire took on a new force, with the creation of which the company was not responsible, yet it contributed no less directly to the injury on that account." South-western Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Robinson, 3 U. S. App. 205, 50 Fed. Rep. 813, 16 L. R. A. 545.

It thus appears that the defendant's negligence was the primary and proximate cause of the injury. In view of this result the other errors assigned are of little importance, and not such as would authorize the reversal of the case.

It results that the judgment must be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently granted after which on January 8, 1894, Lord, Ch. J., on behalf of the court delivered the following opinion:

The suspended telephone wire, while it was charged with electricity from contact with the electric wire, was not less dangerous than the electric wire itself would have been, similarly suspended as to the street. It was this condition of affairs that led the court, in its charge, to refer to electricity generally as a "subtle and dangerous agency," which required the "utmost caution to control." As the telephone wire was liable to become charged with such dangerous agent, and thus to become dangerous to the traveling public, the duty of inspecting and ascertaining the condition of the wires, and whether there was any interference making them more dangerous than they otherwise would be, was necessarily involved. In view of these circumstances, the degree of care imposed was commensurate with the danger. "Due care is a degree of care corresponding to the danger involved." Cooley, Torts. It is not the same in all cases. The term is relative, and its application depends on the situation of the parties, and the degree of care and vigilance which the circumstances reasonably impose. Where the danger is great, a high degree of care is necessary, and the failure to observe it is a want of ordinary care under the circumstances. Hence, a wire liable to be charged with an agency so dangerous and difficult to manage, while so located, needed to be looked after with that degree of care and vigilance as would guard the public against liability to accident from

it. The court then said: "The question is here submitted to you whether it was negligence or not to leave a wire along a public thoroughfare where it might be found in the way of pedestrians, or where it might be liable to be handled and interfered with by boys or by irresponsible persons." It further added: "Negligence," in cases of this kind, means the doing of some act which a cautious and prudent man would not do, or the neglecting to do some act which a cautious and prudent man would not neglect. Applying those definitions to this case, the inquiry to be solved by you is, What did this defendant do that a cautious and prudent man would not have done, in connection with the wire which has been described to you in the testimony, and which is mentioned in the pleadings?" These instructions, taken in connection with the instructions referred to in the main opinion, we think fairly present the law governing the case.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Purchasers of an undivided interest in timber from tenants in common of the land, although not entitled to a partition of the timber, may, in equity, enforce a partition of the land, setting off the parcel on which the timber will belong to them, even if, by subsequent conveyances, the whole title to the land has been acquired by one person.
2. A deed of standing timber to be removed within ten years passes the title and does not constitute a mere license to take off chattels within the time limited.
3. The omission to mention the state where the lands are situated in an instrument purporting to sell standing timber will not destroy the effect of the record as notice although the instrument is executed in another state if it is properly acknowledged and recorded in the county where the lands are situated and the record title there stands in the name of the grantor.
4. Recording an instrument purporting to convey standing timber in a book called "miscellaneous records" will not prevent its being constructive notice to the world of the rights of the purchaser, if the record is properly indexed and there is nothing to prevent the register from providing such a book.

(December 22, 1893.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Manistee County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to compel partition of certain lands so as to permit complainants to obtain timber which they had purchased from certain of the tenants in common. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. W. Niskern and C. W. Sessions, for complainants:

The timber deed to complainants Torrent, Haines & Company and the record thereof are good and valid.

The question of record is always one of notice. A conveyance need never be recorded as between the parties nor as to parties having full notice.

Battershall v. Stephens, 34 Mich. 68; Stetson v. Cook, 39 Mich. 750.

The deed being duly executed and acknowledged, and being a conveyance of an interest in lands, within the clear decisions of the supreme court, and the express terms of the statute has every effect as such record that it could have if it were an ordinary deed in the book of deeds.

Russell v. Myers, 82 Mich. 523; Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 3; How. Anno. Stat. §§ 5680, 5685.

Such timber deeds are not void in Michigan.

Even if the mistake were one of law, the parties with clean hands, who have paid their money, and can otherwise have no relief, are not precluded because of such mistake.

The acts and position of Benedict and Hart, as now claimed by them, are surely both an "imposition" and "fraud" upon their grantors, and especially upon the rights of those who had paid for the timber, to their knowledge.

In Benedict v. Torrent, 11 L. R. A. 278, 83 Mich. 186, this court explicitly holds that it conveyed to Torrent, Haines & Co. all the title which Mee and Seymour had in the timber upon the land. The title to the timber is 22 L. R. A.

passed absolutely by the terms of the deed, and the license is a mere condition subsequent.

Smith v. Lawrence, 12 Mich. 481; Barnard v. Campau, 29 Mich. 162.

A record in an unauthorized book is not constructive notice. For example the record of a deed absolute on its face, but intended as security for a debt, must be recorded according to its true import, and its record as a deed is void and is not constructive notice for any purpose.

No presumption of notice arises from the record of an instrument unless it is recorded by authority of law and unless that authority has been duly and fully pursued.

Tillman v. Cowand, 12 Smedes & M. 262.

The court, in Benedict v. Torrent, 11 L. R. A. 278, 83 Mich. 186, says: "It is well settled that they (Torrent, Haines & Co.) could not become purchasers of Mee & Seymour of any interest in the land to the prejudice of their covenants.

Haskell v. Ayres, 32 Mich. 93; Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 487.

As the act licensed is contrary to the prohibition of the statute the license must be void and cannot be the basis of an estoppel.

Every one dealing with a cotenant must be held to understand the law. He cannot base a right on his ignorance and disregard of it.

It is essential to an estoppel that the person relying on it should be misled.

Diller v. Brubaker, 32 Pa. 498, 91 Am. Dec. 177.

The grantee who claims estoppel must not only be ignorant of the true state of the title, but also of any convenient and available means of acquiring that knowledge.

In Duncan v. Sylvester, supra, it was held that a conveyance by metes and bounds of a portion of the common estate by one tenant in common is void and not merely voidable at the election of a cotenant.

Boston Franklin Co. v. Condit, 19 N. J. Eq. 894; Mobie v. Matteson, 17 Wis. 1.

The person granting an easement must be sole tenant and not a tenant in common. For the rights of the tenants being equal, the grantee would gain no right as against the other tenants.

Montgomery, J., delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed to determine the rights of the complainants in and to the timber growing upon certain lands described in the bill. It appears that the lands were held by several tenants in common. The owners of twenty-three twenty-fourths of the land conveyed all their right, title, and interest in the timber to complainants. One Hart was the owner of the remaining one twenty-fourth which was not conveyed to complainants. Subsequently, those from whom complainants purchased and Hart also conveyed to the defendant Benedict; Benedict being the owner of the entire field, subject to any rights that complainants have in the timber. In the case of Benedict v. Torrent, reported in 83 Mich. 181, 11 L. R. A. 278, this court considered the rights acquired by the respective parties. It was there held that the conveyance by the owners of the twenty-three twenty-fourths of their rights in the timber did not confer a right upon Torrent to ask and have a partition of the timber; that a partition of the timber distinct from the lands could not be had. It was said: "The only interest which such a purchaser takes is the interest in the timber upon such lands as in partition proceedings shall be set off to his grantor. Such partition must be made of the entirety of the estate, according to the shares held by each. When this is done, the purchaser of the timber would be entitled to all the rights secured by his conveyance. The cross-bill in this case is filed for the sole purpose of effecting a partition of the timber. It is not framed to obtain a partition of the entire estate." The present bill is framed to meet the objection, and alleges, in substance, that the purchase of the interest by Benedict of the several owners, so as to invest Benedict with the title to the whole, with a view to defeating a partition of the lands, by means of which the complainants' equity is to be worked out, amounted to a fraud upon the rights of complainants. The transaction need not necessarily be so characterized. When the title rested in complainants' grantors, they having conveyed their interest in the timber upon the lands, the only means of making that conveyance effectual to carry into effect the intent of the parties was for said grantors of timber to ask and obtain partition of lands. This they had the right, and it was their duty, to do, and equity would require and compel action on their part to that end. To deny this would be to permit the grantors of the timber to perpetrate a legal fraud upon their vendees. They have received a consideration for the timber, and have granted all the timber upon the lands to the complainants. This clearly includes all interest which they acquire on partition. See Ounningham v. Pattes, 99 Mass. 250; White v. Sayre, 2 Ohio, 112; Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 370; Harlan v. Langham, 69 Pa. 288; Whitton v. Whitton, 88 N. H. 133, 75 Am. Dec. 163; Barnhart v. Campbell, 50 Mo. 599; Freem. Coten, §§ 206, 207, 199; and Campau v. Godfrey, 18 Mich. 32, 100 Am. Dec. 133. In this latter case the question was raised, but not decided, as to whether the purchaser of a distinct parcel, less than the whole, from one cotenant, could sustain a bill for partition against the cotenant. The query was also suggested as to whether, if any of the cotenants bring a bill for a partition, there would be any difficulty in making the purchaser a defendant. It was said: "The necessity of making the purchaser a party, or even of having two suits or two partitions in the same suit, instead of one, if the shares can still be fairly set off to the cotenants, might seem to be a consideration going only to the costs of the proceeding, rather than an objection upon which alone the deed could be held void."

The question in this case is, Shall the grantor be permitted to retain the consideration, and say to the purchaser that, as he (the purchaser) cannot ask for partition of the timber distinct from a partition of the entire estate in common, therefore the title which thus he assumed to convey shall prove ineffectual? Are the rules of equity so unyielding as to sanction this monstrous injustice? We think not. We do not depart from the doctrine that such conveyance is void as against the cotenant, but it is void only in so far as it affects the cotenant's rights. He may give assent to the conveyance, and thereby make it effectual. It is void so far as that the cotenant's interests shall not be injuriously affected by the conveyance; but it is not void as against the grantor, and we think it is competent, under the general equity powers of the court, to compel the grantor of a special interest to take such steps as to make his conveyance effectual. It is within his power to do so. He has received the consideration for the specific thing, to wit, the timber, to which his conveyance shall attach upon partition. He is in law and morals bound to take such steps as shall give effect to his conveyance. It would be a premium on fraud for a court of equity to admit its inability to compel the performance of this plain duty. The complainants having the right, it follows that it cannot be defeated by the fact that the entire title is now merged in Benedict. It is true that some of the cases speak of the transfer purporting to convey, by metes and bounds, an estate less than the entire of that of the cotenant, as being void as against the cotenant, and this supposition of absolute invalidity has led to results in some cases not altogether just. But it seems to me the more correct way to state the result of the authorities is that such a conveyance is good as between the parties to it, but that it is not to be permitted to affect injuriously the rights of the cotenants. This results in nothing more than that, on partition, the cotenant should be entitled to partition precisely as though no conveyance had been made. But it seems to me a manifest perversion of justice to say that, because the law declares that the cotenant may not have his rights injuriously affected by such a conveyance, he may profit by the fact that he is a cotenant, and that circumstance shall enable him to defeat the right vested in the grantees of his cotenant. Mr. Freeman, in his excellent work on Cotenancy, says: "Although the deed does not impair the rights of the other cotenants, it by no means follows that they may treat it as void, or entirely disregard it. While falling short of what it professes to be, it nevertheless operates on the interest of the grantor by transferring it to the grantee. The latter acquires rights which the cotenants ought to be bound to respect. They ought not to be permitted to ignore his conveyance, and treat him as one having no interest in the property." Freem. Coten, § 200. And so the courts in Ohio, Virginia, California, Missouri, Pennsylvania, and New Hampshire have held that a grantee of a cotenant is a necessary party to proceedings in partition. See cases above cited. Mr. Freeman further sums up the result of these cases upon the effect of a conveyance, as follows: "We are not sure that the difference in the decisions of many of the courts upon this subject has not been more in form of expression than in matters of substance. If, however, there remain any states wherein the courts really intend to assert that a conveyance by one cotenant of part of the common property is void in any other sense than that such conveyance will not operate to diminish or impair the rights of the non-assenting cotenants, such courts are falling into the minority, as the more recent decisions tend strongly and surely towards the recognition of such conveyance as a valid transfer of all the grantor's interest in the property therein described, entitling the grantor to certain rights that the cotenants of the grantor cannot wantonly disregard." Freem. Coten, § 204. This conclusion is not only sustained by the cases hereinbefore referred to, but by the further cases of Orook v. Vandervoort, 13 Neb. 505; Camoron v. Thurmond, 56 Tex. 22; Markoe v. Wakeman, 107 Ill. 263; Crocker v. Tiffany, 9 R. I. 505; and Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 208.

The precise question involved in this proceeding has perhaps never been directly passed upon in the same form of proceeding, but the principle which we apply has been fully asserted in at least two cases. In the case of McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 340, John T. McKee and Andrew Bratton owned a tract of land, including a small triangular piece, which John T. McKee conveyed by metes and bounds to the defendant, Barley. Subsequently John T. McKee and Andrew Bratton conveyed to Samuel W. McKee the entire tract, including that previously conveyed to

Barley by John T. McKee. The court says: "If, upon a partition, that part of the land described in this deed, or affected by the water privileges, had been assigned to John T. McKee, he would have been in a condition to have executed his contract, if he would not, in that event, have been estopped by his deed from disturbing his vendee; and his son, claiming under his subsequent conveyance with full notice, can occupy no higher ground. A court of equity, in making a partition, would have respected the rights acquired by a fair purchaser, provided no injury was done thereby to the coparcener."

As the conveyance of both joint owners to the appellant, Samuel, has invested him with the legal title to the entire tract, he is now in a condition to perfect the title of the appellee, according to the terms of the contract, as evidenced by the deed from John T. McKee. This is all the decree requires him to do, and I think it should be affirmed."

The same doctrine is affirmed in Crocker v. Tiffany, 9 R. I. 512, where it is said: "If one of two tenants in common should convey his interest in a distinct part of the estate to a third person, and should afterwards convey his interest in the remainder to his cotenant, both conveyances would be valid, for the cotenant could not affirm his own title under the second conveyance without impliedly recognizing the right of the grantor thus to convey the estate by distinct parcels." See also Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 415. We think that the conclusions which we have heretofore stated are clearly within the principles to be deduced from the prevailing authorities. I concur with the Chief Justice upon the other points discussed by him. A decree should be entered directing that the lands be partitioned. The partition will not be of the timber, as distinct from the lands, but of the lands and timber as a whole. Twenty-three twenty-fourths should be assigned to one parcel, and one twenty-fourth to another, and, upon such partition being made, the complainants will be declared to be the owners of the timber upon the larger parcel, and entitled to cut and remove it from the lands within the time provided in their deeds of purchase. The complainants should recover costs of both courts.

McGrath and Long, JJ., concurred with Montgomery, J.

Hooker, Ch. J., delivered the following opinion:

The complainants, with the exception of Harry Mee, claim the ownership of the undivided twenty-three twenty-fourths of timber upon the land in controversy. The testimony shows that complainant Mee was made a party without his consent. Defendant Edwin E. Benedict claims the premises in fee simple. Defendant Sara B. Williams is Benedict's sister, and holds a mortgage upon the land, given by him. Defendants Hart, Sparrow, and Seymour have no present interest in the property. On April 29 the title to said land stood as follows: Hart, one twenty-fourth; Pease, twelve twenty-fourths; Mee and Seymour, eleven twenty-fourths. Upon that day, Pease conveyed by instrument in writing, to Mee and Seymour, all of his interest in the timber upon the land. On May 4, 1887, Mee and Seymour conveyed all of their interest in said timber to complainants Torrent, McKillip, Haines, and Hopper, copartners, doing business under the name of Torrent, Haines & Co. They claimed that this conveyance vested the title to twenty-three twenty-fourths of the timber in them. The defendants claim that at most it conveyed eleven twenty-fourths. On March 1, 1888, Pease deeded his remaining interest in the premises to complainant Mee in trust for Hart, and on March 22d Mee deeded all of his interest to Hart. On the same day, Seymour deeded her interest to Hart. No reservation of timber was made in any of these deeds. April 17, 1888, Hart deeded the land to Sparrow, and June 11, 1888, Sparrow deeded the same to Benedict, who held some tax titles upon the premises, which are admitted to have been invalid. By the conveyance from Pease to Mee and Seymour, the latter acquired title to twelve twenty-fourths of the timber if the conveyance was valid, which, together with the interest they had as owners of eleven twenty-fourths of the fee, gave them the title to twenty-three twenty-fourths of the timber. The following is a copy of the record of that instrument: "Copy from Miscellaneous Records of Manistee County, Liber 8, page, 178, made May 4, 1887, at 11½ o'clock A. M.: 'Know all men by these presents, that I, Frank B. Pease, of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and state of Illinois, of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars, lawful money of the United States, to me in hand paid at or before the enrolling and delivery of these presents by Harry Mee of Manistee, Michigan, party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold, and delivered unto the said party of the second part all the goods, chattels, and property, to wit, all his interest in and to the timber on the premises described as follows, to wit: The S. It is also agreed that the said party of the second part shall pay all taxes on the land above described during the term above mentioned, or so much thereof as may be used in cutting and removing said timber. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal the 29th of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven. Frank B. Pease." Here follow, in usual form, the acknowledgment, Chicago, Ill., April 29, 1887; certificate of office of notary Chicago, Ill., April 30, 1887."

This instrument is assailed upon several grounds, viz.: (1) That the book called "Miscellaneous Records" is not a book of deeds or mortgages, and the record in that book was notice to no one; (2) the instrument does not show in what state the lands described are situated; (3) the instrument was a mere license to take off goods and chattels within ten years from its date. Standing timber is an interest in lands that may be acquired by deed (see Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 3; Wait v. Baldwin, 60 Mich. 622; Williams v. Flood, 68 Mich. 487; Monroe v. Bowen, 26 Mich. 528); and the fact that it must be removed within a definite period does not prevent the title to the timber vesting in the grantee (see cases above cited). The land was described by the section, township, and range. Pease, the maker of the instrument, had title of record to these lands. Although the acknowledgment was taken in Chicago, the certificate of the official character of the notary was appended and the paper placed on record in Manistee county, where the lands are situated. This we think sufficient evidence to identify the lands sought to be described. Russell v. Sweezy, 22 Mich. 235; Smith v. Brown, 34 Mich. 455; Slater v. Breese, 36 Mich. 77. The failure of Pease to affix a seal to the writing did not render it invalid, for, if the seal should have been affixed, the statute (How. Anno. Stat. § 7778) provides that its absence shall not invalidate the instrument. Fowler v. Hyland, 48 Mich. 181; Lockwood v. Bassett, 49 Mich. 549; McKinney v. Miller, 19 Mich. 151. The instrument was duly acknowledged, thereby becoming entitled to record. How. Anno. Stat. §§ 5678, 5709, 5712. The record shows that this instrument was recorded in a book devoted to the exceptional instruments offered for record, such as bills of sales of timber, land contracts, deeds of cemetery lots, leases, of buildings, and various other kinds of papers. There is nothing to show that this record was not properly indexed, and the register might properly provide a book for miscellaneous documents. Such is believed to be the uniform practice throughout the state, and we think it a lawful and commendable one. The record of this writing was constructive notice of the rights of Mee and Seymour under it, to the world. How. Anno. Stat. § 5712. There is no merit in the point that the original writing was necessary to prove the sale of this timber. The record could be used for the purpose, and was prima facie evidence of the execution of the instrument. Id. §§ 5680, 5685; Bassett v. Hathaway, 9 Mich. 31. This covers all of the questions that arise upon the introduction of the instrument (similar in character) by which Mee and Seymour attempted to convey their interest in the timber to Torrent, Haines & Co.

It remains to discuss the effect of these writings and the rights of the several parties under them. At the time that they were made, Hart was a tenant in common of the lands, and it is asserted that they were void as to him. It is a doctrine of long standing that one tenant in common cannot convey a distinct parcel of the common tract so as to bind his cotenant. Smith v. Benson, 9 Vt. 141, 31 Am. Dec. 614; Duncan v. Sylvester, 24 Me. 482, 41 Am. Dec. 400; Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 412, 449; Bartlet v. Harlow, 12 Mass. 348, 7 Am. Dec. 76; Peabody v. Minot, 24 Pick. 329; Johnson v. Stevens, 7 Cush. 431; Mitchell v. Hazen, 4 Conn. 495, 10 Am. Dec. 169; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. 363; Hartford & S. Ore Co. v. Miller, 41 Conn. 112; Cogswell v. Reed, 12 Me. 198; Scott v. State, 1 Sneed, 629; Markoe v. Wakeman, 107 Ill. 263; Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 208; Shepardson v. Rowland, 28 Wis. 108; Jewett v. Stockton, 3 Yerg. 492, 24 Am. Dec. 594.

Cases might be multiplied upon this point, but these will suffice. Some hold the deed absolutely void, but the greater number treat it as valid between the parties, and that, if a partition should be made by which the parcel conveyed should be allotted to the grantor, it would inure to the benefit of the grantees by estoppel. Some courts have evolved the doctrine that the conveyance is binding to some extent upon the cotenant; holding that it is binding so far as it does not injure, and that the courts may give relief to the grantee, taking care not to deprive the cotenant of any rights. Others have gone to the extent of holding that such conveyance is valid as against the cotenant, and, as in Prentiss' Case, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 180, that he can be compelled to partition with each of several grantees of different parcels of the tract. It may be mentioned that the case of White v. Sayre, 2 Ohio, 112, upon which this decision is based, was by a divided court. In Missouri the court has gone so far as to hold that the deed is valid against the cotenant, and that the grantee may have relief, because the statute authorizing a sale furnishes a means of giving adequate relief to the cotenant in all cases. The various phases of this question may be seen by consulting the following cases: Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 370; Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 588, 95 Am. Dec. 189; Sutter v. San Francisco City and County, 36 Cal. 115; Crook v. Vandervoort, 18 Neb. 505; Camoron v. Thurmond, 56 Tex. 22; Arnold v. Cauble, 49 Tex. 533; Bogges v. Meredith, 16 W. Va. 27.

Some of my brethren think that a court of equity may properly grant relief to the grantee in all such cases by requiring the tenants in common to partition the land, but I cannot assent to that doctrine. In the case of the conveyance of a single parcel, no hardship might result from such a course; but if several parcels should be carved out and sold to different purchasers, as, in one case, which one tenant in common platted and sold village lots from a part of the tract, or where different interests, such as minerals, stone, sand, clay, and the like, are granted, it would be more difficult to preserve the rights of the cotenant. I think the great weight of authority is against it. But while the conveyance of a portion by one tenant in common may be disregarded by his cotenant, if such cotenant, or any other person, shall, with notice of the grantee's interest, choose to unite the different titles by purchasing the remaining interest of the grantor, he may be held to thereby assent to such conveyance by recognizing the right of the grantor to deed in parcels, and he will take the title of the grantor subject to the rights of the prior grantee, which equity may compel him to recognize and satisfy. While a tenant in common may insist upon his own, he will not be permitted, in such a case, to collude with his cotenant, or profit by his fraud. Hartford & S. Ore Co. v. Miller, 41 Conn. 113; Goodwin v. Keney, 49 Conn. 563; Adams v. Manning, 51 Conn. 5; Crocker v. Tiffany, 9 R. I. 512; Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 418. Hart saw fit to unite in himself the titles of all his cotenants. He could only buy what they had left to sell, and, as he took these interests with the notice of the sale of the timber, he cannot justly claim such timber. By his act he has put it out of the power of the complainants' grantors to deliver this timber, but he cannot be said to have acquired the title to it. He has chosen to recognize the sale to the complainants by purchasing the remaining interest. His grantees are in no better position. There are many allegations in the bill which are unnecessary in the view that I take of the case, but sufficient appears to justify a decree that complainants recover the timber upon twenty-three twenty-fourths of the land, and that partition of the premises be made, to determine the same. Complainants Torrent, Haines & Co. should recover their costs against defendants Benedict and Williams. As to other defendants, the decree of the circuit court dismissing the bill will be affirmed.

Grant, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinions of my brethren in this case. In my judgment, the logical conclusion of the former decision is that complainants are without remedy as against these defendants. The bill was not then framed to test the question now involved, and we therefore refrained from expressing any opinion upon it. The like course was pursued in Adam v. Briggs Iron Co., 7 Cush. 361. In that case one Lane, the owner of the fee simple of three undivided fourths of the lot in question, in December, 1790, sold and conveyed the same to three grantees, reserving to himself all the iron and other ores in and upon the land, with the right of way to pass and repass, and to dig for and cart away the same from the land. He occupied the premises and took ore therefrom till the year 1800. He then sold his reserved and excepted rights to one Forbes, who used the ore bed during his lifetime. The complainants were the heirs of Forbes. The grantees in the deed from Lane, of December 21, 1890, conveyed to the defendant company, which took possession of land, and dug and carried away the ore, driving the complainants therefrom. The bill prayed for an accounting, injunction, and general relief. A demurrer to the bill was interposed, which was sustained. It was urged upon the argument that the bill showed a tenancy in common of the mine, and therefore the court had jurisdiction. The court held that no such case was set out in the bill, and declined to take jurisdiction on that ground. The bill was afterwards amended, averring the complainants were tenants in common of three quarter parts of the ore and ore beds, and the defendants were tenants in common of one quarter part. The learned Chief Justice Shaw delivered the opinion of the court. It was there said: "It is entirely settled, as a rule of law in relation to land, that the conveyance of any separate estate by a tenant in common, by metes and bounds, is void as against the cotenants, and is available only by way of estoppel against the grantor and his heirs."

... I have a moiety. My cotenant has a moiety. He may convey a quarter of the whole estate to one, an eighth to another, a sixteenth to another, and so on indefinitely, letting in other cotenants with me; but, all being seised of aliquot parts in the same estate, and of like kind and quality, my right to partition is not disturbed by the number of cotenants; but, if he could convey his aliquot part in specified parcels of the estate, he might diminish the value of my right, if not render it worthless." The opinion then states the mischief and inconvenience arising from the act of one cotenant in attempting to convey his undivided part in a particular parcel, instead of an aliquot part in the whole common estate; and states that for the same reasons an attempt to "parcel out rights, in their nature indivisible, in definite portions of the inheritance, as the mines to one, and the general estate to another," is void against cotenants. The conclusion reached was that the reservation in the deed from Lane was void, and a subsequent deed to Forbes was also void, and that no interest in the estate or ore beds passed by it. For the like reason a conveyance by a cotenant of his interest in the timber, ore, minerals, clay beds, and the like, would be void. To the same effect is Boston Franklinite Co. v. Condit, 19 N. J. Eq. 394, which was cited in the former case, and where it was held that a grantee of the right to dig ores, from one tenant in common, cannot call for a partition of the premises. These are the only cases I have been able to find, and we are cited to no others, which involve the sale by one tenant in common of an interest in the common estate, which in its nature is indivisible.

The cases of White v. Sayre, 2 Ohio, 112; Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 870; Harlan v. Langhan, 69 Pa. 288; Whitton v. Whitton, 38 N. H. 138, 75 Am. Dec. 163; and Barnhart v. Campbell, 50 Mo. 599,—are cited as analogous in principle to the present case, and therefore sustaining the claim of the complainants. None of these cases involve the conveyance by a tenant in common of any interest in the timber, or ores, or minerals, or other interests in the land. They involve only the effect of a conveyance of an undivided interest of a part of the common estate, or a conveyance in severalty, by metes and bounds, of a part thereof. All these authorities hold that such conveyances do not affect the rights of the other cotenants. None of them, except White v. Sayre, hold that the grantees of such parties can maintain partition against their grantor's cotenants. The extent of the holding is that when partition is had of the entirety, and a specific part is partitioned to their grantors, they are then estopped by their deeds from denying the rights of their grantees. The purchaser of a specific parcel may get nothing, for none of the land conveyed to him may be set apart to his grantor. In such case he is without remedy unless it be an action at law to recover the purchase prices for failure of consideration under the covenants in his deed. With these decisions I find no fault. They may safely be granted to rest upon sound principle, and still they do not, in my judgment, affect the question now under consideration, where an aliquot part of the common estate is not conveyed. The same will, in my judgment, be found true of the other cases cited by my brethren.

It is also held, with good reason, that where the cotenants have assented, by deed or in some other proper manner, to the act of the cotenant, they thereby ratify the act, but mere absence of objection is not sufficient. Hartford & S. Ore Co. v. Miller, 41 Conn. 132; Goodwin v. Keney, 49 Conn. 568. In the former case, decided in 1874, the court says: "In New Hampshire, as in Massachusetts, the doctrine that such conveyances may be made valid and effectual by the act of the cotenant is well established. Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 412; Whitton v. Whitton, 38 N. H. 137, 75 Am. Dec. 163. In view of the authorities in this state and elsewhere, we think the true doctrine to be that a deed of one tenant in common of a part of the common property, by metes and bounds, is inoperative as against the other tenants; but if the cotenants, then or subsequently, by a suitable conveyance confirm the grant, the grantee still holding under his deed, it becomes, in effect, operative and binding upon all concerned." I am unable to concur in the view that a cotenant, taking a deed without any reservation, thereby assents to the transfer of such an interest as is here conveyed. The rule must be the same, in the case of an undivided interest of a stone quarry, coal mine, minerals and ores of all descriptions, or any valuable deposit which may exist beneath the surface, as in the case of timber. The grant of mines gives the right to work them unless there is some positive restraint in the language of the grant itself. Bainbridge, Mines & Mining, 81. Now, complainants' vendors had the right to sell the land, and any person, including their cotenants, had the right to buy. The deeds contained no reservation, but purported to convey the entire fee of the land. Their grantors did not agree that they would not sell, or that they would obtain partition for the benefit of their grantees. There are now no cotenants entitled to partition unless complainants, by their purchase of the timber, are such cotenants; but it was decided in the former suit that they are not. It is, I think, a sufficient reply that the statute makes no provision for partition in such cases, and this court cannot, therefore, assume jurisdiction. Under the clear weight of authority, complainants did not, by their purchase, become tenants in common with the other cotenants, and cannot, therefore, invoke the benefit of the partition statute, which is applicable only to joint tenants and tenants in common. How. Anno. Stat. § 7850. But, aside from this, the rights of the cotenants and subsequent purchasers from them may be seriously affected if one cotenant may lawfully sell an undivided interest in any valuable thing that may exist on the land. It is true, as in the present case, that their possession would be only temporarily interfered with, for the timber can be speedily removed; but the purchase of a similar interest in a mine or other like property would entitle the purchaser to the like possession to explore, to erect plants, to remove his ore, and he would thus become entitled to the permanent possession of the land, or so much thereof as was necessary for his purpose. Would not this affect adversely the rights of the cotenants? May a cotenant convey his interest in the coal to one, in the iron to another, in the clay to another, in the stone to another, and so on, and, because their grantor refuses to take steps to secure a partition, or has sold his remaining interest in the land to his cotenants, may they institute partition suits in the name of their grantor, and have the land partitioned, so that each may have possession to work his mines, quarries, or clay beds?

Another difficulty presents itself. If partition of land cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners, it must be sold, and the proceeds divided among the cotenants. Very often, if not generally, mining lands cannot be partitioned without great prejudice, and must therefore be sold. Upon such sale, how could the value of an undeveloped mine or other deposit be separated from the value of the land in other respects, so as to give to the purchaser of an undivided part thereof his proportionate share? Yet by this rule such purchaser would have the right to have the land sold, in order that he might receive the supposed value of what he purchased. I do not think that such a rule is founded upon reason or authority. Principles must not be determined by the hardships of an individual case. A principle established to relieve from hardship in one case may lead to greater hardships in another. An important principle is here involved, which must be considered and determined regardless of what the complainants may suffer. It is no answer to the principle to say that the action of complainants' grantors in conveying an interest to them, and the rest of the estate to other parties, is a fraud, intentional or constructive. If it was a fraud in fact, complainants have a remedy at law. But there is no question of fraud involved. Complainants purchased with full knowledge of the facts; so did the defendant and his grantors. The title was of record when complainants purchased the timber, and they are chargeable with knowledge that their grantors held only undivided interests in the land as tenants in common. Defendants also purchased with full knowledge of the facts. The sole question is therefore one of law. The decree should be affirmed.

William E. HAMILTON.

1 Plaintiff in an action for damages for a libel has the right to specifically af-

Headnotes by NICHOLLS, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Libel by defamatory words in pleading.

The above case presents the strongest possible illustration of malicious and libelous charges under the guise of a pleading. It will be noticed that the decision was upon the sufficiency of the complaint upon exceptions in the nature of a demurrer, and the complaint alleges that the defamatory pleading was not necessary, and in fact was not used in the real suit, but in the fraudulent simulation of a suit. No case yet decided on such an extreme state of facts has upheld a claim of privilege.

In Runge v. Franklin, 3 L. R. A. 417, 72 Tex. 585, it was held that no action for libel can be maintained for any defamatory matter contained in a pleading in a court of civil jurisdiction, as such a publication is absolutely privileged. But that case did not decide what would be the rule if the pleading was not filed in a bona fide suit.

So pertinent allegations in a bill in chancery, even if malicious, were held absolutely privileged, in Johnson v. Brown, 18 W. Va. 73, but it was not decided whether they would be so if the suit was not bona fide, but brought as a cover for the scandal.

In the early case of Buckley v. Wood, Cro. Eliz. 230, 247, it was held that it was actionable to charge one with felony by a bill in star chamber, because there was no jurisdiction of the offense and so the bill was not in a proceeding in the course of justice. While the present English doctrine is in favor of absolute privilege for all words used in judicial proceedings the question as to lack of jurisdiction, in Buckley v. Wood, does not seem to have had any recent adjudication.

The great weight of American authority clearly limits the privilege for defamation in pleadings to matter which is pertinent or relevant to the case in which the pleading is made. So it is expressly held in a modern Massachusetts case that charges of gross criminal conduct in a pleading to which they are not pertinent are not privileged, but will sustain an action for libel. McLaughlin v. Cowley, 127 Mass. 816.

So an attorney may be indicted for libel, where he sets out in a pleading irrelevant, gratuitous, and malicious attacks or insinuations against the character of the opposite party. Gilbert v. People, 1 Denio, 41, 43 Am. Dec. 646.

firm in his pleadings, and on a trial to prove, the nonexistence of the conditions upon which would be dependent a right of exemption from liability, grounded on the fact that the matters complained of were charged on a judicial proceeding. He cannot be cut off from establishing an allegation to that effect by an exception of no cause of action.

2 The fact that matter defamatory and libelous in its character was

The privilege is sustained in other cases on the ground and to the extent that the defamatory allegations are relevant. Vinas v. Merchants Mut. Ins. Co., 32 La. Ann. 1265; Hardin v. Cumstock, 2 A. K. Marsh. 480, 12 Am. Dec. 427; Wallis v. New Orleans & C. R. Co., 29 Ann. La. 66.

In Forbes v. Johnson, 11 B. Mon. 48, it was declared that defamatory matter in a pleading was not libelous if it was pertinent, unless the pleading was made as a cover for malice and not in good faith for the purpose of the case.

So allegations in a regular pleading, which are pertinent and material to the redress or relief sought, whether legally sufficient to obtain it or not, are absolutely privileged, however false and malicious they may be. Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238.

And it is said that to show libel in a complaint in a judicial proceeding it must be shown that the pleader knew that what he alleged was false and was actuated by malice, or made use of legal proceedings in bad faith as a cloak to his libelous utterances. Dada v. Piper, 41 Hun. 254.

A petition in a suit is absolutely privileged, if the matter is pertinent to the action, and in that case the bona fides of the pleader is immaterial. Gardeal v. McWilliams, 48 La. Ann. 454.

In Torrey v. Field, 10 Vt. 353, it was decided that pertinent matter in a bill in chancery was privileged, but only so far as the language was warranted by the ordinary forms of process and pleading. The court declared that the language was not actionable "however slanderous or malicious the suit may be, if founded on probable cause, although for the leading purpose of scandalizing" the opposite party.

Thus statements made in a petition by a receiver against a co-receiver, though malicious and false, charging him with embezzlement of the trust funds, are privileged. Bartlett v. Christliff, 69 Md. 219.

A statement in a petition for the removal of a guardian that he has in his family a girl whom he has ruined, is privileged if the words were used in good faith and with probable cause, and in that case will give no right of action to such girl for defamation, although she was not a party to that proceeding; but if the words are not used in good faith and charged in the petition of a plaintiff against a defendant does not of itself carry absolute exemption from liability for damages claimed by reason of said defamatory and libelous charges; other facts must concur to bring about that result.

3. There is a great difference between an absolute exemption from liability for damages for acts done in the course of judicial proceedings under a given state of facts proven, and an absolute exemption from liability to a suit for the purpose of testing whether such a state of facts exists as would convey with it such protection from damages, and between the situation of parties at the end of a lawsuit after evidence adduced, and that of parties at its beginning, standing on pleadings.

(October 10, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for the Parish of Caddo in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. M. S. Jones, Alexander & Blanchard, and Leonard & Thatcher for appellant.

Messrs. Wise & Herndon for appellee.

Nicholls, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in this case having filed an exception of no cause of action to plaintiff's demand, the allegations of the petition will have to be given in full. Plaintiff avers that on or about June 22, 1892, William E. Hamilton, through his attorney, instituted in the district court for Caddo a suit entitled "The Shreveport Electric Railway & Motive Power Company v. The City of Shreveport et al.," by filing a petition verified by his oath made and subscribed to before Cal D. Hicks, notary public of said parish, on June 21, 1892, whereon he obtained from the Honorable S. L. Taylor, judge of said court, on June 22, 1892, a writ of injunction. That in said petition and affidavit said Hamilton reprewith probable cause, they may be actionable. Ruohs v. Backer, 6 Helsk. 305, 19 Am. Rep. 598.

In a bill to remove a trustee, a charge of his bad character for honesty is privileged. Strauss v. Meyer, 48 Ill. 385. In this case no limitation is expressed to the doctrine that defamatory matter in pleadings is privileged.

In Weil v. Israel, 42 La. Ann. 955, an allegation in an answer to a suit by a clerk for the value of services, to the effect that he is so notoriously unreliable as a clerk that he cannot obtain employment where known, was held libelous and slanderous, where it was filed in court and read in the presence of many witnesses; although nothing is said in the case on the question of privilege but the defense of truth was set up.

Although English decisions as to libel in pleadings are not numerous, it must be taken as settled that the privilege as to defamatory statements in pleadings is absolute whether pertinent to the case or not, since it is established by Dawkins v. Rokeby, L. R. 7 H. L. 744, affirming L. R. 8 Q. B. 265, that the testimony of witnesses is privileged no matter how immaterial or malicious, and by Munster v. Lamb, L. R. 11 Q. B. 588, that the privilege of counsel is expressly held to extend to all words spoken in reference to the case, even if malicious and irrelevant; while it is the general doctrine of the English courts expressly declared in Dawkins v. Rokeby that the same rule of privilege exists as to judges, counsel, witnesses, and parties.

In Brown v. Michel, Cro. Eliz. 500, it was held that an action would not lie for charging untruth in an answer to a bill in equity. See Buckley v. Wood, Cro. Eliz. 230, 247.

Some Canadian cases state the rule as to privilege least favorably to the claim of privilege.

Thus in Benning v. Rielle, Mont. L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 365, it is held that defamatory matter in a pleading is actionable, if the allegations are false and without probable cause.

So in Charlebois v. Bourassa, Mont. L. Rep. 5 Super. Ct. 423, it is held that the pertinency of a libelous allegation in a pleading is a justification only when the allegation is made in good faith, with probable cause, and without intention to injure.

A client is not liable for defamatory allegations made by his attorney in a pleading, if they were not made by the client's direction. Hardin v. Cumstock, 2 A. K. Marsh. 480, 12 Am. Dec. 427.

Other papers connected with pleadings.

The rule applicable to pleadings applies also to the same extent to motions and other papers filed in a cause.

Statements of testimony in the case in a brief are privileged, although by the final decision the alleged slanderous testimony is excluded as incompetent. Stewart v. Hall, 83 Ky. 375.

Specifications of opposition to an insolvent's discharge, charging him with fraud, being pertinent to the subject under investigation, are absolutely privileged, and malice cannot be shown. Hollis v. Meux, 60 Cal. 625, 58 Am. Rep. 374.

So objections filed by counsel to a discharge in bankruptcy are subject to privilege in alleging that the testimony of a witness for the bankrupt was perjured, if the truth of that testimony is a material and pertinent question. Marsh v. Ellsworth, 50 N. Y. 309.

Defamatory words in a bill of particulars furnished in a libelsuit under order of court, charging the plaintiff with adultery with a third person, being pertinent to the case, were held privileged. Prescott v. Tousey, 21 Jones & S. 53.

Neither can they be made the basis of an action for libel by the individuals so named. Perzel v. Tousey, 20 Jones & S. 79.

A motion for an order upon an attorney to pay over money, stating pertinent facts only, is privileged and not libelous. Hawk v. Evans, 76 Iowa, 593.

But defamatory matter in a sworn application for an extension of time to file a transcript on appeal, charging collusion of the attorney with the attorney for the opposite party, being wholly foreign to the application, is not privileged. Wyatt v. Buell, 47 Cal. 624.

Defamatory words in cross-interrogatories to lay the predicate for impeaching a witness, used in honest belief of right, are not actionable. Lawson v. Hicks, 38 Ala. 279, 81 Am. Dec. 49.

A distress warrant being a proceeding to enforce a legal right is within the rule which denies an action for libel for statements contained therein. Bailey v. Dean, 5 Barb. 297.

A remonstrance against the granting of a liquor license being a part of the pleadings, is privileged, unless filed maliciously. Metzler v. Romine, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 171, 47 Phila. Leg. Int. 484.

The same rule that applies to pleadings applies also to affidavits, as to which see note to Cooper v. Phipps (Or.) post, —, on the question of privilege as to defamatory matter in testimony. B. A. R.

sented himself to be the president of a pretended corporation, styled in said petition "The Shreveport Electric Railway & Motive Power Company," and therein falsely described as a corporation duly chartered, organized, and existing under the laws of the state of Louisiana. That in said petition, among others, the following allegations are made, viz.: "That said pretended company had been granted and vested with certain rights, privileges, and franchises, by an ordinance of the council of the city of Shreveport of July 28, 1891, and that such rights, privileges, and franchises were held by and vested in said company. That in the exercise of such rights, said Hamilton, as president of said company, employed a gang of laborers, and was with them engaged in constructing a railroad along Southern avenue, in said city, on June 20, 1892, when the police officers of said city, acting under the authority of the mayor and council of said city, arrested him and said laborers, and forcibly prevented them from continuing such work. That said policemen, mayor, and council, in their interference with the rights vested in said company by said ordinance, claimed that said ordinance, and all rights thereby vested, were repealed by said council at its session on June 9, 1892. That said pretended repealing or demand is an attempt to divest vested rights, and is illegal, null, and void. That Herman Herold, Charles J. Randall, W. D. Scofield, John C. Wimbish, and Henry H. Youree, members of the council of said city, entered into a conspiracy with certain persons connected with and interested in the City Railroad Company, a rival corporation, to pass said pretended repealing ordinance. That said conspiracy was conceived and executed solely in the interest of said City Railroad Company and its owners, and without any regard to the rights of said Hamilton Company or of the public. That such conspiracy, so concocted, was kept a profound secret from the mayor and from the remaining members of the city council, and from the people; and maintaining inviolable the injunction of secrecy imposed on them by said parties whose interests alone they were to subserve, the said members of said council refused to entertain a motion to postpone for investigation, made by a member not a party to said conspiracy, and refused to hear the opinion or follow the advice of the city attorney, because they had already taken the advice of the retained counsel of said City Railroad Company. That said conspiracy, and all the acts in pursuance thereof, on the part of the aforesaid members of the city council, were illegal, wrongful, tortious, and a fraud on the rights of said Hamilton Company. That all of which foregoing fully appeared from a certified copy of said petition, annexed and made part hereof. That said suit was dismissed by judgment of the district court for Caddo, on exceptions of defendants thereto, for reasons assigned in said judgment, which said exceptions and judgment therein are made part hereof by reference. That he is now, and was at the time of the adoption of the Ordinance of July 28, 1891, purporting and intending to grant certain franchises fully set forth in the petition of said W. E. Hamilton in said suit, a member of the city council, and that he voted as a member of the city council against said ordinance. That he is now and was a member of the city council on June 9, 1892, and as such voted for the ordinance enacted on said date by said council, repealing the ordinance granting certain rights to the Shreveport Electric Railway & Motive Power Company, and that it was his right and his duty so to vote, for the reasons (among others) assigned by the Caddo district court in the opinion and judgment dismissing said suit No. 4,001. That the charges made against him and his fellow members of said council, in the petition in said suit No. 4,001, and verified by the oath of said W. E. Hamilton, and the allegations of said petition with regard to himself and to his said fellow members, in so far as they affect the petitioner, are false, libelous, and slanderous, designed and calculated to injure and destroy the character and reputation of petitioner as a private citizen and public official, and his credit and repute as a business man; and that said charges and allegations constitute a charge of felony, and a criminal and infamous offense under the laws of the state of Louisiana; and that said W. E. Hamilton well knew when he published said charges, and verified them by his oath, that same were false, libelous, and slanderous, and same were maliciously made and with full advice; that said charges and allegations were so made and published by said W. E. Hamilton without cause, wantonly, maliciously, and with intent to injure petitioner, and that said charges, as made and published in said petition, the said Hamilton has verbally reiterated, made, and published, at various times before and after the institution of said suit No. 4,001, to citizens of Shreveport and to others, with design to injure petitioner, and destroy his character and credit. That the said petition of the said Hamilton in said suit No. 4,001 shows on its face no cause of action against petitioner and the other members of the common council named thereon, and that he and said other members were made defendants in said suit wantonly, maliciously, and for the corrupt purpose of influencing thereby the official action of petitioner and said other members in the interest of said Hamilton and a certain corporation, to wit, the Shreveport Railway & Land Improvement Company, wherein said Hamilton is a large stockholder, together with his father-in-law, Edward Jacobs, his brother-in-law, Walter B. Jacobs, and wherein said W. E. Hamilton, Edward Jacobs, and the said W. B. Jacobs and First National Bank of Shreveport (whereof said W. E. Hamilton is vice president and said W. B. Jacobs is cashier) are large stockholders, and are otherwise largely interested; it being the purpose and intention of said Hamilton to destroy the value, and force the sale to said Shreveport Railway & Land Improvement Company, of the property and franchises of the Shreveport City Railway Company, a rival corporation. That, since the judgment of the Caddo district court dismissed said suit No. 4,001, the road and franchise of said City Railroad Company have been purchased by the Shreveport Railway & Land Improvement Company, or by the parties principally interested therein. That if it be true, as alleged in the said petition of said Hamilton, that the ordinance of June 23, 1891, therein set forth, vested rights and privileges in the Shreveport Electric Railway & Motive Company, then the repealing clause of June 9, 1892, was unconstitutional, null, and void, and such rights and privileges were not thereby in any manner impaired or affected; and if said company held no vested right under said ordinance of July 23, 1891, then said company had no right nor cause of action, as set forth in petition in said suit No. 4,001. That under either supposition he and his fellow members of the city council could not properly be made parties defendants to said suit No. 4,001. That there was no occasion to make him and his fellow members parties defendants in said suit, or to make the charges therein made against them. That the allegations and charges made in said petition and affidavit, against him and his fellow members of the city council, were not pertinent to the issue, or in any way or manner necessary for the protection of the rights therein alleged to exist. That said suit No. 4,001 is not, and never has been, a real suit,—that same was and is the fraudulent simulation of a suit,—that there was no party plaintiff thereto; and that the pretended corporation, styled therein 'The Shreveport Electric Railway & Motive Power Company', has no existence and has never existed,—all of which said William E. Hamilton well knew, at the time he made said false, malicious, and slanderous charges against petitioner and his said fellow members. That his reputation was in all respects good, prior to the said charges as aforesaid, falsely, wantonly, and maliciously made and published by said W. E. Hamilton. That the said charges so made and published by said W. E. Hamilton have injured his reputation; have been detrimental to his standing and social position in the community where he lives and elsewhere; have had a tendency to degrade him with his fellow men; have impaired his credit and injured his business, which is that of a cotton buyer and factor, and caused same to materially decline, to his great financial loss; have subjected him to mortification and insult; and have outraged his feelings to an extent which cannot be sufficiently measured by money, but at least to the extent of $15,000. That he was entitled to exemplary and punitive damages against said Hamilton, to the amount of at least $10,000. That he was compelled to employ counsel to defend him in said suit No. 4,001, at an expense to him of $150, for which amount, also, he should have judgment against said Hamilton." He prays that Hamilton be cited, and that he have judgment against him for $25,140, interest and costs. The district court held that the exception was well taken, and dismissed the suit. Plaintiff has appealed.

In the reasons for judgment, the district judge said: "There can be no doubt that the averments of the petition of suit No. 22 L. R. A.
